THIS bag is made of brown woolen reps. A square pocket piece, braided with brown worsted braid, and furnished with a soufflet as shown by the illustration, is sewed on at each end of the bag. The outer edge of the pocket pieces and the slit at the middle of the bag are bound with brown worsted braid; this binding is ornamented in point Russe embroidery with brown silk in two shades. The bag is also trimmed at each end with a puffing of the material and with brown worsted tassels. To make the bag, cut of the material and brown muslin lining two four-cornered pieces, each fifty-four inches long and sixteen inches wide. Cut the ends of these pieces in a point, sloping off the material there from both side edges at a distance of six inches from the lower corners to the middle of the ends; and also slope off the lengthwise sides of each piece from the ends toward the middle, so that the width there is only eleven inches and three-fifths. Sew each cashmere piece on a piece of lining, and furnish one of the lined pieces with a pocket piece at each end. For each pocket piece cut of material and muslin lining one piece from Fig. 39, Supplement, and two pieces each from Figs. 40 and 41. Baste the cashmere piece, Fig. 39, on a piece of net of a corresponding size, and braid this piece as shown by the illustration. Sew the piece thus ornamented, as well as the remaining pieces of material, on the corresponding pieces of lining. Face one side and one end of Fig. 39 with a straight strip of the material an inch and one-fifth wide. Lay the soufflet pieces, Figs. 40 and 41, in a fold along each dotted line indicated, so that the material comes inside; sew through the double material, at a distance of three-tenths of an inch from the fold, in a back stitch seam, and join both pieces of Fig. 41 from 45 to 46 and from 46 to 47. Also join each piece of Fig. 41 with Fig. 40 from 41 to 42 and from 42 to 43. Sew the soufflet pieces thus joined to the pocket piece, Fig. 39, according to the corresponding figures; the still free edge of Fig. 40, however, must be faced with a strip of the material. Bind the pocket pieces, and at the same time the edges of the soufflets, all around with light brown worsted braid three-fifths of an inch wide, and ornament this binding with point Russe embroidery as shown by the illustration. The point Russe scallops at the outer edge are worked closely in button-hole stitch. Sew the still free side of the soufflets on one end of the upper part of the bag. Having sewed a similar pocket on the other end of this part also, cut a slit fourteen inches and two-fifths long in the middle of the bag, sew light worsted braid along the slit, ornament the braid in point Russe (see illustration), and bind the edges of the slit with dark brown worsted braid. Join both sides of the top of the bag with the under part with a cording of woolen reps. Join both parts of the bag at the pointed ends by a strip of muslin of the requisite length and four inches and four-fifths wide, and cover the latter on the outside with a puffing of woolen reps. This puffing consists of a straight strip forty-six inches long, six inches and four-fifths wide at the middle, and sloped off at both sides toward the ends to a width of two inches. Gather one side of the strip in the requisite manner, so that a heading two-fifths of an inch wide is formed there; the other side of the strip is arranged in box-pleats two-fifths of an inch wide. Cover the seam made by sewing on the box-pleated side of the puffing with dark brown worsted braid three-fifths of an inch wide, and ornament the latter in point Russe. Finally, sew through the double material of the bag, at a distance of two inches from each end of the slit, all around for a shirr, and run a piece of elastic braid eleven inches and one-fifth long, the ends of which are joined through each shirr. Sew on the tassel as shown by the illustration.

LINEN GARDEN GLOVE.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVI., Fig. 35.

Linen Garden Glove.

THIS glove is made of gray linen cut in points at the bottom, and trimmed with bias strips and a fan-shaped bow of the material. To make the glove, cut one piece from Fig. 35, Supplement, and cut the thumb piece from Fig. 37, No. XVII., of the present Supplement. Sew up the pleat marked on the hand, and cut the slits marked on the pattern. Trim the hand as shown by the illustration, and partly marked on the pattern, sew it up from 32 to 33 and from 34 to 35, and sew in the thumb piece. Cover the joining seam between the thumb and the hand with a bias strip of the material. Face the slit on the under surface of the hand with a bias strip, and furnish this part with a button and button-hole for closing. Work the seams on the upper surface of the hand in point Russe with black silk as shown by the illustration. Arrange the gauntlet in pleats, bringing × on ●, join it with the hand along the slit, and sew a strip of the material to the under side. Cover the joined edges of the gauntlet and hand on the outside with the bow above mentioned.

Nankeen Garden Glove.

THIS garden glove is made of nankeen, bound with red worsted braid, and furnished with red worsted cord and red worsted tassels. To make the glove, cut of nankeen one piece each from Figs. 36–38, Supplement—from Fig. 38 with a double layer of material and an interlining of stiff linen. Cut out a piece for the thumb in Fig. 36 along the contour marked, bind the glove parts before joining them with braid, and work eyelet-holes in Fig. 38 as shown by the illustration. Join the thumb piece from 38 to 39 by means of a back stitch seam, and sew it to the hand, according to the corresponding figures, with a double back stitch seam. After working the half-polka stitch rows shown by the illustration on the hand, along the straight lines given on Fig. 36, Supplement, sew it up from 36 to 37 by means of a double seam, and join it with the gauntlet according to the corresponding figures and signs. Cut a slit along the double line on Figs. 36 and 38, bind the edges of this slit narrowly with red braid, and furnish the glove with a button and button-hole for closing. Finally, run cord through the eyelet-holes in such a manner that the cord crosses between every two eyelet-holes, as shown by the illustration, and furnish the glove with bows of red cord and red worsted tassels.

Crochet Cover for Cushion, Tidy, etc.

THIS design is suitable for toilette-cushion covers, tidies, etc., according to the size of the cotton used in working it. The original is worked with tatting cotton, No. 100. Begin at the middle rosette, which is worked in the following manner: Close a foundation of 12 st. (stitches) in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and on this ring crochet the 1st round.—Six times alternately 5 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sc. (single crochet) on the second following foundation stitch. 2d round.—On each chain stitch scallop of the preceding round 1 sc., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 5 dc. (double crochet), 1 sdc., 1 sc. 3d round.—1 sc. on each sc. of the round before the last (the first round, passing the needle around the vertical veins of this round on the under side of the work), 6 ch. after each sc. 4th round.—Like the second round, but work always 7 dc. on the ch. scallops instead of the 5 dc. referred to in the second round. 5th round.—Like the third round; however, instead of the 6 ch. given there, always work 7 ch. 6th round.—Like the second round; but work 9 dc. instead of the 5 dc. Enlarge each ch. scallop of the seventh round again by 1 st.; increase the dc. of each scallop of the eighth round by 2 dc. For the remainder, these two rounds are worked in the foregoing manner. 9th round.—Always alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the two upper veins of each second following st. of the 8th round; instead of the first ch. at the beginning of the round, work 4 ch.; the first three of these count as 1 dc.; at the end of the round fasten to the third of the 3 ch. counting as 1 dc. with 1 sl. 10th round.—Always alternately 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. of the preceding round. 11th round.—At the beginning of this round work sl. to the middle of the next ch. scallop, then always alternately 3 ch., 1 sc. on the middle stitch of the following ch. scallop of the preceding round. 12th–17th rounds.—1 sc. on each ch. scallop of the preceding round, 5 ch. after each sc. 18th–21st rounds.—1 sc. on each ch. scallop of the preceding round, 7 ch. after each sc. Surround the centre of the cover thus completed with small crocheted rosettes, which are worked, each separately, similar to the middle rosette of the part just completed. Begin each rosette with a foundation of 10 st., close these in a ring with 1 sl., and then work the 1st round.—Five times alternately 3 ch., 1 sc. on the second following foundation stitch. Then the 2d round.—On each ch. scallop of the preceding round work 1 sc., 1 sdc., 3 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc. Work two more leaflet circles in this manner; in the first round of the first of these two circles, however, work 5 ch. for each leaflet; in the following round work on each 5 ch. 1 sc., 1 sdc., 5 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc.; enlarge the leaflets of the third circle in the same proportion. 7th round.—On each leaflet of the sixth round work 5 dc. as shown by the illustration, 1 ch. after each dc.; work 3 ch. instead of the first dc. At the end of the round fasten to the third of the 3 ch. with 1 sl. 8th round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the next ch. of the preceding round, 5 ch. In working this round, fasten the rosettes to each other, as shown by the illustration, with 1 sl. each, and to the completed centre of the cover also. Work five rounds of alternating ch. scallops, as shown by the illustration, on the outer edge of the rosette circle thus joined with the completed centre; each of these scallops counts 7 ch. and 1 sc. on the middle stitch of a ch. scallop of the preceding round. 6th round.—Work 2 dc. divided by 3 ch. on the same ch. scallop on which the last sc. of the preceding round has been worked (in this, as well as in the following rounds, work 3 ch. instead of the first dc.), * 3 ch., 5 dc. on the following ch. scallop of the preceding round, 3 ch., 2 dc. divided by 3 ch. on the following ch. scallop, and repeat from *. At the end of this, as well as of each of the following rounds, fasten to the third of the 3 ch. that count as first dc. of the round with 1 sl., and work sl. to the middle of the following ch. scallop. 7th round.—2 dc. divided by 3 ch. on the first ch. scallop (this is the same scallop on the first stitches of which sl. have been worked), * 4 ch., 10 dc. (these are worked on the 1 ch. before the next 5 dc. of the preceding round, on the following 5 dc. and the 1 ch. after the 5 dc. referred to), working always 2 dc. on each of the 2 ch. and on the middle dc. of the 5 dc., 4 ch., 2 dc. divided by 3 ch. on the ch. scallop between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, and repeat from . 8th round.— 2 dc. divided by 4 ch. on the ch. scallop between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 5 ch., 8 dc. on the middle 8 dc. of the next 10 dc. of the preceding round, 5 ch., and repeat from . 9th round.— 2 dc. divided by 4 ch. on the ch. scallops between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 6 ch., 6 dc. on the six middle dc. of the 8 dc. of the preceding round, 6 ch., and repeat from . 10th round.— 2 dc. divided by 5 ch. on the ch. scallop between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 7 ch., 4 dc. on the middle 4 dc. of the next 6 dc. of the preceding round, 7 ch., and repeat from . 11th round.— 2 dc. divided by 8 ch. on the ch. scallop between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 8 ch., 2 dc. on the two middle dc. of the next 4 dc. of the preceding round, 8 ch., and repeat from . 12th round.— 2 dc. divided by 9 ch. on the ch. scallop between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 9 ch., 1 dc. on the next 2 dc. of the preceding round (to do this, pass the needle through the two upper veins which meet of both stitches, so that the 1 dc. of the 12th round comes on the middle of the 2 dc. referred to), 9 ch., and repeat from *.

BAD DECORATION.

A BUNCH of roses or a lap-dog painted in a slovenly way on the black japan of a coal-scuttle is as inappropriate a piece of decoration as ever was devised, and would spoil instead of improving the best-contrived coal-scuttle. Yet it is undoubtedly one of the most successful ideas in the whole range of our art manufactures, for there is hardly a drawing-room where there is not some such elegant work of art to be seen. It is not difficult to trace the source of this particular form of bad decoration; it arises entirely from a somewhat vulgar feeling, hidden in the depths of our hearts, that there is something rather common-looking in a coal-scuttle which makes it suitable enough for a kitchen, but out of place in a drawing-room; hence the introduction of the roses and the lap-dog, varied occasionally by a picture of a church by moonlight, is considered to give great elegance to what would otherwise be rather an objectionable piece of furniture. Now as a good fire is one of the glories of our rooms, I can not see that a coal-scuttle is much out of place in them, even if we are obliged to have a black and unsightly object; nor do I see that, when left in its simple, undecorated condition, it is necessarily so unsightly. It is a piece of furniture like another, and has its own inconspicuous place in the chimney-corner; and if it is not an object we should single out for our admiration, it, at all events, does not obtrude itself on our gaze. But when it comes to be decorated with bad painting and tawdry gilding it forces itself upon our notice as though it were some kind of elegant vase for holding pot-pourri. Fortunately, however, for those who like and can afford handsome furniture, there is a most simple way of making a coal-scuttle a really decorative object in the most appropriate manner, and that is by making it of copper or brass and keeping it polished. Moreover, an admirably appropriate form of decoration might be applied (the idea is not my own, for I have seen it done once in imitation of an old brass pail) by embossing the metal of which they are made with a kind of repoussé work. This might be very effective; but it requires a real artist to do it well, and such are not easily to be found who will devote their energies to the beautifying of so humble an object. This instance of a painted coal-scuttle may, for all I know, be trite enough with writers on the revival of good art; but I have chosen it on account of its being an extreme case of inappropriate decoration. This incongruity which I have dwelt upon—this disconnection of ideas between coals and roses or churches by moonlight—is not the only cause of the inappropriateness of that form of decoration as applied to objects of such ordinary use in our houses. We will suppose some suitable subject to be chosen for its embellishment; let us say a landscape representing the mouth of a coal-pit.

If this landscape were well painted by a good artist, every one, I think, would agree that it was quite out of place on any thing so subject to rough usage as our coal-box; à fortiori, if it is badly done, it is still more out of place, for bad work has no business to be done at all; so that even if the roses and lap-dog were appropriate in one sense, they would not be in another; they have no place on a coal-scuttle if well done, still less if they are ill done. I can, indeed, imagine a kind of painting which would be suitable, where the things represented would be so simply and conventionally treated as to require only a skillful and intelligent workman to do the painting—a man not necessarily fitted for a higher kind of decorative art—such painting as we see in Oriental lacquer-work: indeed, this simple form of decorative painting is the origin of all our modern japan-work (witness the name); but the treatment of it has by this time become entirely debased. The incessant craving for novelty has led our workmen far away from the original idea, so that they imagine a bad imitation of a water-color drawing or a chromo-lithograph to be better than the broad and simple effects to be got with sober color and subdued gilding. Nothing but the name of this kind of work remains, and we must go back to the fountain-head if we wish to recover the spirit of the original.

HUGH DAMER'S LAST LEGER.

By MISS BRADDON,

Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," etc.

CHAPTER IV.

"Fill the can and fill the cup:
All the windy ways of men
Are but dust that rises up,
And is lightly laid again."

We went to the races in great style, Hugh Damer driving a drag, with the majority of his masculine guests on the roof, and a merry party of ladies inside; Mr. Dashwood traveling in his handsome barouche with Laura, the county matron, and one of her daughters—Laura a vision of loveliness, in some cloudy costume of mauve and white, under a big white silk umbrella. Arrived on the course, Hugh posted both vehicles in an admirable position for seeing the race, and then speedily disappeared with the squire and a good many of his friends. I, to whom the things of the turf were utterly indifferent, remained with the ladies, but was not the less anxious for him whose fortune depended so much on the hazards of the day.

I knew nothing of Damer's engagements—what horses he had backed, or how the numerous events of the day were likely to affect him; but I heard from several quarters that the running was of an unexpected character, calculated to cause disappointment to the majority.

Hugh came to us several times in the course of the day, and, though he talked and laughed with Miss Dashwood and the rest, and might have seemed to a casual observer to be in excellent spirits, I saw that in his face which boded ill for the issue of the day. He drank a great deal of brandy and soda—drank with a feverish eagerness; but I noticed that he ate nothing all through the day. I secured a seat on the box for the return journey, anxious to know the worst, and at once.

"Well, Hugh?" I asked, in a low voice, when we were clear of the crowd, and bowling rapidly along a smooth high-road bordered with noble old timber.

"Well, Fred, I told you about that rooted conviction of mine. It was pretty correct—that's all."

"Then the day has been a bad one?"

"About as bad as it could be."

"But there's to-morrow," I said, with a faint attempt at hopefulness.

"Yes; and my luck will be about the same to-morrow that it has been to-day, I have no doubt. Did you ever see any thing like the running to-day? No man can stand against such a collapse as that. Ptarmigan won the Chester as easily as these four bays of mine could win a race against a coster-monger's donkey, and to-day he let himself be passed by a plater. If I didn't know the character of his stable, I could swear the brute had been got at."

"Was the day good for the ring or the public?"

"Oh, the book-men get the best of it, of course. None of the favorites won."

"Were you unfortunate in every thing?" I asked.

"Yes, every thing. You don't know the trouble it cost me to make my book, Fred. It was a great combination, which might have made my fortune—the last venture of a desperate man, who wanted to redeem all by one great coup. But I have no further faith in it now. The campaign has opened with defeat. To-day has been my Moscow; to-morrow will be Waterloo."

I tried to cheer him, in a few low words. I don't think there was any thing but gloom and bitterness in his mind, but he had that natural pride which shrinks from the revelation of misfortune. He roused himself with an effort, and talked loudly and cheerily all the way home, and I doubt if any one upon the drag except myself suspected that he had been a heavy loser by that day's work.

And by-and-by at the composite meal, half dinner and half supper, which awaited us at Churleigh—a sumptuous banquet in its way, at which the men drank deep of Badminton and Moselle cup in huge silver tankards of the Georgian era, while the ladies sipped tea and coffee, or trifled with a glass of Cliquot—the gayest at the long oak table was the host, who led every peal of laughter, and said the best things that were uttered that night. We sat long and late, the ladies only retiring at midnight, Miss Dashwood declaring, as she bade her host good-night, that she had never in her life spent so delightful a day. "I was always fond of races," she said, with a deprecating air; "I suppose it is a pernicious taste that is natural to a Yorkshire woman, but I never enjoyed any thing as much as the racing to-day."

"I hope it is not the last by a great many that you will spend at Churleigh Wood," Hugh said, with a strange smile.

Late as it was when our party broke up that night, Hugh Damer and Mr. Dashwood were closeted together in the library for a full hour after the rest had gone to their rooms. I heard their voices as they wished each other good-night on the stairs, and heard my friend's step as he walked slowly and heavily along the corridor leading to his own quarters. It was not like his accustomed footfall, and I knew that interview in the library must have been an unpleasant one.

"You've sold Churleigh Wood, Hugh," I said to him, as we drove to the races next day.

"Yes, old fellow, the deed is done. The old place is gone from me for ever and ever. There was no time to lose. I may want the money before the week is out. The manufacturer was very liberal; has paid me a splendid price for his fancy; and the place is gone—and Laura's children will play under the oaks I used to climb fifteen years ago."

"God grant they may be your children as well as Laura's," I said. "I can not bear to think your birth-place is quite gone from you."

"Rather hard lines, wasn't it? But a man must reap what he has sown, Fred, and I have scattered the evil seed with a free hand. I don't deserve any thing better."

The next day was the Leger. That clean, airy little town, which is, in its normal condition, one of the quietest and dullest in England, brimmed over with human life, and rang loud with the buzz and clamor of innumerable tongues. This great autumnal meeting is the saturnalia of the North, and, looking at it from the outside, a pleasant festival enough; but I contemplated that noisy gathering with a jaundiced eye, and my heart sickened as I thought how the day might end for Hugh Damer.

I was too anxious to remain with the ladies to-day, though Laura Dashwood, in a fresh toilette of pale blue and a dainty bonnet that was all forget-me-nots—as if that floral reminder were needed!—who could forget Laura, once having known her?—was lovely and fascinating enough to have held any man not bitten by the second passion of the turf bound like a slave to the wheels of her barouche. I was very uneasy about my friend, and followed him every where, with the air of a meek Pylades dancing attendance on a very fiery Orestes—into the ring, into the paddock, and out into the pleasant stretch of turf on the other side of the course to see the horses take their show-off canter.

"There she goes!" he cried; "Baron Von Bourse's Jezebel: the bay yonder with the small head—green body and pink sleeves. I wonder how many men's hearts she carries at her hoofs! My future depends on her, Norris. I saw her win the Guineas. I'd put every sixpence I could stand upon Pasteboard—the bony gray that had been winning every thing in the autumn—and she flew by him like a bird. Look at her, old boy! By Jove, she's a clipper! Isn't it a graceful action? There was a confounded lot of rain last night, and the ground's heavier than I like to see it. But I think she must win—there's nothing that can touch her, to my mind."

"Not Conjuror, your great Yorkshire horse?"

"Conjuror is as fat as a pig."

"There's a brute yonder—with the jockey in black and crimson—that I hardly like the look of, Hugh," I said, doubtfully. "He's got a splendid stride. See what a lot of ground he covers!"

"That!" cried Hugh, contemptuously; "a rawboned beast that never won a race in his life, unless it was some pettifogging plate at the Curragh."

We posted ourselves about a quarter of a mile from the stand, just outside the phalanx of carriages, drags, wagonettes, barouches, family omnibuses, landaus, Whitechapel carts, and the rest—posted ourselves at a point from which we could get a very fair view of the finish, Hugh standing on an old cask, looming gigantic above the rails; I just in front of his knees. There was a cold, dead weight at my breast as the flag dropped and the hoarse, clamorous cry arose,

"They're off!"

The start was beautiful. For the first quarter of a mile you might have covered the field with a table-cloth. Then some obscure animal got away, and began to make the running. Then half a dozen more crept after him; then the favorite, Jezebel, shot forward to the front, and took a lead which she held steadily till she was within something less than half a mile of the judge's chair.

"She wins!" roared that mighty chorus; "the mare wins!"

Hugh Damer clapped his hand on my shoulder—such a muscular grip—it felt like a hand in an iron glove.

"God bless her!" he cried—not impiously, I hope; "she has saved Churleigh."

Alas! too soon had they cheered the victor. That rawboned plater of which Damer had spoken so scornfully came tearing over the heavy ground, with a thud upon the turf that was like distant thunder, and gained on the graceful Jezebel. There was cart-horse blood in him, I believe—nothing thorough-bred could have pounded over the clay like that.

I looked up at Damer. O God! what a white, agonized face I saw—fixed and rigid—with the eyes glaring at the winner.

"Good-by, Churleigh," he cried, with a choking sound, that was half laugh, half sob. "That brute has ridden away with my birth-place and my wife. The ring has got the day, old fellow. There'll be boasting and rejoicing in the tents of Kedar to-night. Come along, old chap. Let's go back to the women and hear their pretty baby-talk about its being such a splendid race—and, oh, please, which is the Leger, Mr. Damer; is it an épergne or a tankard, and may we go and see it?"

He put his arm in mine and dragged me off, after he had given that feeble cask a kick that sent it spinning into space. This hollow-hearted gayety which he put on seemed to me very piteous. I think I would rather have seen him cast himself prone upon the turf and weep aloud.

On this last night I had contrived to secure the seat beside him as we drove home, and once more, and in the same spot, I asked him the question I had asked at the end of the first day,

"Well, Hugh?"

"It's all over, dear boy. I am done for."

"Quite ruined, Hugh?"

"Past all possibility of redemption."

"It can't surely be so bad as that," I said. "Let me help you. I am better off than you give me credit for being, I dare say. I can do something at the worst."

"No, no, my dear fellow. Any thing you lent me would only be a drop in the ocean. It's like you to make the offer, but it would be letting you in for a loss without doing me any good. I must make the best settlement I can with my creditors, and then—"

He paused, and I waited in vain for the end of that sentence.

"And then what, Hugh?" I asked, anxiously.

"Who knows? Who knows what becomes of all the men who go to the dogs? They go across the seas somewhere, I suppose, and drop out of the knowledge of the circle they have lived in. Any thing is better than the chance of being met in Oxford Street by an old acquaintance, out at elbows, and with boots that are in themselves a history."

"Then you mean that you will emigrate?"

"I mean nothing at present—except to make the best settlement of my debts that I can."

"Hugh Damer, give me your honor as a gentleman that you will do nothing rash."

"Rash! you mean that I mustn't make a sudden end of a worthless life. Don't be afraid, Fred; men have a weak way of clinging to existence, let it be ever so troublesome. Life is a habit, you see, and sometimes a very bad habit, but it's not one of which a man can easily cure himself. I shall go on living, depend upon it, somehow."

"And remember, Hugh, how many men have to face the world without a sixpence, to trust in their own talents alone for success. And you have powers so much above the ruck. You are young enough to begin life again."

"At thirty, Fred, and after living at the rate I have lived! I doubt it. But don't waste any thought upon my future, dear boy—I'm not worth it."

My heart bled for him as we drove up the long avenue leading to Churleigh, and I saw the old Tudor mansion, with its many-shaped windows flashing brightness upon the autumn night. Within there was the glow and warmth of fires, welcome even at this early season. The flash and glitter of rare old glass and silver on the long dining-table, and withal that air of mingled repose and grandeur only to be found to perfection in an old house, where every object has the grace and charm of an age that has gone by.

The Dashwoods and all the rest of the guests were to leave next day; but at Hugh's earnest request the manufacturer consented to stay till the following Monday morning.

"Let us have one quiet Sunday together," my poor friend pleaded, glancing from George Dashwood to his daughter, who stood a little way apart, watching him, with parted, faintly tremulous lips, and a somewhat richer bloom than usual on her cheeks: "just one quiet Sunday. You see the house has been so full of people that I have really been scarcely able to enjoy your society—and we are something more than ordinary acquaintances. We are friends, are we not? and I should like for us to have just one quiet day together."

"Friends! yes, I should think we are," the manufacturer answered, heartily; "and I hope we shall pass many days together. However, as you make such a point of Sunday, why, we'll stay; you don't mind, do you, Laura?" She shook her head, with a gracious smile and a still deeper blush, and then bent down to caress a favorite pointer of Hugh's.

"I shall be glad to have a walk round the grounds and a little serious talk with you, Damer," her father went on. "There are some alterations I think of making, and I should like your opinion about them."

"Alterations!" cried Laura; "surely you wouldn't change any thing where all is so perfect!"

Hugh gave her a grateful look—only one brief glance, but it expressed a great deal, I thought.

CHAPTER V.

"Life's joy for us a moment lingers,
And death seems in the word farewell."

I TRIED to get away on Saturday, thinking that my friend would like to be quite alone with the Dashwoods, but it was no use; Hugh was determined that I should stay to the last. So I staid, and I believe I was of some value in engrossing the manufacturer's society, and listening patiently to a good deal of talk about trades-unionism and the manner in which commercial England was digging her own grave, while Hugh and Laura strolled side by side among the shady paths of the shrubberies, and on the broad sunny walk beside the moat, making a poor pretense of being intensely interested in the fish that glanced to and fro under the dark, still water, or in the showy groups of geraniums on the sloping bank.

I knew that they were happy—that it was a halcyon Sabbath for Hugh Damer, though he was forbidden to speak the words that must have risen so often to his lips.

We went to the old church, just beyond the gates of Churleigh Wood, in the morning; and Laura sat under the white marble tablet that recorded the virtues of Hugh Damer's dead mother, while all about and around us were effigies of departed and heroic Damers, who had worn sword or gown in the good days that were gone.

That peaceful Sunday came to a close at last, and I thought at nightfall that there was a look of sadness, and even disappointment, in Laura's expressive face. Perhaps she had expected something more from Hugh Damer than those airy nothings, those graceful compliments, which had been his tribute to her that day.

The Dashwoods left very early next morning, and I, who was to depart half an hour later, was present at their departure. I saw a sad, wistful look in Laura's face as she wished my friend good-by.

"There shall be no change in this place that I can help, Mr. Damer," she said, gently; "be sure of that."

"You are an angel of kindness, Miss Dashwood; and I am almost happy that my old home should pass into your hands."

"And yet it was a strange caprice to sell it," she said, wonderingly.

"A caprice—yes; but you see it is the nature of men to be fickle."

"And I suppose you are like the rest of your species," she answered, with a faint sigh. "There are some family portraits, by-the-bye, that you will wish to keep, of course," she added, shyly. "They shall be sent to you when you are settled."

"You are all goodness. I will ask for them—when I am settled."

"Come, Laura," cried Mr. Dashwood; "are you going to keep Damer there forever with your chatter? Remember that I have an appointment at Dedham at two. Good-by, Damer; be sure that this place will always be your home whenever you like to come to it."

"A thousand thanks. Good-by—good-by, Miss Dashwood."

And so those two parted, with not so much as a farewell pressure of the hands to betray Hugh Damer's love.

"God bless her!" he said, softly, after he had stood for some minutes silently watching the carriage as it drove along the broad road that circled the gardens, and disappeared in the avenue leading to the gates; "God bless her fair young face! She's the sweetest girl that ever I looked upon; and I think she could have loved me, if I had been free to ask for her love."

"Think she could have loved you!" I echoed, indignantly: "why, I know that she loves you, and that you have almost broken her innocent heart by not speaking out like a man. If you had only made a clean breast of it yesterday, when you and she were meandering about the gardens in an obvious state of mutual spooniness, you might have had every thing comfortably settled with old Dashwood this morning."

"No, Fred, it's impossible—I am a beggar."

I had no time to argue the case just then. The dog-cart was waiting to drive me to Doncaster in time for the up train. I begged Hugh to come straight to me when he came to London, which I expected him to do speedily; to make my quarters his home whenever he was in town; and to trust me fully in honor of our friendship, which meant nothing if it did not mean a real confidence in each other. He promised to do this, shook my hands heartily, and hurried me off to the dog-cart. My last backward glance showed me the tall figure standing alone upon the broad gravel path by the moat, in the beloved home which was his no longer.

He never came to me; my anxious and laborious inquiries about him resulted only in the vaguest possible information. No one, either in London or at Churleigh Wood, could give me any definite account of his whereabouts. There was a general impression that he had gone abroad, but no one could say where. He had settled his affairs in a speedy but satisfactory manner, paid all his racing debts in full, and some other creditors, made a composition with others, and so on. Every one spoke well of him and wished him well; but no one could set my mind at ease as to his fate.

I remembered that wild talk of his about making an easy end of all his difficulties with a pistol, and for a long time I was haunted by a dreadful fear. I watched the newspapers for accounts of nameless suicides; I visited dead-houses to look upon hapless creatures found drowned, and unclaimed by the living; I put myself in communication with the police. Happily nothing came of all this; and I began to hope that Hugh Damer had indeed gone to seek his fortunes in a newer and wilder world.

CHAPTER VI.

"And now those vivid hours are gone:
Like mine own life to me thou art,
Where Past and Present, wound in one,
Do make a garland for the heart."

FIVE years went by, and I had heard nothing of Damer. Every autumn I had made a point of spending a week or a fortnight at the pretty rustic village near the gates of Churleigh Wood. Every year I fancied that I should obtain some tidings of my friend; every year I became more attached to the place. I had excellent lodgings in the pretty, picturesque abode of a farmer's widow, half cottage, half villa, and my annual visit had become quite an institution.

I had grown very intimate with the Dashwoods in the course of these yearly holidays, and the manufacturer had given me many hospitable invitations to make Churleigh my head-quarters. This I did not care to do. The place was too closely associated with my lost friend for it to seem natural to me as a home without him. But it was impossible altogether to resist Mr. Dashwood's friendly advances, and little by little I became a frequent visitor at the noble old house. Laura was still unmarried; no children's voices had yet awakened the echoes of the sombre oak-paneled galleries. Hugh's fancy picture of the fair young mother sitting under the cedar with her babies round her had not been realized. She was no less lovely than when I first beheld her as Hugh Damer's guest; but her beauty had a pensive shadow upon it in these latter days, I fancied; and I wondered whether she still cherished the memory of him who had once been master of Churleigh Wood. Her father told me that she had rejected many suitors, and declined more than one eligible alliance.

"It's rather hard upon me, you see," Mr. Dashwood said, plaintively; "for I am getting old and shaky, and I should like to see my little girl married to an honest man and established in a good position before I go off the hooks. She'll have a good bit of money when I'm gone; and a young woman with money is a fair mark for every adventurer."

"I think Miss Dashwood is too wise to become the prey of an adventurer," I replied; "her pure mind would never mistake pinchbeck for gold."

"Yes, she is a good girl," the father answered, with a sigh; "but I should like to see her married."

"To a man of equal fortune to her own, I suppose?" I said, anxious to find out how the land might have lain for my friend Damer, had he made Miss Dashwood an offer.

"Well, yes," the manufacturer answered, meditatively. "You see, if a man is poor, it's difficult to get rid of the notion that he's more or less of a fortune-hunter. I should like my daughter to marry a man whose means placed him beyond that suspicion."

"Ah!" I thought. "Then there would have been no chance for Damer."

When I went to Churleigh Wood next autumn there was no cheery, loud-voiced host to bid me welcome. George Dashwood lay in a newly built vault, near the resting-place of the Damers, and a handsome monument in the old church bore the record of his homely virtues. He had been dead nearly a year, carried off suddenly, in full health and vigor, as it seemed, by a stroke of apoplexy.

Miss Dashwood had been abroad for the greater part of the time since her father's death, the woman at the lodge told me; but she was at Churleigh now, fondly welcomed by the poor of the district, to whom she had ever been a generous friend. She was more devoted to them even than of old, the woman told me, seeing no company, and giving the best part of her life to works of charity and benevolence.

I called upon her on the day after my arrival, and found her calm and serenely lovely in her sombre mourning robes. She had a widowed aunt living with her, a sister of Mr. Dashwood's—a homely matron, who had been a small farmer's wife, and whose existence had been spent in the quiet atmosphere of a rural homestead—an honest, kindly soul, who spoke a broad Yorkshire patois, that was almost like a foreign language to me, and to whom Laura seemed warmly attached.

We talked much of her dead father, and my hearty praises of him seemed to touch Miss Dashwood keenly.

"You will dine with us before you leave the village, I hope, Mr. Norris," she said, when I was taking my departure. "We are only two solitary women, and can not offer you a very lively evening; but I know you are fond of the old house."

I accepted the invitation, and dined at Churleigh on the following evening. The curate of the old church, a rather insipid young man, with ritualistic proclivities, had been asked to meet me. We were a very quiet party of four, but there was no dullness for me in that tranquil evening. There was a tender charm in Laura Dashwood's society which I had never found in that of any other woman; and the refinement of all her surroundings seemed more marked now that her father's somewhat bourgeoise figure was missing from the picture.

We dined in the cedar parlor, and adjourned for our dessert to the library—a noble old room of octagonal shape, large and lofty, with four wide, high windows opening upon a flower garden, which had always been sacred to the châtelaines of Churleigh. It was a sultry evening, and the four windows were all open; the little lawn beyond them steeped in a tender, silvery moonlight; the semicircle of trees that shut us in from the outer world rising dark and high against a cloudless heaven.

On such an evening one has a natural aversion to artificial light; so, by general desire, there was only one lamp lighted in the library—a moderator, with a large opaque globe and a dark green velvet shade, which stood on an oaken table in a remote corner of the room.

Miss Dashwood officiated by-and-by with her own fair hands at a pretty little oval tea-table by one of the open windows, and we drank our fragrant orange-pekoe flavored beverage out of old egg-shell china tea-cups without handles, in a very home-like and friendly fashion. After tea Mrs. Pollard, the farmer's widow, retired to a shady corner, where, I think, she indulged in a placid slumber, while the curate withdrew to the lamp-lit table, and amused himself turning over a port-folio of photographs collected by Laura during her late travels.

Miss Dashwood and I were thus left alone at our open window. She was seated in a meditative attitude looking dreamily out at the moonlit lawn, and for some time I could see that she bore her part in our conversation in a half-mechanical manner, and that her thoughts were very far away. This became so obvious to me after a little while that I left off talking altogether at last, and we sat in silence, both of us looking out at that tranquil garden, so fair in the solemn hush of the warm September night.

"Do you know what anniversary this is?" she asked me, by-and-by, in a sudden way that almost startled me.

"An anniversary?"

"Yes, the fifteenth—the date of the St. Leger which we saw run with your friend Mr. Damer. You—you have not heard of him lately, I suppose?" she asked, timidly. I doubt whether, in the broad light of day, she would have found courage to ask me that question. Certainly she had never asked it so directly before.

"I have had no tidings whatever of or from him, in all the five years that have gone by since that day."

"Do you think he is dead?" she asked, her voice trembling a little.

"Well, no; I can't bring myself to believe that. You know the proverb about bad news. I think if any thing had happened to cut short his career I should have heard of it somehow. I know he had almost made up his mind to emigrate—try his luck in the colonies, and so on."

"I fear he was quite ruined when he sold papa this place?"

"Yes, it was all over with him when he brought his mind to that sacrifice."

"And I thought him hard-hearted for parting with his birth-place. How unjust I was!"

"Indeed, Miss Dashwood, I do not believe you were disposed to be ungenerous to him."

"Ungenerous! No; he would not have found me ungenerous, if he would only have trusted me."

Her tone was unspeakably tender as she pronounced those few last words.

"There was no one more anxious than I that he should trust you," I said, "for I knew how dearly he loved you."

"Loved me! And you knew that?"

"Yes. I knew that he loved you with all his heart and soul. But he was too proud to offer himself to you in his beggary."

She made no remark upon this. I, too, was silent, for I knew that she was thinking of my friend; knew, as I had known from the first, that she loved him.

Presently, with a suddenness that startled both of us, there came a shadow athwart the moonlight—the tall, gaunt figure of a man—a figure which seemed at once strange and yet familiar to me, and the sight of which set my heart throbbing violently.

He came across the moonlit lawn, and stood facing the window where we sat. Laura Dashwood rose to her feet, looking at him intently, very pale in the moonlight.

"Good evening, Miss Dashwood," he said, in a low voice, and with that quiet ease of manner which some men would carry with them to the pillory or the block. "Is there any welcome at Churleigh Wood for a wanderer and an outcast?"

"Mr. Damer!" she cried, and I could hear the rapture in the faint yet eager cry.

"Hugh, dear old Hugh!"

I had clasped his hands in mine. How thin and wasted the once muscular fingers felt as I grasped them!

"Why, what is this, dear boy? you are as pale as a ghost," I exclaimed, as Hugh Damer dropped heavily into a chair.

"I have been very ill on the passage home—intermittent fever or something of that kind—there was no doctor on board ship; but the skipper physicked me in a rough-and-ready fashion of his own, and at one time he gave little hope that I should ever see the old country again. However, I pulled through somehow. I have rather a strong will, you know, Fred, and I grappled with grim death hand to hand. I wanted so to come home!"

"After five years, Hugh," I said. "Why not in all those five years?"

"I had a purpose to accomplish, and I waited till it was accomplished. When that was done the homesickness grew upon me like a kind of madness. I overworked myself, perhaps, a little toward the end of my exile, I was so eager to return, to look upon Churleigh Wood once more. But I had not been on board the vessel three days before I was struck down by this wretched fever; and till within a week of our landing I was not able to drag myself on deck. We only reached Liverpool this afternoon, and I have pushed across country as fast as the railways would let me, wasting most wearisome intervals at out-of-the-way junctions, and altogether enduring a prolonged trial of human patience. Thank God, I am here at last! Miss Dashwood—Laura—there was something I would have given the world to say to you on that last happy Sunday we spent in this house—something I dared not tell you then. I have come from the other side of the world to say it now."

When this secret was told I know not, but I know that we finished the evening very pleasantly, weak as Hugh Damer still was. He went home to share my lodgings with me, and my landlady and I nursed him between us, and made a strong man of him in a very short time. This being done, I was fain to return to the busy world, and leave my old friend in possession of my quarters.

Two months afterward, in the gray, misty November, there was a quiet wedding in the old church among the effigies of departed Damers, and the fair young mistress of Churleigh Wood took the name of its old masters.

"Well, darling," Hugh said to his bride, as they stood in the old Gothic porch waiting for the carriage that was to convey them on the first stage of their honey-moon journey, "I suppose you think you have married a pauper?"

"I know that I have married the only man I ever loved, Hugh," she answered, in her low, tender voice, "and that is all I have ever thought of."

"Then I am happy to tell you that he is also one of the richest men in Sydney, my pet," Hugh answered, smiling down upon the fair face. "I went away to redeem my fortune and return to you, Laura, or to remain away forever. There were no half measures for me. I was a speculator, and a desperate one—for my case was desperate—but an honest one always, dear; and fortune favored me. I used to fancy that your influence protected and succored me. There seemed a kind of magic in my success, and the day came at last when I won the great prize, and was master of a fortune that I might fairly ask you to share. Only it was pleasant for me to defer telling you this till you had taken me for better for worse, sweet one, and to know that you would have taken me penniless."

What need I tell after this? When the happy sound of wedding-bells rings out upon the air, one can generally guess the end of the story; although there are those who do come to grief, and ruin worse than death, after marriage.

Those two of whom I have written were very happy; no cloud came athwart their sunshine; and I have seen Laura sitting under the big cedar, with her children round her, and Hugh Damer lying at her feet among his babies—not a lonely exile, wandering far away, broken-hearted, as he had fancied himself doomed to wander when he made the picture.

Churleigh opens its hospitable door to me every autumn. The old master of the Glendown Hunt has gone to that quiet rest from which even the deep-mouthed voices of his favorites are not loud enough to waken him, and Hugh Damer has been elected, by the popular voice of the neighborhood, into that honorable position. He hunts about six times a week, gives hunting breakfasts that are banquets of an almost Gargantuan character, and I go down for a run with him now and then, with my portmanteau stuffed full of briefs—not one of which I look at during my holiday.

Often, on autumnal evenings, pacing up and down by the moat, enjoying the social weed, in a kind of half silence that is pleasanter than talk, we drop out a word or two about that unforgotten Leger.

"It was much better to win the race by your own pluck and industry than by the swiftness of Jezebel's heels, wasn't it, Hugh?" I said once.

"Well, I don't know, old fellow," he answered, in his careless way. "I lost five years of paradise, and had to work like a galley-slave among our friends in the Antipodes. But I suppose it makes a better moral."

THE CHEMIST ON THE HEARTH.

LITERALLY on the hearth-stone, which, if it exists in a modern home, wants freshening and cleaning when fires are put out for the season. Marble hearths are discolored by nearly every substance that approaches them, from pine kindlings, with pitch oozing from them, to the poisonous gases of coal smoke and fender rust. It is surprising that otherwise careful housekeepers will allow a fine white mantel and hearth to rival those of a country store in stains and rustiness. Wash the marble first with warm water and soap to remove the grease; then apply oil of vitriol for ink and iron stains, washing it off as soon as the spots disappear. Spots and discolorations made by burning soft coal, if not of long duration, so as to penetrate deep into the marble, may be eaten off with acid. But, if thoroughly smoked, there is no better resource than to call in the plasterer, who will mix a thin stucco of marble dust, and give the whole a pure white coating without gloss. The polish may be given by varnishing the stucco, when dry, with a solution of what is called water-glass. This is the silicate of soda—sold cheap enough at the large chemical warehouses in New York. For its many and convenient uses this substance deserves to be widely known. It is produced by fusing fine flint sand with hydrate of soda, the silicate thus formed dissolving readily in water to any thickness from that of putty to a sirup-like varnish. When applied to solid substances the carbonic acid of the atmosphere decomposes it, taking up the soda, and leaving the silica in a hard, shining coat, water and fire proof. It is applied either to plaster, wood, or stone, both outside and inside a house. The only care to be observed in its application is to give it time to dry thoroughly before allowing it to get wet in any way, or it will be streaked. For treating marble floors, hearths, tables, and statuettes it will be found valuable.

Soap-stone hearths in kitchens should not be suffered to lose their freshness and grow slippery with grease. When first laid either coat them with two or three layers of water-glass, or oil them with boiled linseed-oil, which will prevent spots from showing. This, if you wish to save work; but for those who like a clean, pure slab of stone under their feet, with the same face it wore when first sawed, a little trouble will not be regarded. To remove spots of grease, spread them with a paste of soda and quicklime, leaving it to dry, and washing off when it carries the spots with it. Then spread the whole hearth with powdered freestone mixed with water, and let that dry. When brushed off, with a stiff brush, it leaves the soap-stone fresh as if just cut. The freestone may be saved for future use. Nor will we disdain to look at the zinc or tin hearths, which, by-the-way, ought always to be bound on the edge with a double strip by the tinner. The worst spotted sheet may be quickly brightened by rubbing with a brush dipped in kerosene and fine wood-ashes. But these should only remain on the briefest time, or they will eat off the tin as well as the spots.

The plated knobs or mouldings about a house may be easily cleaned with a mixture of half an ounce of precipitated chalk with the same quantity each of alcohol and ammonia. Wet every part with this, and when dry brush it off and rub with flannel. This is very good for cleaning spoons and plate. Worn plated goods are much improved by rubbing with this mixture: fifteen grains of nitrate of silver, thirty grains of cyanide of potassium, half an ounce of Paris white, and four ounces of water. Shake well before using. This is very poisonous, and must not be used on table-ware.

The family are moving into a new house, perhaps, and the floors are dingy and discolored enough to drive a good housekeeper well-nigh distraught. Remove all the crusted dirt with sand, then mop the floor with a strong lye, washed off with hot water. Before the floor is quite dry moisten it with very dilute hydrochloric acid, and then spread with a thin paste of hypochlorite of lime. Let this remain overnight, and wash off in the morning.

If you know what a clean floor is, you will see it then—every board showing white as milk; and it is well if any one is allowed to step into that kitchen till the immaculate splendor is somewhat subdued. Having such a floor once, people naturally want to keep it so. This may be done by coating it at once with water-glass as thick as varnish, first filling all the cracks with a putty of water-glass and gypsum. Four coats of this soluble glass will form a hard, durable coat, not affected by heat or by wear, and bright as if it were lacquered. There is economy of labor in using the silicate solution, for it does not need to be renewed year by year. If color is desired, mineral paint is added to the second coat, and the last is ground off, and one coat of oil laid on. This is some trouble; but remember it will last six or eight years, and save endless fatigue in scrubbing, retouching and drying.

Lest you think I have water (-glass) on the brain, nothing shall be said here about washing the walls with it, though good authorities pronounce it an excellent application both inside and out, and it promises to meet the long-felt want of a glaze for walls that can be washed like porcelain. But every family wants to know how to take spots out of wall-paper. Bread crumbs? No, thank you, unless for pencil marks. Moisten fresh, dry calcined magnesia with pure benzole, and cork it for use. Rub this on fresh grease spots, and they will flee at once. If they are of long standing, spread the paste on the spot and leave it till the benzole evaporates, then remove the mass carefully with a paper-knife, so as not to scratch the surface, and brush the magnesia away with a nice dry brush. With this preparation paper, parchment, ivory, kid, silk, and woolen can be cleaned so as to look like new. Wash fabrics that will bear it with water to remove the last of the magnesia. Silk and wall-paper should be sponged with ether.

After cleaning the wall, attention is directed to the prints and engravings which hang upon it. How I wish I had known years ago the secret of treating soiled pictures with ozone! In moving to the West our boxes were wet, and all the lovely lithographs and engravings which were to gladden the sitting-room were spoiled. Well, those pets of engravings are past saving; but other people may have discolored, stained, or mildewed pictures which they can save by using some pains. The articles needed are a large glass flask with wide neck, or a glass jar with cork cover, a piece of platinum wire, and a bit of phosphorus half an inch thick and three inches long. Be careful to handle the phosphorus only under water, for it may take fire by a moment's exposure. Have a pint or two of water heated to 86 degrees, suspend the phosphorus at the bottom of the jar by a string, and pour in the water till the stick of phosphorous is half covered, cork the vessel loosely and put it in a cool but not cold place about eighteen hours. This process develops the ozone. Roll up the prints or papers to be bleached, and hang them by a platinum wire in the flask, first moistening the picture. Prints brown with age or soiled with coffee are cleaned by a day's treatment. Longer time is required for ink stains. When bleached, rinse the paper in pure water till all the phosphoric acid is out, and press it between blotting-paper in a screw press if possible. Otherwise, when nearly dry, put it between leaves of white printing-paper and iron with a hot flat-iron. This restores all documents, wood-cuts, and prints, and makes them as white as new.

WHITENING FLANNEL.

IT is said that flannel which has become yellow by age may be restored to its original whiteness by the use of a solution of one and a half pounds of white Marseilles soap in fifty pounds of soft river-water, to which is added two-thirds of an ounce of spirit of sal ammoniac, and the whole thoroughly mixed. The flannel is to be immersed in this solution and well stirred around, and afterward washed off in pure water.

The same result may also, it is said, be obtained still more quickly by immersing the flannel for an hour in a dilute solution of acid sulphate of soda, and then stirring in dilute hydrochloric acid in the proportion of one part of acid to fifty of water. The vessel is then to be covered over and allowed to remain for a quarter of an hour, when the articles are to be removed and thoroughly washed.

A NURSERY RHYME FOR BIG FOLKS.

Nor only the little toddlers,
Perched high on papa's toe,
Bound for a ride to London town,
On childish journeys go—
For we all go up, up, up,
And all go down, down, down-y,
And all go backward and forward,
And all go round, round, round-y.

Still do we reach for sunbeams,
And learn the rattle's trick.
The great big watch of Father Time—
How we love to hear it tick!

To pat a cake for our Tommy,
And pat a cake for ourself—
For that alone we labor and strive,
And hoard up our golden pelf.

This little pig goes to market;
That little pig stays at home;
And we all cry "Wee!" for our mammy
Wherever we chance to roam.

When Jack and Jill go up the hill
To fetch their pail o' water,
As sure as Jack comes tumbling down
Poor Jill comes tumbling arter.

We seek our bed with Sleepyhead,
We stay a while with Slow;
And fill the pot with Greedy, glad
To sup before we go.

Jack Horners in their corners still Do ply their busy thumb,
And, "What a big boy!" we always cry
Whenever we see the plum.

And, "Who comes here?" cries Trouble;
Lo! 'tis a grenadier,
With the sorrow of millions with him,
Seeking his pot o' beer.

Concerning the house that Jack built
Our knowledge we exalt;
But oh, for cats to kill the rats
That eat our treasured malt!

Our wise men into brambles
Still jump with might and main;
And those who go to sea in bowls
Rarely come back again.

And don't some hearts, deploring
The things that gnaw and harrow,
Let fall the wheelbarrow, wife and all,
When lanes are rough and narrow?

Ah yes! the old rhymes suit us
As well as ever they did;
For the gist of our lives, from first to last,
Is under their jingle hid—
As we all go up, up, up,
And all go down, down, down-y,
And all go backward and forward,
And all go round, round, round-y.

HOW DOLLY "DECLARED HER INDEPENDENCE."

A FOURTH OF JULY STORY.

DOLLY ELTON was going to be married; so her step-mother said, and the sewing-woman, and the girls who expected to "stand up" with her. So said Horace De Wint, to whom she was engaged; and Dolly herself, though she said little, did not contradict, and preserved that silence which gives consent. But as time crept on, bringing nearer and nearer the inevitable day, dark misgivings began to afflict Dolly's secret soul as to whether she was.

There were the twelve pairs of sheets, to be sure, and the snowy pillow-cases to match, stored away in the big press. There, too, were tablecloths, napkins, towels, all duly hemmed by Mrs. Elton, whose fingers did full duty by her husband's daughter, whatever might be said of her heart. The bureau in the keeping-room chamber was crammed with cotton and cambric, goodly piles in all stages of fabrication from the initial web to the last ruffle. In the closet, hung on pegs, the gowns, finished and unfinished, dainty, rustling, half-sentient creations, prophesying a happy life, which they were meant to adorn. They frightened Dolly. She never stopped to stroke or caress their folds as another girl might do. All these things seemed to bind her somehow. They had given trouble—they had cost so much! Like accusing witnesses, they rose and testified against her whenever throbs of revolt shook her poor little frame. It was against human freedom; and slight and intangible as are the threads of custom and of circumstance, many another maiden besides our Dolly has struggled in their mesh, and found them stronger than cable of iron and link of steel.

Did she ever love Horace? This question she asked herself over and over again on wakeful nights, without getting a satisfactory reply. But a year ago, when their engagement took place, no such doubt disturbed her. Fresh from the law-school and the great city which Dolly had never seen, there was something fascinating in the immediate and devoted attention paid her by the clever young lawyer. He had a nice house and comfortable income, magnified into wealth by village report, and was considered "splendid" by all the girls; good-looking, too, or she thought so then. Dolly knew little of love or lovers. Horace was the first who ever came wooing to her pretty feet, and the upper surface of her heart was touched by his affection, his compliments, and by the silky sweet voice which uttered them, and the thousand-and-one tributes—he brought flowers, bonbons, verses—the tinsel small-change of city society, but ranking as virgin gold in remoter districts. Vanity, triumph, romance, all were enlisted in his favor; and when the decisive moment came Dolly said "Yes," gayly as a bird, and took the utmost pleasure in her diamond ring and her congratulations. "It was real nice to be engaged," she mentioned to her girl friends.

This was a year ago—"when she was young," as she pathetically thought to herself—though, poor child, she was barely eighteen now. Only a year! But it had done the work of ten in forming Dolly Elton. For the first few weeks all went smoothly. Walks, drives, moonlight whisperings—every thing was en règle. There were the usual jokes and jests, and the squire and Mrs. Elton sat in the "other room," and left the parlor to the lovers of evenings. But somehow they did not grow together. Horace, now that his prize was won, began to show a truer self; and a certain exacting littleness which was a part of his nature came into view. Relying on the sweetness of temper which he was pleased to style Dolly's chief attraction, he indulged in various small tyrannies; was captious, snappish when tired or vexed, not angry—that open and generous passion was beyond him—but surly and sharp. Disagreeable things came easily from his lips when his will was crossed; and though he always made up afterward with caresses and presents, Dolly learned to dread these moods, and to meet them with a feeling which was half dislike and half contempt. And, as we all know, when contempt even so much as peeps in at the door, love is pretty sure to make post-haste for the window. The two can not abide together.

Dolly's temper was a sweet one; but it was capable of indignation and of wrath deep and glowing. The girl had grown since the day when, at his bidding, she put her childish hand into Horace De Wint's. She was growing, and to grow; a deep, rich womanhood was to be hers, and already she rebelled at imprisonment. "A mighty keel needs the sea," says the proverb; and, like some stately vessel launched in shallow waters, Dolly drifted on, now grounding on the shoals, now grazing the confines of the meaner nature which encompassed hers, hearing afar off a beckoning roar, half recognized, which told of fresh and limitless freedom, but ignorant how to attain thereto. It is so easy to drift.

One point of issue between the two was "obedience," on which Horace, an anticipatory tyrant, was fond of descanting. He was a devout believer in certain stringent sentences of St. Paul, which he was wont to quote to the exclusion of other Scripture.

"The husband is the head of the wife," he would say; "you know that, don't you, Dolly?"

"I have heard you say so a good many times, Horace; but I don't know exactly what it means."

"Means, my dear child! Why, it is one of the commandments!"

"Which? The thirteenth or the fourteenth?"

"Dolly, don't be disputatious. All Scripture is commandment, as obligatory to the conscience as if recorded on the tables of stone."

"Indeed! Then I'll trouble you to step out into the back yard."

"Why?"

"While I collect some boys and a few brickbats. You broke the Sabbath most flagrantly day before yesterday; and there is a 'commandment' for all respectable persons to assemble and stone you to death."

"Broke the Sabbath! How? I should like to know."

"First, you cut that great fagot of grape-vine to make my rustic stand with. That was clearly against the law. And then you would scramble those eggs over the lamp for tea—another penal offense."

"Dolly," cried Horace, red with anger, "it is unworthy of you to quibble in this way. I say nothing of the bad taste you evince, but when you know more of the world you will find that few things are considered so unbecoming in a woman as making fun of sacred things. Of course these Sabbath observances are obsolete."

"So is assuming 'headship' over your wife with a stick," retorted Dolly. "But" (speaking quickly to avert the rising storm), "seriously, Horace, I would like to know what you understand by those texts in the Epistles. Just how far do you regard the husband as the head of the wife, and she in subjection to him?"

"From the beginning to the end," replied Horace, stammering with eagerness. "It is plainly meant that there should be but one authority in a house, and that lodged in the man. No married life can be happy where this is not clearly understood at the outset. It is God's decree that the husband's will should prevail."

"But how if the wife is the 'better man,' and her will the strongest?"

"That can never be the case."

"Oh, Horace! Think of Mrs. Gale, with her drunken husband, bringing up six children, managing the farm, and keeping him out of mischief all she can! Suppose his 'will' was left to obtain. Think of poor, timid Mr. Puffit, and that splendid wife of his, who borrowed his revolver, and scared away the burglars when he was afraid to get out of bed! Think of Edna Allen and Phil: who would dream of comparing them? Think of—"

"Dolly," cried Horace, appalled, "what has come over you? I never heard you go on so before. Your ideas are strong-minded, and would revolutionize every thing. I hate them; they are utterly repulsive to me. Pray let me never hear you speak so again."

Dolly's lip curled. Horace stalked off with a magisterial air. How much longer could this state of things last?

It was late June. The wedding was definitely fixed for September, and Mrs. Elton, being emphatically what is termed "a forehanded person," all preparations were in an advanced state. Dolly wrung her hands as she thought of the things that were done or doing to equip her for—wretchedness! Yes, it began to seem to her like that. She thought and thought, and saw no way out of it. To face her parents with all those "things" staring her in the face, and announce that she was tired of her engagement and disgusted with Horace, seemed impossible. Besides, when Horace was out of sight his irritating ways were in part forgotten, and the sweet-tempered girl, reminding herself of her promise, of her duty, of his affection for her, could half cheat herself into believing it a sin to waver. Nothing but some sharp and sudden shock could bring about the crisis. At last it came.

It had been the custom from time immemorial in the village of P—— that the great and glorious Fourth should be celebrated by a grand picnic. Every body went, and every body liked to go. This year the day proved unusually favorable: warm, but not too warm; bright, but not too bright.

Dolly, of course, had Horace for escort. On the way out one of their many disputes arose, and its effect lasted through the morning, Dolly being pale and silent, and Horace specially savage and disputatious.

Every thing was done and attempted that befits a picnic. There was the usual speech-making and love-making, the children let off crackers in a distant retreat, lemons were squeezed and salad compounded, tea and coffee heated over a camp-fire, and pretty flirting groups gathered flowers to deck the meal. At last all was ready, and the party assembled about the white cloth spread temptingly on the green grass, flickering leaf shadows from above checkering its whiteness, and garlands and wreaths of wild-wood and blossoms ornamenting every dish.

Horace had not recovered his equanimity. He was short and crusty to every one, and more than once addressed Dolly in a way which created general surprise.

"I declare, Mr. De Wint!" said plain-spoken little Alice Lee, at last. "That's the third time you've said, 'Dolly, give me this,' 'Dolly, give me that,' without a 'please' or a 'thank you.' I wouldn't stand it if I were she."

"Dolly is almost my wife, you see, Miss Alice," replied Horace, calmly.

"But you are none the less polite to her on that account, I hope," retorted Alice.

"Excuse me. Politeness is not, in my opinion, exactly the proper relation between a man and his wife. A wife is part of a man's self. He cares for her as for himself—checking, guarding, attending to her best interests; but as for common civilities and attentions, the couple have got beyond those."

"Oh my!" said Alice, making large eyes of astonishment.

"I differ from you entirely, Mr. De Wint," remarked a married lady on the other side of the table. "Good manners and the most delicate attention to the forms of courtesy are, it seems to me, more important between married people than any others. There are inevitable rubs enough in life without adding to them little rudenesses, which in their very nature do more to alienate and separate friends than many larger things."

"Friends—yes; but husbands and wives—"

"Husbands and wives don't get on very well unless they are friends," went on the lady, with a smile. "And not friends only; they should be comrades, partners in the best sense of the word, and, above all, lovers—a relation which cements all these other relations and makes them possible."

"That is the high-romantic view," sneered Horace, who was in his ugliest vein. "In my opinion all this talk about comrades and partnership is most injurious to the real interests of society. How can husbands and wives stand to each other in such light, when the Bible plainly declares that the husband is to be the head of all things, the wife only the hand? A true wife will ask no will of her own. In love and reverence she accepts her husband's as law. He is the master, made so by God, and resistance to his wish should be regarded by her as absolute impiety."

"Your view would frighten most women out of matrimony."

"No true woman," went on Horace, who had fairly donned his moralizing cap. "A true woman prefers to be under authority. 'He for God only; she for God in him,' the poet tells us. And when I say to Dolly, Miss Lee, 'Do this,' without the prefix of 'please,' it is because she is to be a part of myself. We can dispense with such forms, and Dolly understands and accepts this view of the case."

With burning cheeks and drooping eyes Dolly had listened to this discussion, yet at this climax she raised them. Blazing with scornful wrath, she fixed them full on Horace, who, suddenly roused from his peroration, experienced an apprehensive thrill down his spine; and her voice, low and intense, smote the silence like a blow.

"I do not! And since you have chosen to make this public exhibition of your creed, Horace, I demand the right to make mine equally plain. Your assumption of authority I deny. I have a will, which God gave me to use and keep. I refuse to lay it down for any one to trample upon. My soul, my life, belong to me. I should defy a tyrant wherever I met him, most of all by my own fireside. To prevent any such extremity, here is your ring. I will never be your wife!"

So saying, she drew off the diamond and laid it before him. Then, suddenly paling, she dropped her face in her hands, and, springing up, darted from the table.

It were vain to tell the confusion worse confounded that ensued. Horace, speechless with mortification and alarm, sought in vain for his refractory bride. She was gone; and the picnic party made haste to follow, brimful of wonderment over this astounding scene.

The general verdict seemed to be, "Served him right." Young men quizzed Horace, old folks shook their heads, and the universal stir and amusement was so galling that he was glad to invent "business" elsewhere, and get away for a few months till the thing should be forgotten. Dolly had a hard fight at home; but the squire took her part on hearing a full version of the story, and she came off conqueror and at peace.

At peace, but not the same Dolly. There are some escapes which leave their scars for a lifetime. Bruised and bleeding, though saved, she flung herself desperately on the safe shore of her home life, and for long lay pale and exhausted on the strand, neither knowing nor caring what was beyond.

But youth has wonderful recuperation. Our Dolly's womanhood begins to bloom afresh, and there may yet be use for all those stacks of superfluous household gear over which Mrs. Elton daily sighs.

Horace has come back to his business, a sadder and a wiser man. The future will show how thoroughly he has learned that hard lesson which, expressed in the words of the immortal Mrs. Glass, was sent him last Valentine's-day by saucy Alice Lee—"First catch your turbot."

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

BESIDES suits proper, in which the wrapping is like the dress, talmas and mantelets with hoods are worn, made of white challie with white satin stripes, and trimmed invariably with white Angora fringe. The mantelets, the ends of which fall loosely in front, are always adjusted in the back, even for elderly ladies. Sometimes, but rarely, instead of the fringe trimming, a flounce is used of the same material (challie), edged with white silk braid, and set on with a heading. These wrappings, whatever may be their shape, are worn with all kinds of dresses—silk, light worsted fabrics, jaconet, and even white muslin. They are very convenient where the dress has no wrapping to match it.

A great many wrappings are made this season of black cashmere. There is nothing new about them as far as the material is concerned; their novelty consists in the black soutache embroidery, which covers the garment entirely, being put on not as formerly on the edges and seams, but over the whole fabric; like the jet beads that were worn thus a few seasons ago. This kind of trimming is strikingly effective, being both rich and plain; moreover, it gives consistency to the cashmere, which is always a little too soft.

Apart from these two styles of garments, which may be worn with dresses of all kinds, the wrapping is invariably like the dress.

As to dresses, the greater part are still made with double skirts. The over-skirt is draped elaborately, simply, or not at all, to suit the taste. The under-skirt is generally trimmed with a rather deep flounce, slightly gathered, and surmounted by one or three bias folds. The over-skirt is trimmed with three bias folds alone.

The following pretty dress may serve as a model of this style:

The suit is made of plain violet foulard. The under-skirt is trimmed with a flounce of the same material fourteen inches wide, veiled by another flounce of the same width, made of black silk gauze, and edged with very narrow black crimped silk fringe. The over-skirt is not draped, but hollowed out on the sides (under each arm) in such a manner as to be shorter under the arms than in the front and back, and is trimmed with three bias folds of black silk gauze, each of which is edged on the bottom with narrow black crimped silk fringe, like that on the flounce of the under-skirt. Casaque-waist, tight-fitting, with very long basques in the back, forming three large pleats; this waist is trimmed with two bias folds of black silk gauze, edged with fringe. Flowing sleeves, trimmed with a flounce of the material, covered by another of black silk gauze, like that on the skirt, surmounted by two bias folds. Round hat of black silk gauze, trimmed with a cluster of violet wistaria and a black feather. Scarf veil of violet gauze twisted round the hat, and fastened to the left shoulder with a knot of black ribbon.

This dress can be copied in any shade; it is extremely elegant in light silver gray silk, with flounces and folds of white silk gauze.

Besides flounces, the trimming most in vogue is composed of rolls set on in uneven numbers, from three to nine or eleven, in such a manner as entirely to cover the under-skirt. In general, even in the latter case, a narrow pleated ruche is set under the first roll (that on the lower edge). When the trimming consists of three rolls only, a ruche is set under both the upper and lower roll; but in this case the upper ruche is set on upright, in an inverse direction to the lower one. Even when the under-skirt is entirely covered with rolls the upper one has but three and two ruches, as I have just described.

For light dresses, both of wash goods and those that are made of thin fabrics that do not wash, the following method of draping is employed: a pretty colored ribbon, matching the dress in color, is fastened to the middle of the skirt in the back; another similar ribbon is set underneath the skirt, just below the first one; similar ribbons are arranged in the same manner under each arm; and the ribbons are tied together as high as may be desired, but always so as to loop the skirt more at the sides than in the back. It is an invariable canon of good taste, which should never be neglected if one wishes to be gracefully dressed, that garments of all kinds, whether under-skirts, over-skirts, or wrappings, should be, or seem to be, longer in the back than the front; and for this reason we hesitate to return to mantelets with front tabs longer than the back of the garment.

As to bonnets, they are no larger than they have been for several seasons; but a narrow brim is putting forth in front and a little cape behind; it is certain that both will grow; already we see timidly peeping forth under the narrow brim a little ruche of black or white tulle, according to the color of the bonnet, edged with narrow lace; and we can confidently predict a near-approaching day when the fronts of bonnets will encircle the face instead of leaving it absolutely bare. It is probable, however, that this reformation will not be wrought before winter, when reason, the temperature, and fashion will finally harmonize. Reason and the temperature both prescribe that the head as well as the body should be protected from the cold, but fashion decides differently; and hitherto fashion has prevailed over her rivals. But as fashion exists only on condition of perpetual transformation, she is about to become reasonable solely for the sake of change.

Many round hats are still made of crêpe de Chine, black or colored silk gauze, and black tulle and lace. Straw hats are generally trimmed with dark flowers and ribbons. The veils most in vogue are large and square; they are worn so as to cover the hat, with one point falling in front over the face, and the other over the chignon. The two points at the sides are crossed over that in the back and fastened with a jet pin. These large square veils are worn both with round hats and bonnets, and are made of dotted black tulle, edged with narrow, medium, or very wide lace, according to taste.

Lingerie seems inclined to depart from the simplicity which has prevailed therein of late. It is true that plain linen collars and cuffs are still seen, but only very early in the morning; as soon as one begins to dress at all for the day, more ornate ones are worn: for instance, the collar and cuffs are still of linen, but bordered with a strip of nansook, embroidered and scalloped, which is laid on flat and fastened at the corners. The old-fashioned English embroidery, with open-work designs, has also regained high favor; it is even used to trim light worsted fabrics, especially light gray delaine. This is worked on bands of white nansook three-quarters of an inch or an inch in width, and these bands are set on the edges and seams of the over-skirt and wrapping. They also often accompany a trimming composed of flounces made of the same material as the dress, in which case they are set on under the edge of the heading of the flounces, projecting therefrom the width of the embroidery. English embroidery is also much used for white percale dresses, and for little girls' and boys' dresses of all kinds.

Soutache is also re-appearing on all garments, but is chiefly used color upon color, thus producing an elegant and chaste effect.

Black silk is worn more than ever. The following costume will serve as a model:

Black silk dress with trained skirt. The front breadth is trimmed en tablier with a scalloped flounce of black silk, the scallops being underlaid with narrow white guipure. Above this flounce is set a ruche of the same silk, scalloped and also underlaid with guipure; and so on to the waist, from the bottom of the dress. A large scarf of black crêpe de Chine is gathered around the waist at the sides, and almost flat in front; this scarf is edged with white guipure, on which is set black fringe a little narrower than the guipure. The ends of the scarf are knotted behind near the bottom of the dress. At the back of the waist is a bouffant pouf or postilion, trimmed like the scarf, and made of the same material. Waist open, square in front, and trimmed with white guipure and black fringe. Flowing sleeves reaching to the elbow.

Many dresses are also made of silk, trimmed with cashmere of the same color, the cashmere being used for flounces and bias folds. The under-skirt of the suit is trimmed with a flounce of cashmere, and the over-skirt with three bias folds of the same cashmere bound with satin of the same color as the cashmere and silk used for the suit. This combination is extremely pretty in dark or light gray, brown or violet. Scarcely any other colors than these are worn, indeed, unless it may be écru, which is seen principally in linen and organdy.

Waists are still made generally with basques, thus abolishing the voluminous belts of wide ribbon. But these ribbons appear in another place; they serve to adorn the sides of the looped over-skirts. Large sashes are still worn with dresses of jaconet, muslin, and all fabrics, in general, which are too thin to admit of basque-waists.

Many suits are also composed of two or even three shades. The following is an example: Under-skirt of dark gray mohair, trimmed on the bottom with flat pleating twenty-four inches wide. Over-skirt of a lighter shade of mohair, falling straight, without being draped, and cut on the bottom in sharp points, edged with a bias fold of silk of the same shade as the under-skirt. Plain high waist of the same color and material as the under-skirt, furnished with basque-skirts plain on the hips, and cut on the bottom in sharp points, which are edged with silk like those of the over-skirt. The waist is trimmed with bias folds of the same silk, which simulate a corselet, the upper edge of which describes sharp points like those on the basque. Half-flowing sleeves, with epaulets and cuffs cut in sharp points. A little paletot is worn with this suit, the bottom of which is cut in points, and edged with silk like those of the dress.

As usual, many foulard dresses are worn this summer. Large patterns are appearing again, and the styles call to mind the time of Louis XVI. — demi-trained dresses, square-necked waists with white muslin fichus pleated inside, sleeves coming just below the elbow, and the whole trimmed with ruches à la vieille. The dress has a flounce which stops on each side of the front breadth to form a tablier; this is outlined by a rather wide ruche, which surmounts the flounce all around the skirt, and extends up each side of the front breadth to the waist, which is pointed in front, and terminates in a basque at the back.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

MORE THAN HONEST.

THE character of Irishmen is too much judged of from those details which most commonly meet the public eye, which, for the greater part, are pictures of the worst part of the Irish population, and, when not portraying crime and violence, represent the Irishman as a ridiculous, improvident, blundering booby.

No doubt there are too many criminals and a sufficiency of folly among them; but I am sure there is, notwithstanding many adverse circumstances, a very considerable proportion of high and holy feeling and of self-denying, active virtue, as well as of thrifty industry. And if Paddy is often comical, he is quite as frequently romantically chivalrous in the degree which comes within his reach; and if this can only show itself in small matters in a small way of life, yet these small matters, like straws in the air, show which way the wind blows, perhaps more surely than greater things which imply more preparation and premeditation.

Before the famine of 1846 and the following years there was already a considerable flow of emigration to America; but few well-to-do people went then. It was chiefly young men and women, sons and daughters of poor families. It often happened that means were raised with difficulty enough for one of a numerous family to pay a passage to America, and on such and similar pleas I was often asked to lend the price of a passage, to be repaid by the emigrant.

I often lent the required sum—then only three or four pounds. They sailed in small sailing ships from every little port, and with very inadequate arrangements for their welfare.

Contrary to what might perhaps be expected, these poor people generally sent me back the sum lent within a year, and the exceptions, I am ashamed to say, were the very persons of whom I had felt most secure—very decidedly of a class looked on as more respectable; while the poorer and less esteemed absolutely never failed me—and they were many. They were also, for the most part, persons over whose families or relations here I had no power, as they were tenants or cotters on other people's estates.

Among these was a very large and a very poor family. The eldest daughter was sent for by a relative who had emigrated some time before, and who paid her passage to New York. She dreaded going alone, and succeeded in getting a loan from me sufficient to pay a brother's passage, which was duly repaid within the year.

The next year the same family, hearing of situations for two more of their number, borrowed the greater part of two passages, which again was repaid within the promised time.

Not very long after this another brother borrowed the price of his passage.

But a year passed and no return came. And a second year likewise.

In the course of the third year his brother came to me and brought the repayment (I think three pounds ten shillings).

I asked him if his brother had sent any thing to help his old mother, or to assist another to go to New York. He said he had not—not a farthing.

"Where is your brother now?" I asked.

"I don't know where he is, it's so long since he wrote."

And saying this, he suddenly stopped and colored.

"Why," said I, "how long is it since you heard from him?"

He stammered and hesitated, and said he did not know.

"Is it more than a month?"

"Oh yes."

"Is it three?"

No answer.

"Is it six?"

No answer.

"Is it a year?"

"No, Sir, it's not a year."

"Come now, tell me, how long is it."

"Well, Sir, I got the letter in November."

"And this is September. How is this? Why did you not bring me the money as soon as you got it?"

He colored more, and said, confusedly, "I couldn't come with it any sooner."

"Nonsense," said I. "You could not come four or five miles? Now I see what it is; you have used the money your brother sent to repay his debt, and you have traded upon it some way. As it happens, you have succeeded; but if you had lost your speculation, how would it have been? Your brother would have been supposed by me to have broken faith and neglected to fulfill his promise. Is it not so?"

"No, Sir; I never would let my brother's promise to you be broken."

"Then how is it? Why were you so long?"

"I couldn't help it."

The poor fellow was greatly confused. But his flushed cheek changed to pale when I said:

"Now you did not intend, I see, to be quite dishonest, as you have at last brought me the money; but you have not spoken the truth. Have you your brother's letter? Was that it out of which you took the bank-notes?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Let me see it."

"I can't let you see it."

"Why not, if all you say is true?"

"No, I can't—I can't show it."

"Well, then, I must think it would make you appear more of a rogue than I thought you. You may go; but you are the first of your family that has given me reason to suspect your truth or honesty."

He turned and went slowly, and, as I thought, sullenly. I stood for a minute and watched him. He stopped, took the letter out of his pocket, opened it, looked at it; then looking round and seeing me still there, he returned slowly, and coming up to me, he thrust the letter into my hand, saying:

"There! you can read it. I would never have let you see it only I know he couldn't bear that you'd think me a rogue or a liar. He'd rather you would know all than that."

The letter was to this purpose:

"DEAR BROTHER,—I suppose you all thought me dead when you were so long without hearing of me. I was very near it. I met with an accident and broke some of my bones before I was three months in America, and I have been in the hospital ever since. They say I will be months yet before I am fit to work. I was hoping to send you some help before this time, but you see how it is. The greatest burden on my mind is the money Mr. Hamilton lent me to pay my passage. It ought to have been paid long ago. So, brother, as soon as you have set the potatoes on mother's little place, go somewhere where money is to be earned, and get as much as will pay the gentleman, and take it to him, but don't let him know a word but that I sent it, as I made a promise to do."

Was it not grand—the confidence of the injured brother in his brother at home, and the worthiness of that confidence in the other? This, I think, actually throws the high sense of honesty into the shade, bright as that is also.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

AMONG a large class of sensible persons the once prevalent feeling has passed away that either fashion or comfort demands a prolonged absence from the city during the summer. It is not disreputable to remain in the metropolis in July and August; although we have known of those who, being unable to leave the city, have attempted to give a deserted appearance to their houses, entering them stealthily after nightfall, or hiding themselves carefully within during the day, to escape the disgrace of being "in town." Individuals, however, have learned by experience that when three-fourths of the family have fled countryward the house is cooler, the rooms larger, and many home comforts peculiarly available. It is certainly true that for the majority of adults the comfortable home rooms, the abundance of Croton, good gas-light, and plenty of ice and ice-cream are to be preferred during the "heated term" to the stifled, ill-furnished rooms frequently occupied at fashionably crowded summer resorts. Children should have country air and plain country living whenever it can be provided for them; and these are useful to every body. But a reform is demanded; and the foolish fashion of whole families migrating to stylish watering-places, only to be packed closely in little rooms, whence they issue periodically, dressed artistically for exhibition, should be abandoned by sensible persons. Let those who can, and who choose, seek changes of air and scene in the summer, but let them go where they can find genuine comfort. And those who are kept by business or pleasure in the city will doubtless obtain rest at home, and fresh air in our fine parks to an extent which is seldom understood.

The Polaris, which is expected to convey Captain Hall and his companions to the region of perpetual ice, is heated by steam. One of the boilers is arranged to use whale-oil for fuel. The officers' cabin is neatly fitted up. The berths are hung with lilac rep curtains. A parlor organ, black-walnut table, and chairs are the principal furniture. The captain's cabin is in the centre of the ship. When in winter-quarters the whole upper deck will be inclosed, and the entire ship fitted up as a fortress against the cold.

There is nothing like having at hand in sickness just the right kind of medicine. A lady of Bloomington, Illinois, attributes her recovery from severe illness to the use of a box of beads, taken by mistake for pills.

A certain American college, having voted through its trustees to admit women to its educational privileges, has become alarmed on learning that the girls in a well-known institution consume daily two barrels of flour, five barrels of potatoes, one barrel of coffee, one barrel of soup, 260 pounds of poultry, 180 pounds of roast beef, 200 quarts of milk, 160 quarts of ice-cream, and 800 eggs.

Only one American vessel passed through the Suez Canal in 1870. The whole number that went through was 461, of which 319 were British and 75 French.

Thérèse Gambardella, a girl of thirteen, has been discovered in Vienna, and is instanced as a splendid illustration of the Darwinian theory. She is enveloped in a hairy covering, even her forehead being overgrown with fur-like hair. Her head resembles that of a monkey, so also her jaws and teeth, and she is as restless and agile as one of the amusing specimens found in museums. Such is the report.

Not a single volume was saved from the Louvre Library—so say correspondents from Paris. But all the other great libraries of Paris, with the exception of that of the Hôtel de Ville, have been preserved. It is somewhat singular that both of the libraries which have been destroyed contained many books donated by Americans. Some years ago Mr. Mottley, an American who had long resided in Paris, left to the emperor the whole of his valuable collection of books. These were placed in the Louvre Library, which was not open to the public, and there they remained almost totally unknown, even by Mr. Mottley's own countrymen. A large recess at one end of the library contained Mr. Mottley's collection, in the centre of which was a handsome marble bust of the donor. Besides Mr. Mottley's books the Louvre Library had recently acquired a very complete collection of editions of Petrarch, and works relating to the life of that poet. There was also a collection of paintings on vellum by Redouté, one of the most celebrated painters of flowers that France has ever produced. The library of the Hôtel de Ville contained about 6000 volumes which had been presented by different States of the Union. It was also rich in works relating to the history of Paris and the cities of France in general. Many important manuscripts had, under the empire, been removed from the Hôtel de Ville and placed in other libraries, where they are now in safety.

Vitality will sometimes remain in a bit of wood an incredibly long time. Not long ago a Boston lady, having occasion to use a support for an ivy plant which she was raising in a pot, took an old grape-vine cane and thrust it into the earth. Some time afterward, wishing to remove the ivy, she pulled up the old cane, and found to her astonishment that it had sent out shoots and was making vigorous efforts to root itself by the side of the ivy. This bit of grape-vine had been used for a long time as a cane, and for years which no one in the family could number had been lying about the house.

The Agricultural Society of Breslau, Germany, offers a prize of $700 in gold for the steam-plow apparatus which will work best at trials to be made on the farms near that city this summer.

The Atlantic cable of 1866 has now been so repaired that it is in a better condition than it ever was before. Ninety miles of heavy new cable has been laid, from the point where the splice was made with the submerged portion direct to Newfoundland, across the most rocky and dangerous section of the whole distance from Heart's Content to Valentia. The cable of 1865 has also been repaired, so that now all three of the submarine telegraph lines are in working order.

In the first annual report of the Fire Department of the city of New York, horses receive an honorable mention. Over one hundred and eighty belong to the Department, and these, being systematically groomed, fed, and exercised, have proved equal to the hardships of the service, and have also retained their good looks. Horses placed in the Department soon become familiar with their duties, recognizing the alarm signal, entering into the excitement of rapid preparation, and taking their places, when harnessed, at the pole or in the shafts, with but little assistance, within from twelve to twenty seconds after the signal sound.

An old-fashioned pound—at least we infer it to be of the ancient style—has been re-established in Washington. At the close of the first day of his duties the new pound-master had collected cattle enough to stock a farm.

We are informed by a reliable exchange that a woman has been lecturing in a Minnesota village on the evil consequences of the use of "corsets, tobacco, and whisky," with such effect that every man in town has left off wearing corsets, and most of the women have quit chewing tobacco and drinking whisky.

Feodor Kanika is a Russian pretender who professes to be in direct communication with the Deity, and to have been appointed to prepare an earthly "paradise" for his followers. No poor people, however, can gain admittance to this paradise, for it is necessary to pay five thousand rubles before one becomes a member of the sect, after which various premiums are demanded as a condition of promotion. The fund thus accumulated is, according to the statutes of the society, to be employed in the conquest of Constantinople, which the founder predicts will take place on the emperor's birthday (the 29th of April) in the year 1873.

The wife and children of that wild adventurer, Dombrowski, are in London. It is related of the general that when intercession was made to him for Mlle. Darboy, the archbishop's sister, he promised to do all that he could for her, but that he was surrounded by a set of ruthless ruffians who would not listen to reason. "I know that I must die," he said, "for these men will not follow me, though I have taught them to fear me. I care not, for my wife and children are in safety in London." When he had obtained the order for the liberation of Mlle. Darboy he said to the person to whom he delivered it, "Get the lady away directly, for if these savages catch her they will devour her with their other prey."

There is good promise of an immense peach crop this year. The strawberry season was never so long continued, and the markets are filled with various kinds of ripe fruit. The year has thus far been remarkable in respect to fruit.

At the recent commencement of Vassar College the Baccalaureate degree was conferred upon twenty-one young ladies. It was also stated by President Raymond that the members of the alumni were anxious that the degree of Master should be bestowed on deserving past-graduates, and at a late meeting of the Board having the matter under consideration the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That graduates who shall have pursued a two years' course of study, submitted to and approved by the faculty, shall have passed satisfactorily a thorough examination in the same, and shall have presented a commendable dissertation on some literary or scientific subject, shall be entitled to the Master's degree.

Resolved, That candidates for the Master's degree present themselves for examination on the Wednesday preceding commencement, and send in their dissertation three weeks before commencement.

Resolved, That graduates of Vassar College who pursue studies as resident graduates, in preparing themselves for the examination presented to candidates for the degree of Artium Magister, be exempt from the payment of the regular fee for tuition.

"Mary's Little Lamb" must be "tired out." Besides, it has been very ill used; and if it continues to be tormented by so many cruel lines we hope the "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals" will interfere. The poor little thing should have a chance to rest.

THE OGRE COURTING.

IN days when ogres were still the terror of certain districts there was one who had long kept a whole neighborhood in fear without any one daring to dispute his tyranny.

By thefts and exactions, by heavy ransoms from merchants too old and tough to be eaten, in one way and another, the ogre had become very rich; and although those who knew could tell of huge cellars full of gold and jewels, and yards and barns groaning with the weight of stolen goods, the richer he grew the more anxious and covetous he became. Moreover, day by day he added to his stores; for though (like most ogres) he was as stupid as he was strong, no one had ever been found, by force or fraud, to get the better of him.

What he took from the people was not their heaviest grievance. Even to be killed and eaten by him was not the chance they thought of most. A man can die but once; and if he is a sailor a shark may eat him, which is not so much better than being devoured by an ogre. No, that was not the worst. The worst was this—he would keep getting married. And as he liked little wives, all the short women lived in fear and dread. And as his wives always died very soon, he was constantly courting fresh ones.

Some said he ate his wives; some said he tormented, and others that he only worked them to death. Every body knew it was not a desirable match, and yet there was not a father who dare refuse his daughter if she were asked for. The ogre only cared for two things in a woman—he liked her to be little, and a good housewife.

Now it was when the ogre had just lost his twenty-fourth wife (within the memory of man) that these two qualities were eminently united in the person of the smallest and most notable woman of the district, the daughter of a certain poor farmer. He was so poor that he could not afford properly to dower his daughter, who had in consequence remained single beyond her first youth. Every body felt sure that Managing Molly must now be married to the ogre. The tall girls stretched themselves till they looked like May-poles, and said, "Poor thing!" The slatterns gossiped from house to house, the heels of their shoes clacking as they went, and cried that this was what came of being too thrifty.

And sure enough, in due time, the giant widower came to the farmer as he was in the field looking over his crops, and proposed for Molly there and then. The farmer was so much put out that he did not know what he said in reply, either when he was saying it or afterward, when his friends asked about it. But he remembered that the ogre had invited himself to sup at the farm that day week.

Managing Molly did not distress herself at the news.

"Do what I bid you, and say as I say," said she to her father; "and if the ogre does not change his mind, at any rate you shall not come empty-handed out of the business."

By his daughter's desire the farmer now procured her a large number of hares, and a barrel of white wine, which expenses completely emptied his slender stocking. Molly herself went round to all her neighbors, and borrowed a lot of new household linen, with which she filled the kitchen shelves.

On the day of the ogre's visit she made a delicious and savory stew with the hares in the biggest pickling tub, and the wine-barrel was set on a bench near the table.

When the ogre came Molly served up the stew, and the ogre sat down to sup, his head just touching the kitchen rafters. The stew was perfect, and there was plenty of it. For what Molly and her father ate was hardly to be counted in the tubful. The ogre was very much pleased, and said, politely:

"I'm afraid, my dear, that you have been put to great trouble and expense on my account. I have a large appetite, and like to sup well."

"Don't mention it, Sir," said Molly. "The fewer rats the more corn. How do you cook them?"

"Not one of all the extravagant hussies I have had as wives ever cooked them at all," said the ogre; and he thought to himself, "Such a stew out of rats! What frugality! What a housewife!—I suppose you spin?" he inquired.

Molly held out her hand, in which was a linen towel made from the last month's spinnings, and said, "All that came off my wheel last month."

AT THE LETTER-BOX.

But as her hand was toward the shelves, the ogre thought that all the linen he saw there was from thread of her spinning; and his admiration grew every moment.

When he broached the wine he was no less pleased, for it was of the best.

"This, at any rate, must have cost you a great deal, neighbor," said he, drinking the farmer's health as Molly left the room.

"I don't know that rotten apples could be better used," said the farmer; "but I leave all that to Molly. Do you brew at home?"

"We give our rotten apples to the pigs," growled the ogre. "But things will be better ordered when she is my wife."

The ogre was now in great haste to conclude the match, and asked what dowry the farmer would give his daughter.

"I should never dream of giving a dowry with Molly," said the farmer, boldly. "Whoever gets her gets dowry enough. On the contrary, I shall expect a good round sum from the man who deprives me of her. Our wealthiest farmer is just widowed, and therefore sure to be in a hurry for marriage. He has an eye to the main chance, and would not grudge to pay well for such a wife, I'll warrant."

"I am no churl myself," said the ogre, who was anxious to secure his thrifty bride at any price; and he named a large sum of money, thinking, "We shall live on rats henceforward, and the beef and mutton will soon cover the dowry."

"Double that, and we'll see," said the farmer, stoutly. But the ogre became angry, and cried:

"What are you thinking of, man? Who is to hinder my carrying your lass off without 'with your leave' or 'by your leave,' dowry or none?"

"How little you know her!" said the farmer. "She is so firm that she would be cut to pieces sooner than give you any benefit of her thrift unless you dealt fairly in the matter."

"Well, well," said the ogre, "let us meet each other." And he named a sum larger than he at first proposed and less than the farmer had asked. This the farmer agreed to, as it was enough to make him prosperous for life.

"Bring it in a sack to-morrow morning," said he to the ogre, "and then you can speak to Molly; she's gone to bed now."

The next morning, accordingly, the ogre appeared, carrying the dowry in a sack, and Molly came to meet him.

"There are two things," said she, "I would ask of any lover of mine—a new farm-house, built as I should direct, with a view to economy, and a feather-bed of fresh goose feathers, filled when the old woman plucks her geese. If I don't sleep well I can not work well."

"That is better than asking for finery," thought the ogre; "and, after all, the house will be my own." So to save the expense of labor he built it himself, and worked hard day after day, under Molly's orders, till winter came. Then it was finished.

"Now for the feather-bed," said Molly. "I'll make the ticking, and when the old woman plucks her geese I'll let you know."

When it snows they say the old woman up yonder is plucking her geese, and so at the first snow-storm Molly sent for the ogre.

"Now you see the feathers falling," said she, "so fill the bed."

"How am I to catch them?" cried the ogre.

"Stupid! don't you see them lying there in a heap?" cried Molly. "Get a shovel, and set to work."

The ogre accordingly carried in shovelfuls of snow to the bed, but as it melted as fast as he put it in his labor never seemed done. Toward night the room got so cold that the snow would not melt, and now the bed was soon filled.

Molly hastily covered it with sheets and blankets, and said:

"Pray, rest here to-night, and tell me if the bed is not comfort itself. To-morrow we will be married."

So the tired ogre lay down on the bed he had filled, but, do what he would, he could not get warm.

"The sheets must be damp," said he; and in the morning he woke with such horrible pains in his bones that he could hardly move, and half the bed had melted away. "It's no use," he groaned; "she's a very managing woman, but to sleep on such a bed would be the death of me." And he went off home as quickly as he could, before Managing Molly could call upon him to be married; for she was so managing that he was more than half afraid of her already.

When Molly found that he had gone she sent the farmer after him.

"What does he want?" cried the ogre when they told him the farmer was at the door.

"He says the bride is waiting for you," was the reply.

"Tell him I'm too ill to be married," said the ogre.

But the messenger soon returned.

"He says she wants to know what you will give her to make up for the disappointment."

"She's got the dowry, and the farm, and the feather-bed," groaned the ogre. "What more does she want?"

But again the messenger returned.

"She says you've pressed the feather-bed flat, and she wants some more goose feathers."

"There are geese enough in the yard," yelled the ogre. "Let him drive them home; and if he has another word to say, put him down to roast."

The farmer, who overheard this order, lost no time in taking his leave, and as he passed through the yard he drove home as fine a flock of geese as you will see on a common.

It is said that the ogre never recovered from the effects of sleeping on the old woman's feathers, and was less powerful than before.

As for Managing Molly, being now well dowered, she had no lack of offers of marriage, and was soon mated to her mind.

REMOVAL OF MOULD FROM LINEN.—Spots of mould on fabrics can, it is said, be removed from cotton or linen by first rubbing them over with butter, and afterward applying potassa moistened with a little water, and then rubbing the spot, when all traces of it will disappear.

Knitted and Reed Salad Rinser.

THIS salad rinser is knitted, always going forward, with coarse gray thread and coarse white knitting cotton, on five wooden knitting-needles, and is furnished with hoops of Spanish reeds. At the upper edge of the salad rinser is a handle covered with thread and knitting cotton. Begin the knitted work at the middle of the bottom, and with single gray thread make a foundation of 16 st. (stitches), close these in a ring, and then work with gray double thread two rounds, all knit plain, leaving the number of stitches unchanged. Now lay on the white cotton, and with this work the 3d and 4th rounds.—All purled. 5th round.—Always alternately purl two together, throw the thread over twice. 6th round.—All purled; work four stitches on every two threads thrown over—one of these stitches knit plain, one purled, one knit plain, and one purled. 7th round.—All purled without widening. 8th–14th rounds.—With gray thread, all knit plain. 15th–19th rounds.—With white cotton, like the 3d–7th rounds, but in the 18th round work, instead of 4 st., only 3 st. on every two threads thrown over; one of these st. knit plain, 1 st. purled, and 1 st. knit plain. 20th–26th rounds.—With gray thread, all knit plain. 27th–31st rounds.—With white cotton, like the 3d–7th rounds, but in the 29th round throw the thread over once only, instead of twice; in the 30th round work only one stitch on each thread thrown over, so that the number of stitches is unchanged. 32d–38th rounds.—With gray thread, all knit plain. Now again lay on the white cotton, and work the 39th–41st rounds all purled, the 42d round as follows: * Purl two together, purl two together, throw the thread over twice, and repeat from . 43d round.—All purled; on every two threads thrown over work 1 st. knit plain, 1 st. purled. 44th round.— Purl 2 st. together, throw the thread over twice, purl 2 st. together, and repeat from *. 45th round.—Like the 43d round. 46th and 47th rounds.—Like the 42d and 43d rounds; but in the 47th round, instead of working 2 st. only on every two threads thrown over, work 3 st.: 1 st. plain, 1 st. purled, and 1 st. plain. 48th round.—All purled. 49th–55th rounds.—With gray thread, all knit plain. 56th–60th rounds.—With white cotton, like the 27th–31st rounds. 61st–67th rounds.—With gray thread, all knit plain. 68th–77th rounds.—With white cotton, like the 39th–48th rounds. 78th–84th rounds.—With gray thread, all knit plain. 85th–89th rounds.—With white cotton, like the 27th–31st rounds; then cast off. Work a row of scallops on the upper edge of the salad rinser with gray cord. Then pass a Spanish reed thirty-seven inches and one-fifth long through the holes of the 29th round; slope off the ends of this reed, and tie them over each other to a length of two inches and four-fifths, so that the reed is closed in a ring. A reed forty-six inches long, closed in a similar manner, is passed through the holes of the 58th round; and a reed thirty-seven inches and one-fifth long through the holes of the 87th round. Furnish the upper edge of the salad rinser with a handle, as shown by the illustration; this handle consists of two pieces of Spanish reeds twenty inches long each, which are joined by covering them with gray thread and white cotton, as shown by the illustration. The handle is fastened to the salad rinser by means of gray thread.

NATIONAL CHARACTERISTICS.

NOTHING is easier, if we are not very particular about the accuracy of our judgment, than to judge; and this holds good with respect to nations no less than to individuals. There is a tempting facility in providing one's self, so to speak, with a set of little mental pigeon-holes, in which we can stow away, neatly ticketed, our opinions concerning the several branches of the great human family. We can pull out at pleasure the puppet that represents, say, a Russian, and make him dance in most approved Muscovite fashion. There can be no mistake; for is he not a Russian, and have we not had him in our catalogue, duly classed and numbered, for many a day? So with the French. We know all about the French. A Frenchman, as every body is aware, is a being light of heart and supple of spine, a sort of human butterfly, gay, polite, and, I am afraid, frivolous, all bows and grins and good-humor. An Englishman, ah! he comes out of quite another sized pigeon-hole, and capers to a different and less lively tune. He is a grotesque and eccentric personage, who invariably realizes enormous fortunes by exporting little penknives, who drinks raw rum, suffers from spleen, and has red whiskers of fabulous proportions. His wife and daughters still, in defiance of the tyranny of fashion, wear green veils and preposterous bonnets of Dunstable straw, and have front teeth of alarming length and prominence.

The truth, often unwelcome, is that a clear and sharp distinction between the qualities of different nations is, from its nature, hopeless. We can not draw a hard and fast line that shall rigidly separate, like a well-defined frontier, the characteristics of one group of nations from those of another. Black men and white, red men and brown, have so much in common that the points of resemblance very much outnumber those of contrast. Not only were there heroes before Agamemnon, but in far-away parts of the earth, and among races reputed barbarous, no doubt there existed in Homer's days of eld as much valor, wisdom, and merciful self-restraint as did honor to the bravest and the wisest in that memorable leaguer before Troy. Still we are not all alike, not stamped with the wearisome uniformity of so many newly minted shillings. Men and women are really as various as the coins in some numismatist's collection, where in the same drawers lie the antique doubloon, the "broad piece," so many pieces of which buccaneering Drake brought home to Plymouth, and the glossy napoleon, where the Spanish gold ounce, or the massive mohur of Mogul coinage, jostles the oblong gold itzebues of Japan, or the queer white platinum eagles, worth ever so many rubles apiece, which bear the stamp of the Czar Nicholas. There are subtile distinctions worth remembering between the inhabitants of different provinces. There are more salient features in the national character of those whom alien speech and creed, whom seas and mountains, keep asunder.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

LUTHERANNA.—As you have been wearing deep mourning for a year, you can wear a white crape, or an organdy dress trimmed with many flat pleatings, at the wedding of your friend. Black tulle over silk is worn for evening dress by ladies who object to white toilettes.

MRS. M. S. D.—We do not know where you can obtain the shadow pictures like the cutting sent us.—The Apron-Polonaise pattern sent you has the effect of a French waist with an over-skirt.

MRS. G.—It is not absolutely necessary to flounce your grenadine. It will be very pretty made as you suggest.

B. R.—You did not inclose the samples about which you ask information.—Crumb-cloths should be taken up after every meal, though many persons do not remove them so often.—Any florist will advise you about the flowers for your bay-window.—Linen casaques may be made by the Apron-Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., or by the polonaise in No. 44, Vol. III. They will be much used this summer, and are very stylish when worn over silk.

MRS. H. M'F.—Trim your brown poplin with ruffles of the same headed by bias silk bands of darker brown. Hints for making and trimming the cut paper pattern suits are always given in the Bazar which they accompany. Let your child's dress come half-way between the knee and ankle. Use dark brown worsted braid for trimming child's buff linen. The low Gabrielle and sacque will be suitable, also the little dress illustrated in Bazar No. 25, Vol. IV. Read New York Fashions accompanying that number for hints about children's clothes.

F. E. N.—It will take eight or nine yards of linen three-fourths of a yard wide to make a linen duster by the Water-proof Cloak Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV.

F. A. W.—Straw gypsy bonnets, English turbans, and broad-brimmed flats are the fashionable head coverings. Read New York Fashions in Bazar No. 24, Vol. IV., for further information.—"General Average" was published in Harper's Monthly for June. We can not republish it in the Bazar.

MRS. W. E. H.—The Short-Sacque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV., will suit you.—A lady's own delicacy is the only guide we know of for such matters.

MARCIA.—It is useless to complain of inattention to letters addressed to this column. We reply at our earliest convenience, and can not do better.—A yard and a quarter of cashmere will make your hood. For your suit use Traveling Dress Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 21, Vol. IV. For your organdy basque and train you will require from six to eight yards, according to the amount of side-pleated ruffles you put on it.

MAGUS.—Get Banting's book on corpulency, and follow his method for reducing flesh.

MRS. C. A. M'F.—We know nothing of the fluting sticks you mention. The most stylish ruffling is kilting, or flat pleats all ironed one way.

A. W. S.—Make your black poplin dress a demi-train and basque trimmed with ruffles of the same. For the green poplin suit use cut paper pattern of the Postilion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV.

B. AND P.—The white checked sample should be made a short suit, with over-skirt and sacque, like that in the Short-Sacque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Trim with plain muslin pleated ruffles.

INTERROGATORY.—The pattern of Postilion-Basque Suit sent you is appropriate for your blue striped silk. Trim with ruffles edged with narrow blue and white fringe. The same basque will answer for day and evening. Peasant basques, like that in Peasant Basque Walking Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 34, Vol. III., are much worn. A New York modiste would use white silk of as good quality as your striped sample for lining the basque, but white twilled muslin or linen will answer. The gray pongee will look well made by Traveling Dress Suit pattern in Bazar No. 21, Vol. IV.

H. C.—Your gray sample is not Irish poplin, but very poor Japanese poplin. Trim it inexpensively with bands of the same, piped with black silk, and take care to keep it dry, as water ruins it. A basque and demi-trained house dress would be the best plan for making it. The black stuff will make a pretty apron-polonaise, trimmed with narrow silk ruches.

L. L. W.—Your sample is not the grenadine now fashionable for dresses, but there is no better way of making it than over a tight silk lining. The silk sample is called Armure silk.

MRS. W. L.—Giaour is pronounced as if spelled djiur.—If you choose you can gather the back breadths of the burnouse over-skirt instead of letting them hang, though the last plan is very stylish. This will not require any other change in the over-skirt. A sacque of piqué with embroidered ruffle will be pretty for your little girl of three years.

A PERPLEXED MOTHER.—A gored or bias skirt, or a straight skirt of three widths, plain in front, the rest in kilt or box pleats extending all the length of the skirt, is worn by boys of three, with linen shirt waists, in the house, and jackets to match the skirts for the street. We give cut paper patterns of children's clothing. White or buff corded piqué and linen are the fashionable materials for such suits.

MRS. C. M. G.—Your ideas about the darts in the postilion and the skirt breadths are all right.

MRS. A. M.—Your hand should not rest on the table when eating.—Your white alpaca suit will be pretty for church any where but in a city.

SUSAN.—Make your organdy with two skirts, ruffled, and a basque, or else a French waist—that is, a full blouse, or infant's waist, gathered to a belt.

DOLLIE.—Read answer above to "Susan." Another French waist has two darts in front, while the back is broad, and held by a gathering string.

MISS D. L. S. failed to send her bust measure; consequently we can not send pattern.

MRS. H. J. H.—Your pretty piqué will look best made by the Short-Sacque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV., and trimmed with bias bands of the same, piped with purple percale, or else pleatings of the piqué or of white muslin.

IMPORTANT FOR LADIES TO KNOW.

THEY can clean all kinds of Clothing, either silk, woolen, or cotton, Kid Gloves, Point Lace, etc., perfectly by using Fragrant Sapoliene. It removes Paint, Grease, Tar, etc., instantly, without the least injury to the finest fabric, is as clear as water, no trouble to use, dries instantly, and leaves a rich perfume. Sold by all Druggists. —[Com.]

THOSE WHO SUFFER from nervous irritations, itching uneasiness, and the discomfort that follows from an enfeebled and disordered state of the system, should take AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, and cleanse the blood. PURIFY THE BLOOD AND BEAUTIFY THE COMPLEXION BY USING
HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and
HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

CRYSTAL PALACE PHARMACY, 594 Broadway, New York;
PALACE PHARMACY, Gilsey House, Broadway and 29th St., New York;
TEMPLE OF PHARMACY, Continental Hotel, Philadelphia; and 104 South Tenth St., Philadelphia.

Prescriptions accurately compounded. French, German, and Spanish spoken. Stores open all night.
P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

DIAMOND D MOHAIRS

It is true and not strange that the prominent brands of alpacas which have appeared of late years have lost all their temporary popularity. The reasons are evident: first, the importers relied on a name or ticket to sell the goods, without regard to intrinsic worth; and, second, the various brands (whose name is legion) were wanting in all the qualities that go to make the Diamond (D) Mohair, the only alpaca of which any lady should make a dress. The Diamond (D) Mohairs are made of pure lustre yarns, and always retain their brilliancy and color. They do not crease or wrinkle as common alpacas do, and are to be had of the leading retailers in the United States.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

WEIGH THESE WORDS.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

All who suffer from indigestion, bilious disorders, nervous affections, constipation, or undue relaxation of the bowels, are invited to consider these facts, viz.: That the curative operation of

in all such cases, is proven by overwhelming testimony; that profound medical practitioners indorse it; that analytical chemists pronounce it identical with the water of the great German Spa; that it purifies and regulates the system without weakening it; that it is delightfully refreshing, and that every element it contains is either corrective, alterative, or invigorating. Weigh these words.

FACETIÆ.

WHY is the tenth of a dime like the Apostle John?—Because it is one cent.

A TOAST.—Here's to the three ages—eng-age, marri-age, and dot-age.

An impatient Irishman called to his wife: "Come, come, isn't breakfast ready? I've had none since yesterday, and to-morrow will be the third day." This is equal to the call of the stirring housewife, who aroused her maid at four o'clock with "Come, Mary, get up! Here 'tis Monday morning, to-morrow is Tuesday, the next day's Wednesday—half the week gone, and nothing done yet!"

THE MO(U)RNING AIR—The "Dead March."

Some young men are a little partial to blue-eyed maidens. Others like dark-eyed lasses. But the mon*eyed* girls have the most admirers.

VOICES OF THE NIGHT—Babies.

"It is a curious fact," says an entomologist, "that it is the female mosquito that torments us." A bachelor would say that it is not at all curious.

NOT A MISS—A pretty widow.

MARRIAGE NOT AT ALL À LA MODE.

This Picture represents the Happy Husband taking out his own Baby in his own Perambulator, to the Admiration of all the Ladies of the Neighborhood, married and otherwise. We trust that the Example may be followed more extensively than it has been.

A WELCOME.

I hail the spring
With gladsome shout;
For each green thing
Begins to sprout.
The frost is past,
The skies are clear;
We feel at last
That spring is here.

The winter through
I've hankered much
For taturs new,
Green pease, and such.
In vain! Because
Just then, you know,
By Nature's laws,
They do not grow.

I don't much care,
The truth to tell,
For cowslip fair
And snow-drop bell;
For pale primrose
Or bluebell sweet—
For things like those
One can not eat.

I'll just point out
What pleases us—
The Brussels sprout, Asparagus,
The early pea,
The taturs new.
Give these to me—
The flowers take you.

SLEIGHT OF HAND—Refusing an "offer."

HALF A SOVEREIGN—The Prince of Wales.

CARGO EXTRAORDINARY.—A vessel arrived at New York on the 11th ult. having on board a hundred cases of cigars, and two cases of measles.

AT THE ACADEMY.

YOUNG LADY (indignant). "Now I told you, Papa, this wasn't the Fashionable Hour. We'll have Nothing but these Horrid Pictures to look at until the People come!"

MALAPROPOS.

"Please, Sir, you're afther forgittin' your Umberil!"

ANOTHER SMART FOUR-YEAR-OLD.

Neighbor S—— is a blacksmith; he has a little four-year-old. S—— was at work at his forge the other day making harrow-teeth, and had about thirty piled up beside the anvil, when Bub came in, and stood watching the job.

"Pa, what's them?"

"Those are harrow-teeth, sonny."

S—— worked away, not noticing the boy until he heard a laugh, when he looked up, and heard him exclaim to himself, "Ho, ho! what an awful big mouf!"

PATHETIC.—A Norwich authority tells a pathetic little story about a pigeon which became fastened by a long string hanging from its leg to a telegraph-wire. Two or three cruel boys wanted to throw stones at it; but a kind gentleman, telling them not to hurt the poor bird, got a ladder, and carefully unwound the string, and put the frightened, fluttering little creature tenderly into his bosom while he descended. The next evening he remarked that it had made a much nicer pie than he expected.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 29.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS stylish suit consists of knee-breeches, vest, and jacket, of dark blue cassimere, ornamented with black silk braid, as shown by the illustration. The suit is graded to fit boys from four to nine years old, in six sizes, from 21 to 26 inches, bust measure. The size is taken in the usual manner—by passing a tape measure straight around the body under the arms.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises three articles, viz.: knee-breeches, vest, and jacket.

KNEE-BREECHES.—This pattern is in three pieces, viz.: front, back, and false belt. The notch on the outside seam of the front shows where to put in the pocket. The lap on the outer edge of the back turns in for the pocket facing. The breeches extend three inches below the knee, and are lengthened or shortened at the bottom, care being taken to preserve the shape. They are finished at the top with binding, and have a false belt sewed underneath with six button-holes, to button to a blouse-waist under the vest. They can be worn with suspenders if preferred. A quarter of an inch is allowed on the pattern for seams, and three-quarters of an inch for a hem on the bottom.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for boy four years old, 1¼ yards.

Braid, 9 yards.

Buttons, 10.

VEST.—This pattern is in two pieces—front and back. The perforations show where to put in the pockets and to sew on the buttons.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for vest front, for boy four years old, ½ yard.

Silesia for back, ½ yard.

Cambric for lining, ¾ yard.

Braid, 2½ yards.

Buttons, 6.

JACKET.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, back, sleeve, pocket, and tab. The jacket closes at the neck with a tab and buttons, and has a seam in the middle of the back. The perforations show where to put on the facing in front, and also where to sew in the pocket, and the form and size of the under part of the sleeve. In sewing in the sleeve, place the longest seam at the notch in the back, letting the hollow come at the lowest part of the armhole, under the arm. A quarter of an inch is allowed for seams in the pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for boy four years old, 1⅜ yards.

Lining, farmer's satin, 1⅜ yards.

Braid, 11 yards.

Buttons, 2.

Quantity of cloth for whole suit, for boy four years old, 3⅛ yards.

Braid, 22½ yards.

A quarter of a yard more should be added for each size.

tan, through which pink ribbon is run. Louis XV. under-waist of tarlatan, with basques in the front and back, and duchesse sleeves. An elegant basquine of white muslin completes the costume; this is open in front, so as to show the pleating of the under-waist, and is edged with white tarlatan puffing and pink ribbon, and fastened with two pink ribbon bows. The sleeves of the basquine are slashed on the inside of the arm, and finished with flounces like the duchesse sleeves. The skirt of the basquine forms the tunic, and opens over the under-waist; it is trimmed to match the rest, and looped in three places with pink ribbon bows with fringed ends. Black velvet ribbon with medallion on the neck. Wreath of roses, buds, and leaves gracefully twined among the frizzed hair.

Fig. 2.—Under-skirt of blue silk, with a silver sheen, trimmed with a deep box-pleated flounce. A blue button is set in the middle of each pleat, and thus forms a heading. High vest corsage, with close sleeves. Over dress of white mohair, with rounded tunic, looped very high from the sides in the back; and little jacket opening over the blue vest corsage, with pagoda sleeves. Muslin and lace lingerie. Rice-straw hat, bound with black velvet, and trimmed with blonde and wild flowers.

Fig. 3.—SUIT OF PEARL GRAY SILK. The under-skirt is trimmed with a wide flounce surmounted with two rows of lace of the same color, and three bias folds. Over-skirt open in front, where it terminates in a point, and looped only at the sides, and trimmed with folds and lace. High basque-waist, trimmed like the over-skirt. Muslin and lace Henri III. frill. Straw hat, trimmed with black velvet loops, lace, and grasses, with black velvet strings.

"OUR EXTRAVAGANT GIRLS!"

IT is quite edifying to hear our clergy and public and private lecturers hold forth on the extravagance of the young ladies of modern society as being a hinderance to matrimony. Our young men are not slow to take the cue and make that extravagance a scape-goat for their own sins.

The fact is that in all well-regulated families and all well-mannered communities it is properly considered not the right thing for any man to pass the line of thirty and be still unmarried. Some good reason must be known, and no poor reason can exist which is not pathetic. Every bachelor is, therefore, unfortunate or criminal. He must find an excuse which has at least the semblance of a reason. It gladdens him to find some one else on whom he can lay the blame.

It is an old masculine trick. "The woman that Thou gavest me," was Adam's impertinent reply to his Maker. "The woman Thou hast not given me," is the modern bachelor's reply. The unmarried men say that no man on a salary, or with a moderate income, can support a wife who has had the training in reckless expenditure which modern mothers give their daughters, and modern fathers allow.

There are a few things the Bazar thinks quite worthy the attention of those gentlemen.

One is that the men are as extravagant as the women, although the vice in them appears in a different form. It is a knowledge that the combined expenditures of two extravagant people can not be sustained by the young gentleman's exchequer in its present state which deters him from marrying. Take any one of the chief clerks in our large establishments, who are on salaries quite equal to the expenditure of large families in New York twenty years ago. Let him tell you whether, in order to enjoy the dignity and happiness of a well-married man, he is willing to relinquish his extravagances. If he assert that he has none, let him endure a little catechism. How much have you spent during the last year for wine, game suppers, cigars, theatres, carriage rides, extra fine clothes, extra fine chambers, and fifty other things that a man can be a man without? Will not every one of them be obliged to "own up" to at least one-tenth of his income thus wasted? If invested and nursed, to what might it not amount in ten years, from the day he was twenty until the day he was thirty?

Would he be willing to abandon these extravagances for the love and companionship of a fine woman? How can he venture to say that any woman who loved him would not be quite as ready to make a sacrifice of her extravagances to have his life-long devotion? If he say he is willing, she may be as ready to express her willingness. If he say "no," how can he find fault with her?

Let such young men take another view of the case.

These young ladies who are living in such a costly style have fathers that can afford it. The fathers have made their fortunes, and now choose to expend large portions of their great incomes on their daughters. Why do our young men regard only that class of young women? There are girls who are not extravagant, girls who are working for their living, making money, and saving it too. Let young men seek them.

Why should the clerks of Mr. STEWART, or Messrs. ARNOLD & CONSTABLE, confine their views of matrimony to the circle of young ladies whose fathers are prosperous merchants or millionaires? There are just as beautiful and virtuous young ladies working in all those establishments, lovely and lovable, industrious and economical, intelligent and educated, having no bad habits to unlearn. Let the young men look for mates there. They have no right to look elsewhere. Why should a young man demand of his father-in-law a wife and a fortune at the same time?

We are beginning to lose patience with this cry that the extravagance of young ladies is a hinderance to matrimony. We bore it patiently for a while, because it is true that in the race of vanity our young ladies have brought a reproach on the sex, and we would gladly do all in our power to correct this evil; but it is not fair to lay the whole blame on one which rightly belongs to two. There is something to be said on the other side, and we have ventured in this article to say a very little of it: and now we "pause for a reply."

ACTIVITY OF CHILDREN.

ALL inaction is insupportable to a well-constituted child. Mobility is his characteristic from infancy. The first breath of air ruffles his face and arouses his lungs to an excessive activity, demonstrated by a constant succession of loud cries, which are, however, by no means indicative of suffering. His limbs soon show an equal liveliness of action, and he begins his struggle with existence with such a paying out of blows and kicks as promises well for his chance of winning the prizes of life. With these certain indications of the requirements of the child's nature, is it not surprising that they are not only frequently unheeded, but even resisted?

American mothers are, we believe, somewhat in advance, in the treatment of their infants, of the German peasant and Indian squaw. The free-born citizen of our country is not forced to pass through the cocoon state of the papoose or wickelkind before being fledged with those wings of the American eagle which we all appropriate sooner or later. If he were, it may be doubted whether his future flight would be as extensive as he flatters himself it is to be.

The German is smothered in a pillow during his infancy, and so wound round and fastened into it that, wriggle as he may to escape the torture, like a chained and scorching martyr at the stake, he is forced to suffer. That the Teuton, in spite of this early ordeal, attains that vigor of growth which he forces the whole world to recognize, is proof of a marvelous strength of natural constitution. There is, however, with all the abundance of good qualities possessed by our German brethren, a wonderful lack, we fancy, of those elements which are generally supposed to constitute personal beauty. They frequently show irregularities of feature, distortions of limb, stunting of stature, and deformities of person to an extent which can only be attributed to their early state of wickelkind.

American mothers are fortunately not subjected to any claim of such absurd traditional customs. They are free to treat their children according to the indications of nature. They, however, not seldom refuse to follow these unerring guides, and take some devious course into which fashion or indolence has enticed them.

The various nurse-saving machines, or substitutes for the eyes, hands, and arms of the mother or attendant, are successful, no doubt, in their purpose of saving labor, but it may be questioned whether they are always of equal efficacy in promoting the infant's good. The various go-carts and safety-chairs, by means of which the youngest children can be left without the superintendence of any one secure from danger, may be condemned without hesitation. Their use implies a physical restraint and an isolation which are repugnant to the infant's nature, and fatal to a healthy development both of mind and body. The baby's carriage may be occasionally serviceable, as it will extend the opportunities for giving the child the benefits of the open air, but it should not, by any means, be used as a constant substitute for the nurse's arms. It is often only a movable bed, in which the baby, muffled up and tucked in, lies the whole time asleep, or in a half-torpid state. The child requires the motion of the walk of its bearer to give due exercise to its limbs, and the liveliness of her company to supply the necessary animation to its spirits.

We need hardly recur to our oft-repeated admonition, to avoid checking the natural and necessary mobility of the child by any superfinery of dress. The young should never be balked of a run and jump, a tumble and toss, or other healthful impulse or action, by any gewgaws in which a mother's vanity may delight. In attempting to adorn she only shackles them. The greatest possible play should be given to the natural activity of children.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Early Greens.

MY DEAR MORTIMER,—Socrates still prefers to deal at the Fulton Market. He agrees that it is at a very inconvenient distance, and that it is, upon the whole, considered as a market in the metropolis of the Western continent, a disgrace to civilization. But he insists that the supplies are of the best, and he says that it is one of the very few romantic remains of the older city, when it was still convenient and delightful. I am glad that any body finds the Fulton Market romantic. It shows how ingenious Nature is, and how she produces pleasure from the most unpromising sources. The process by which she distills a romantic emotion from Fulton Market must be akin to that which extracts vitality for the most delicate plants from manure. But I know that Socrates sincerely means what he says, for I have seen him loitering about the old pile, sauntering among parsnips and onions, and anon sounds and tongues, and barrels and baskets of fruit, and slabs of game, and boxes of butter and cheese.

"I can't make up my mind," he said to me one day, when I met him meditating in the old market, "whether, if I were a starving man, I should wish to come here or not. I am not clear whether the sight of so much and so various food would merely exasperate me into despair, or tend to satisfy and soothe. It is really a very curious and interesting question." And he drifted reflectively away from me, and disappeared behind a huge barricade of hams.

Another day I met him in the same odorous passages, and he had the same aspect of musing regard for every thing around him. It was pleasant to contrast his air of leisurely meditation with the hurried, bustling, eager look and movement of the throng who came in to lunch at Dorlon's or some other of the little temples in which the sacrifice of the oyster is forever offered up. These gentlemen emerged from the temple with solemn face and rapid gait, picking their teeth hurriedly, briskly paying their little scot, and darting around the slippery corners and up the slimy steps of the pile that Socrates finds so romantic; and if they casually cast a swift glance upon him in passing, they evidently thought him a thief, a fool, or a lunatic. His eyes were listlessly following them over masses of beets and lettuce and dandelions as I said to him that I was glad to see that spring greens had come. "Yes," he answered, with his eyes still fixed upon the rapidly retiring groups; "they come, and they never go." I was in some doubt whether he had heard my question or was answering it, but he seemed to be fully conscious of it.

As we still stood in the market a party of lively country people approached us, chatting loudly and gayly, and looking at every thing with pleased excitement. They had evidently come to the market as one of the queer sights of the city. Perhaps they had heard that if they would know what a metropolitan saddle-rock stew is, they must perform the due rites in the temple of Dorlon. But, however that may be, they moved laughingly along, and found plenty of pleasure, whether they were seeking it or not. There were bright-faced children with them, neatly dressed, and frolicking about the piles of food, playing hide-and-seek among the vegetables and barrels of mysterious contents. "The spring greens come, I say, and they never go," said Socrates, as he watched the country cousins, and as if resuming our conversation. He is an eccentric man, just what the syndic of the city used to call a philosopher, and he has such an inveterate habit of generalizing that I am not always sure that I comprehend him. "Spring greens?" I replied, interrogatively. "Just so," he said, gravely, looking at the country party which turned out of sight; "I said spring greens."

I am not the busiest man in town, as you perhaps know, my dear young friend; but I could not pass the whole day in Fulton Market even in such suggestive society; so I told Socrates that I was obliged to go. "Notes to pay, I suppose," he remarked, in the same sententious way. Of course I could not help smiling at that, for I doubt if I ever paid a note at a bank in my life. "Or money to deposit before three," he continued, seeing that the note-paying theory was unfounded. "Can't a man be obliged to go any where but to a bank?" I asked him, laughingly, as I turned to go. As he raised his hand to shake mine, he looked at me steadily, and said, although I could see no sly humor in his eyes, "Remember, I said that spring greens are always coming, and they never go. They are called poor things and truck; but the poor we have with us always."

This remarkable benediction sent me meditating out of the market. Was there some hidden wisdom in this talk of Socrates's? Did it contain some of the fruit of his reflections in the old market? While other people came to buy meat and vegetables and oysters, did he get some mysterious spiritual food from the miscellaneous old rat-trap, as the profane called it? Had he the gift of transmuting "truck" into truth, and "garden sarce" into wisdom? Then a sudden light of conviction shone into my mind. "Am I spring greens?" I slowly asked myself. "Were the country people spring greens? What are spring greens? Who are spring greens?" I am sure that I do not know that Socrates meant any such thing; but he might have meant it, for, in a very evident sense, spring greens never do go. And as I passed slowly along the street the truth became constantly clearer to me.

I stopped at a bookstore, seeing a pretty, new volume in the window, upon which I read "Poems." Now I can not deny a tenderness of feeling and curiosity toward all volumes of new poetry. It is as with fresh pictures in a gallery. So much hope and ambition and dreaming are in them! So much more than the eye can see, or the mind readily measure! They are the little leaf-like boats with a taper which Moore says that the girls set afloat upon the Ganges. And they drift and drift upon the dark, solemn current, which, I suppose, symbolizes life or destiny. And if the little glimmering spark goes out, then hope dies, and their hearts break, for they shall love, but love unhappily. But if the flame flickers, still burning, out of sight, they are happy, for even so bright shall their love and life be. I look at the little volume of the shy youth or maid, and I know that it is that leaf-borne taper. What yearning eyes watch to see it float undimmed into flame! How the future, life, happiness, all, depend upon the prosperous voyage! If it sinks, how much goes down with it! There are modest books upon my shelves, full of music and sweetness, unheard, forgotten; and as I think of what might have been had they been successful and the beginnings of great careers, they seem to me rosy remnants of a phenix egg, from which, indeed, the incomparable bird might have sprung, but from which nothing came, and which is only a dry chip now.

I opened the volume which I had taken up. I read the verses, and turned the pages, and laid it gently down. Then I slipped softly out into the street again, and walked thoughtfully on. I understood Socrates now. Spring greens forever come, and never go. They are a mild and pleasant food. But they will not keep. They must be eaten to-day. There is no to-morrow for them.

In the evening I went, according to my promise, to the Commencement exercises of the Atlantic and Pacific University. That is another of the pleasant sights of the city, and I should think that Socrates might find as much satisfaction in it as in the Fulton Market. The great hall was crowded with spectators, parents, sisters, and brothers, and sweethearts and friends. They were all lightly and gayly dressed, and fanning and murmuring and smiling; each little group, proud of one of the heroes that would soon appear, eager to applaud every word and to fling flowers at his feet. It was a pretty and inspiring sight; and when the first youth advanced amidst tremulous plaudits, and made his bow, and spoke his oration, forgetting every thing that he meant to have remembered, excepting the mere words—forgetting the impressive inflections of the voice that he had so carefully practiced—the graceful and expressive gestures which had been the study of a month—forgetting, in his becoming and bashful confusion, where she sat whom he intended to consider his sole audience—I could but smile inwardly as I thought of the proud senior who yesterday, in his own consciousness, walked upon the top of the world, the maturest of men—and lo! to-day the mere appearance vanished, and once more I beheld early greens, and reflected upon the wisdom of the Fulton Market philosopher.

But it is by no means altogether a matter of the season. I have seen early greens, as we call them, sadly belated—early greens in August and September. And the spectacle is not confined to the markets. There is a neighbor of Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle, Plancus, whom perhaps you know. Forty years ago that man was, so to say, among the very earliest of the greens. And he has never ceased to be so. I meet him in the country or in the city, and I see the same early spring hue. His chief care is that part of his appearance which the tailor makes; and the simple satisfaction which he derives from the shape of his trowsers and the fit of his coat, and his conformity to the latest fashion in cravats and collars and shirt bosoms, is like that of a boy of eighteen (if there are any such), or the senior whom I remarked at the Commencement. Or, again, sometimes even in the pulpit I observe something that reminds me of that pathetic volume of spring verses. For some preacher, old or young in years as may happen, will so speak and behave as to be undeniably but a dish of spring greens, the very mildest of all possible refreshments.

But the prettiest form of it is a group at the watering-places, composed of some of those wise youths of twenty and twenty-four, who know every thing, and who are so painfully interested in their clothes, and of those fresh innocent girls in muslin and other people's hair, who waltz perfectly, and have "style." I am the bald-headed old fellow in the corner, if they did but know it, who watch them with a mind full of tender and lovely memories, yet who, as he sees them moving and sitting and standing about the huge hotel parlor, seems to himself to be in the old Fulton Market, looking, with the sententious Socrates, at the heaps of beets and parsnips and dandelions and spinach, and who, I suppose, may be sometimes heard unconsciously murmuring as he gazes, "Spring greens! spring greens!"

It is a beautiful illustration of the doctrine of correspondences—a doctrine, indeed, which is capable of infinite application and suggestion. And this especial one has been so serviceable to me that I mean to go oftener to the Fulton Market for the chance of meeting my philosophic vagabond and friend—a vagabond like his namesake, and a philosopher like Jaques.

Your friend, dear Mortimer,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE simple and tasteful suit represented on our first page is appropriate for boys just getting into trowsers; and suits of the same style are worn by their older brothers of eight or nine years. It fits easily in the English fashion, and is a good model of the sensible loose clothing now adopted for boys, instead of the tight-fitting, constrained garments lately worn.

The knee-breeches fall just below the knee, are simply hemmed at the bottom or else lined with an inch-wide facing, and are broad enough for the foot to pass through; consequently the opening at the side is dispensed with, the seam is closed to the end, and the buttons are set on for ornament merely. There is not a particle of fullness about the waist of the knee-breeches. They are cut to fit the figure snugly, and are bound at the top with black galloon, a soft twilled silk braid, and the same binding usually passes down the outside seams of the legs. Instead of being gathered to a separate waistband, they are fitted snugly to the figure, and a false band of thick linen, doubled, is stitched inside, and furnished with button-holes to fasten them to a blouse shirt waist, with which the suit should always be worn. The engraving shows the manner of trimming. Wide galloon and narrow soutache are combined on fanciful suits, or else two rows of wider braid doubled, as if for binding, are passed up the outside of the leg. Mothers will find that the plain knee-breeches are easier made than the Zouave pantaloons, and when well fitted are more trim and jaunty-looking, displaying the graceful limbs of the child, instead of concealing them, as full, baggy knickerbockers do. They are so popular just now that they are provided even with the négligé sailor suits.

Next comes the vest—a garment that delights the hearts of "little men." This may be merely a false vest buttoned inside the jacket fronts; but a regular waistcoat is a feature this season, and is often seen on boys who are still wearing kilt skirts. For chubby little fellows the false vest is advised. It is made by sloping away half the front of the pattern given, and buttoning the remainder about two inches back of the fronts of the jacket. The vest given in our model is without a collar. It is pointed at the throat low enough to show the shirt collar and neck-tie, is bound and lightly braided, is cut in two sharp points below, and fastened by lasting buttons set very near together.

The jacket fits loosely, descends just below the waist, and may be worn without the vest, if preferred, the pleated front of the shirt showing instead. Made of light summer cloth, it is unlined, the edges bound, and the seams felled in the way usual for cloth. For the house, in warm weather, the vest and jacket may be dispensed with, and a pretty suit formed alone of the linen shirt and knee-breeches.

Dark blue and blue-black fabrics are the first choice for boys' dressy suits; the gray, so universally worn for several seasons, is now chosen more for utility than style. Blue-tinted cloths of light quality, a yard and a half wide, are sold for $2 50 a yard. These are smooth faced, but with little gloss. Navy blue flannels of single width are $1 a yard and upward. Those at $1 are good enough for ordinary sea-side suits, though finer flannels and cloth are now made up in the négligé sailor fashion. Gray cassimeres, soft, substantial, and of shades that do not soil easily, are shown for every-day suits. Single width, they are $1 a yard. Among washing goods white duck is much used for these suits, and also for kilt suits. It is rather heavy, however, for small boys, and is difficult to iron well; hence mothers prefer thick repped piqués, either buff or white. A substantial gray and brown fabric, dark enough for service, is called linen drilling, though containing a good deal of cotton. It is 35 cents a yard, and makes good suits for school. Thick brown linen, strong enough, though without the desirable twill, is 45 cents. Real linen drilling, in narrow stripes of black or brown on white, or else white stripes on gray or buff grounds, is 75 cents a yard. Some patterns have a fanciful stripe near the selvedge for trimming, though a border of this sort detracts from the beauty of the suit.

Very reasonable prices are asked at the furnishing houses for suits made of the striped drilling just mentioned. Those for boys from four to nine years cost only $4 50 or $5. They have knee-breeches trimmed with two rows of white washing braid up the outside seam, and three large pearl buttons on the knee. The blouse is of the simple sailor shape without the sailor collar. The broad pleat in front is braided, and the belt is fastened on by straps of braid in the seams under the arm.

Long white stockings, gartered above the knee, or held up by elastics attached to a belt, are worn with knee-breeches. The black gaiter is buttoned high above the ankle, showing a space of white stocking at the top. A low shoe, called the Newport tie, like that lately described for ladies, is also worn by small boys. Striped stockings, the stripes going around the leg, and laced Balmoral shoes, are worn with sailor suits.

HATS AND HINTS FOR GENTLEMEN.

A straw hat just introduced for gentlemen is called De Grey and Ripon, and copies a London model. It has a round Derby crown, and is shown with a rolling brim for those to whom such are becoming—gentlemen do consider the becoming—or with a stiff brim made of the straw doubled. Those of dark gray straw, with lighter band and binding, are thought to have an especially English air; white, black, and brown straws are also shown. The finest, of Dunstable straw, cost $15, the coarsest $6, and there are intermediate grades. The straw hat most prevalent on the sidewalk is of the sailor shape. Those made of light split straw, with the brim rolled slightly, are $5. The coarse-looking Mackinaw straws of ample sailor shape are chosen for yachting and the races: price $3 50. In felt and cassimere hats bluish-pearl and gray tints are in favor. There is an effort to revive the picturesque Tyrolese hat. Its tapering crown, dented on top, and its rolled brim are prettily brought out in fine gray felt with lighter binding and band; black trimmings give this hat a coarse look: $5 or $6 is the price. Very light hats of bamboo cloth, linen, and of square-meshed canvas in natural unbleached buff tints, are shown for midsummer wear in the country. They are made with a crown of several gores and stiff brim. The price is from $3 to $4.

Imported canes are slender, natural sticks of the black or white thorn. A pretty one may be had for $2. English umbrellas, of brown or black silk, with many narrow gores, have sticks similar to those used for canes. Gentlemen's furnishing houses also display ladies' umbrellas with carnelian-tipped handles, or with knobs of yellow ivory. A chain is provided for attaching them to the belt when not in use.

VARIETIES FOR LADIES.

A pretty fancy for the warm days is a neck-tie of black dotted net, a trifle wider than the ordinary bias silk tie, the ends straight, and finished with a narrow hem. This is exceedingly becoming with the cambric and linen toilettes worn in the early part of the day. It is passed under the points of the collar, and tied in a bow, or fastened by a brooch.

A novelty in neck-ties is a reminiscence of the Roman scarf so popular last year. The broad bars of the Roman ribbon are retained, but the brilliant Roman colors give way to the pale Watteau tints now in favor. For instance, stripes of the delicate Nile green with tea-rose are associated, or mauve with salmon, China pink with buff. These are admirable with black or white toilettes.

The cambric shirts for ladies, described in last week's Bazar, are now sold at the furnishing houses for $2 50 or $2 75 each. A pleated shirt and over-skirt of gray linen, worn over a black silk skirt, makes a stylish and inexpensive traveling dress for the present season. A large black sash may be worn with it, or simply a belt ribbon. The Tussore linens make up well in the same way. A hat of the linen, tied down at the sides with black velvet ribbon, completes the costume.

PERSONAL.

DOUGLAS JERROLD was paid twenty-five dollars for that famous one-line witticism: "Advice to people about to marry.—Don't."

—The editor of the New York Commercial Advertiser has the hardihood to say that Mr. WOODWARD, who was the principal operator in the recent Rock Island affair, was "the little man around the corner."

—Mr. J. P. KILBRETH, who has been appointed to examine the books of the Methodist Book Concern, was formerly a prominent citizen of Cincinnati, but removed to this city on becoming assignee of the Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company.

—Mrs. MYRA BRADWELL, who has studied law for fourteen years, and is now editor of the Chicago Legal News, the only legal journal of any value in the West, is a lady of medium height, with fine, regular, sensitive features, an intelligent and womanly face, and black hair and black, expressive eyes. She is a woman who is excellently well informed upon the current events of the day, is a superior conversationist, and while she takes a fine rank as a legal thinker, she is no less successful in the direction of being an excellent mother and a thoroughly estimable lady.

—The Rev. EDWARD EVERETT HALE is writing a story to be read, instead of a lecture, before the lyceums. It is called "He Did his Level Best." Mark Twain has some poetry on that topic:

"If he'd a reg'lar task to do,
He never took no rest;
Or if 'twas off and on—the same—
He done his level best.

"Whate'er this man was set to do
He done it with a zest;
No matter what his contract was,
He'd do his level best."

So will Rev. HALE.

—Prince ARTHUR having attained his majority, the ministry will submit to Parliament a proposition to make him an annual allowance, which, according to precedent, will be $75,000 a year. Prince ALBERT impressed upon his children the duty of saving up a little something every year against a rainy day; and just now the public weather abroad seems to be charged with considerable electricity.

—KOSSUTH has again entered the holy estate of matrimony, his wife being the daughter of a Swiss gentleman. KOSSUTH is now sixty-nine, and it will be twenty years in November since he sailed for this country. He commenced getting into trouble and going to jails and such places in 1839, and has been in some sort of difficulty ever since.

—The reason why SYLVANUS COBB, Jun., confines himself to writing for the periodicals is because the legitimate function of a Cob is to produce a cereal. That is the remark of a gentleman kept by the Danbury News to take charge of the wag department for Fairfield County, Connecticut.

—Dr. HALL, in his Journal of Health, says the best medicines in the world in the cure of disease are warmth, rest, cleanliness, and pure air. Some persons make it a virtue to brave disease, "to keep up" as long as they can move a foot; and sometimes they succeed, but oftener the powers of life are thereby so completely exhausted that the system has lost all ability to recuperate. Whenever walking or work is an effort, a warm bed and a cool room are the first indispensable steps to a sure and speedy recovery. Instinct leads all beasts and birds to quietude and rest the very moment disease or wounds assail the system.

—The Emperor of Austria, following the example of Kaiser WILLIAM in elevating BISMARCK to the rank of prince, has announced his purpose to elevate VON BEUST, his Prime Minister, to the rank of prince. VON BEUST has many enemies at the Viennese court, but the Emperor properly estimates the capacity of his minister, and not only stands by him, but has an affection for him.

—Dr. C. C. COX, President of the Board of Health of Washington, has the option of a salary of $8000 a year as editor of a new independent daily paper soon to be started in this city, the capital stock of which is said to be already subscribed and paid up.

—GUIZOT, now old, infirm, and confined to his bed, dictates to his daughter, who is his amanuensis, sometimes for eight or ten hours at a time.

—MAGGIE MITCHELL, now the wife of Mr. PADDOCK, a merchant, is in more than easy circumstances, having some three hundred thousand dollars invested, and a good house in this city. Her little daughter, now two years old, is appropriately named FANCHON.

—A young woman of Salt Lake, one of the many Misses YOUNG, was recently spoken to by her father, BRIGHAM, in reference to a proposal of marriage from a well-to-do merchant of that place. The young woman, with some degree of spunk, replied: "I have no objection to marrying; in fact, I should rather like to do so, and the more the better. I am willing to marry a dozen husbands if you will let me select them myself, but I will never put up with a piece of a man."

—Mr. BRADFORD, the American artist, has achieved another artistic and social success in London. A few evenings since he delivered a lecture before the Royal Institution (Lord LINDSAY presiding), upon Greenland, Ice, and the Esquimaux. A large number of the nobility were present, and heartily congratulated the speaker on his success.

—Rev. HENRY BOEHM, the oldest itinerant minister of the Methodist Church (older than PETER CARTWRIGHT), reached his ninety-seventh birthday a few days since. He preached his first sermon seventy-two years ago.

—A Wisconsin lady, Miss TERRY, has reached the excessive age of one hundred and four, which has caused it to be said—of course by a newspaper man—that she is an ancient mys-tery. Maine boasts an older woman still, Mrs. BERTHA FOSTER, who is over one hundred and seven years old. Since her one-hundredth birthday she has both spun and knit. For one pair of stockings knit since that time she has received five dollars. She has been able to read until within a few years, and to walk quite well until very recently, when she fell, and has since been obliged to keep her bed. She still retains her mental faculties to a remarkable degree, considering her age.

—The Boston Post, with the gravity characteristic of that journal, mentions the fact that a resident of one of the border towns of Massachusetts, one DUSENBERRY, undertook to correct an offending cow, but with such indifferent success that his family, numbering about a dozen, subsequently went Dusenberrying.

—A young New Yorker, son of a Wall Street man, traveling in Europe, landed recently in Rome, and thought he would do PIUS IX. the honor of a call. He was last on the line of those presented, but, instead of conforming to usage on such occasions, neither bent the knee nor kissed the hand, but seized his Holiness by the hand and gave it a hearty shake. There was general consternation at this. The Pope promptly recovered his perpendicular, shook his finger roguishly at the youth, laid his hand on his shoulder, and said, "You are from New York, I presume, young man?" "I am a New Yorker," was the reply. "I thought so," said the pontiff, as he passed on, intimating that a New Yorker was quite daring enough for any thing. When questioned how he dared do such a thing, Young America replied: "Dare do it? I shook hands with General GRANT and General SCOTT, and why should I not shake hands with the Pope, as with any other eminent man?"

—Among the opulent notabilities of California are CHARLES CROCKER, vice-president of the Central Pacific Railroad, worth $6,000,000; his brother, E. B., worth $1,000,000. BEN HALLADAY, Oregon railroad man and silver-miner, $3,000,000. Ex-Senator GWIN, $3,000,000. Colonel JACK HAYS, ex-Texan ranger, $300,000. These men own country residences near San Francisco that throw our country places entirely in the shade. They are built of wood, but in dimensions, appointments, and surroundings equal any dwellings in the world, and some are almost royal palaces. Some of these astounding persons do nothing but talk California, and tell people how to make money. They have nothing to sell themselves, but know a man who has.

—It has been ascertained that AUGUSTE MAQUET is the author of one of the most sensational and successful works of fiction ever published in France, called "The Memoirs of the Sanson Family, or Seven Generations of Executioners." It was written at the suggestion of the elder DUMAS, and has had a sale of 700,000 copies.

—This of the Princess PAULINE DE METTERNICH, who now lives at Vienna, and who, during the war, devoted her whole time and energy to collecting funds for the suffering French. Early one morning she sent one of her footmen with the list of contributions to Mr. O——, a wealthy banker, who at the time was yet in bed. The list is presented to the nabob on a silver tray. He looks at it and hands it back, yawning and saying, "Oh! if the Princess herself had come, I should have subscribed five thousand florins." Early on the following morning the banker was awakened again, and a closely veiled lady was ushered into his presence. She removed her veil, and the astonished banker saw that his fair visitor was no other than the Princess DE METTERNICH. "You told my servant yesterday," she said to him, "you would subscribe five thousand florins if I would call on you myself. Here I am, and here is the list." There was no help for it. The banker had to subscribe the sum, and the Princess left rejoicing.

—BISMARCK signed the treaty of peace between France and Prussia with a unique gold pen made expressly for that purpose and presented to him. It is a perfect imitation of a goose-quill, incrusted with diamonds. B. preserves the pen in his possession. The goose-quill with which the black mark was drawn around the famous "Expunging Resolutions" on the journal of the United States Senate was for a long time preserved in the family of Senator THOMAS H. BENTON, and some one has carefully kept the pen with which Mr. LINCOLN signed the Emancipation Proclamation.

—ALEXANDRE DUMAS, fils, assisted at a grand dinner given in Paris before the siege, and was particularly witty and satirical. In the course of the conversation he happened to allude to a rather delicate subject concerning one of his best friends. The latter called on him the following day and mildly remonstrated. "Mon cher, you are very witty, I confess, and your talent in that line is known; but, really, you are not obliging, and I am sure you would sacrifice your best friend for the sake of a good joke." "Most assuredly," answered Dumas; "friends pass away, but good sayings live forever."

—Mrs. HENRY WOOD, the English novelist, is reputed to have realized $100,000 by the copyright of her sensational stories. At first she could hardly induce a publisher to read her manuscripts.

—An aged HOPKINS, of Mississippi, having got on comfortably for ninety years, waxed wrathy a few days since, and became blasphemous, simply because his laundress sent home his shirt buttoned. In attempting to put it on he pulled till the button broke and the linen tore. This was too much, so he took his old shot-gun, placed the muzzle under his chin, and blazed away. The result was that a portion of his skull and a few of his brains were dissociated from the subordinate part of his carcass, and friends came in and laid him out. He should have worn studs.

—There were some fine points in the character of old Commodore TATNALL, who has recently deceased at the age of seventy-six. In the attacks on Tampico, Panuco, and Vera Cruz, during the Mexican war, he commanded the steamer Spitfire, and did some very clever work. In June, '59, when in command of the East India squadron, while observing in a chartered steamer the attack of the British forces upon the Peiho forts, he towed the boats containing the reserves into action when the English were on the point of being defeated. This course, though a breach of neutrality, was generally approved in the United States. Afterward, in an open barge, he passed through the very hottest fire to visit Admiral HOPE, who had been wounded.

Crochet and other Suspenders, Figs. 1–7.

Fig. 1.—CROCHET SUSPENDERS. These suspenders consist of two bands each twenty-four inches long and an inch and three-quarters wide, which are worked in sc. (single crochet) over elastic braid with gray, black, and white saddler's silk, or silk twist. Fig. 2 shows a full-sized section. For each band work with the gray silk a chain stitch foundation twenty-four inches long, and on this work over the elastic braid interlining 17 rounds sc.; work the first and second rounds with gray silk, and the third and fourth rounds with black and white silk, working alternately 2 st. (stitch) with the black and 2 st. with the white silk. In changing the colors, work off the last st. of one color with the color of the following 2 st., and carry the thread not in use further on the under side of the work until it is required. The white st. of the fourth round must always come on the black st. of the third round. Work the 5th–13th rounds with gray silk, the 14th and 15th rounds like the 3d and 4th rounds, and the 16th and 17th rounds with gray silk. Then join the bands diagonally at one crosswise edge so as to form a point, trim off the edges of the seam slightly, and sew two gray linen straps, each eight inches long and an inch and a quarter wide, to the under side of the points. These straps must previously have been joined diagonally, so as to form a point, and in sewing on the straps this point must be turned upward, while that of the suspenders must be turned downward, and all the edges of the seams must come on the inside between the two (see illustration). Round off the under edge of the linen straps, bind them all around with gray silk ribbon, and furnish each with a button-hole as shown by the illustration. Run the still free end of each crochet band through a steel buckle of the requisite size, to each side of which a short gray linen tab, bound with gray silk ribbon, is fastened. Run the end of each band through a slide of the requisite size, then slip up the buckle about eight inches and the slide four inches, hem down the end of the band on the under side, pass it around the still free middle bar of the buckle, and sew it fast to this. By means of these buckles the bands may be lengthened or shortened at pleasure. Finally, join with each slide two gray linen button-hole straps, as shown by Fig. 1. For each two straps take two pieces of gray drilling nine inches and a half long and three-quarters of an inch wide, round off one end, furnish them with button-holes, and bind with gray silk ribbon. Then lay the two straps together so that the rounded ends come on each other, and run them through the slide. Sew the straight end of one strap to the under side of the other strap two inches and a half from the rounded end of the latter, and in the same manner join the straight end of this strap with the rounded end of the first strap, so that the straps cross each other as shown by the illustration. This completes the suspenders.

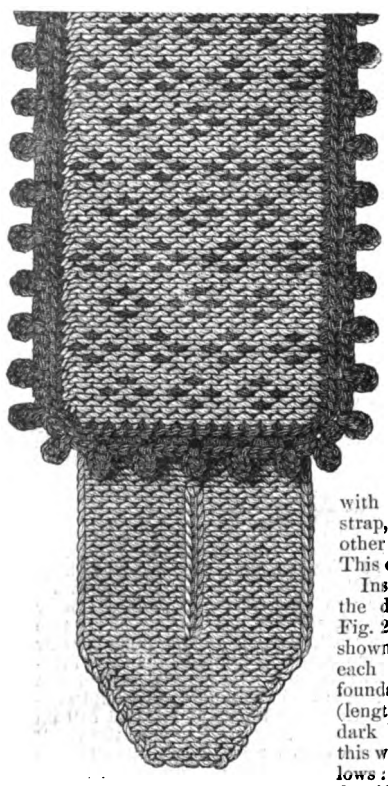

Fig. 6.—SECTION OF KNITTED SUSPENDERS.—FULL SIZE.

Instead of working the bands in the design above described (see Fig. 2), they may be worked in that shown by Fig. 3. For this begin each band at the middle with a foundation of the requisite length (length of the band) worked with dark brown saddler's silk, and on this work with the same silk as follows: 1st round.—Alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 1 ch. (chain stitch), and pass over one foundation stitch with the latter. 2d round (this and all the other rounds are worked over an interlining of fine black silk elastic braid).—2 sc. on each ch. of the preceding round, working them over the elastic interlining. Take light brown silk and work the 3d round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round. 4th round.—Always alternately 5 sc., 5 ch.; with the latter pass over 5 st. of the preceding round. Along each 5 ch. the elastic braid is left free. 6th and 7th rounds.—Like the 5th round; but in the 7th round work 5 sc. instead of 5 ch. on the corresponding 5 sc. of the preceding round. 8th round.—With dark brown silk work 1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round. 9th round.—With light brown silk, 1 sc. on each sc. of the preceding round. This completes one half of the band, including the open-work strip. Work the other half on the foundation st. on the other side of the open-work strip, working the 2d–9th rounds. Instead of silk, gray linen thread, or woolen or cotton thread, may be used for working the suspenders.

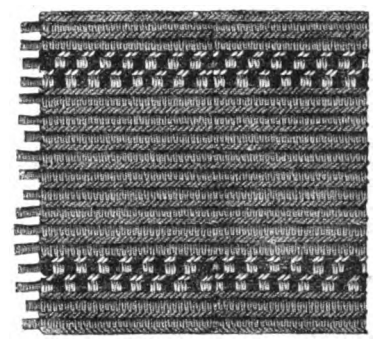

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF CROCHET SUSPENDERS.—FULL SIZE.

Instead of crocheting the suspenders, they may be made of various kinds of material, or of wide elastic braid. Fig. 4 shows a full-sized section of suspenders made of white corded piqué lined with shirting. The piqué is embroidered with red embroidery cotton in knotted and back stitch, in the design shown by the illustration. The outer edge of the suspenders is bound with red worsted braid, and ornamented with herring-bone stitch worked with red cotton. Fig. 5 shows a section of suspenders made of gray elastic braid, which is embroidered in cross stitch with two shades of violet saddler's silk.

Fig. 6 shows a full-sized section of knitted suspenders, which are worked with white cotton and two knitting-needles entirely in purl stitch, always going backward and forward, and in such a manner that they form a double layer, which is joined at the sides. Begin the suspenders at the under edge of the back button-hole strap with a foundation of 10 st., and on this work as follows: 1st round.—Sl. (that is, slip 1 st.), then alternately 1 p. (purl), sl.; slip the st. as if they were to be purled, always letting the working thread come in front of the st. slipped. Work the following 19 rounds like the first round, but always knit off the sl. (excepting the first st. of each round) of the preceding round, and sl. the st. knit off in the preceding round. Besides this, widen 1 st. at the end of each round, so that the strap grows gradually wider. Work four rounds without changing the number of st. In the 25th round, which must count 28 st., divide the st. in halves, and on the first 14 st. work 26 rounds as before, always going backward and forward, and without changing the number of st. Leave the st. of the 26th round unnoticed, take up the 14 st. previously left unnoticed on a separate needle, lay on the thread anew, and on these 14 st. work 26 rounds without widening; in this manner the button-hole is formed. Work 16 rounds on all the st. (28) as before, but at the end of the last four rounds widen 1 st., so that the band, which is now begun, counts 32 st. On these work as before until the band (not including the button-hole straps) is of the requisite length (the original measures 30 inches in length). In the upper layer of the suspenders form the figures shown by the illustration. To do this lay on red worsted at the beginning of the 3d round, * pass it in front of the third following st. to be slipped, passing it from the back to the front, sl. the st. above mentioned, knit off the following st., and after working the 3 st. above mentioned, pass the thread from the front to the back. In this way one of the red horizontal veins of the foundation is formed. Repeat from *. In working the st. before and after the red veins, the red thread must not be visible on either side of the work; it must, therefore, before knitting off the st. be passed from the front to the back, and before slipping the st. be passed from the back to the front; at the end of the round let the thread hang unnoticed. After this pr. (pattern round) work two rounds without the design. Work the third following round like the first pr. Work five rounds without the design, and then a pr., but care must now be taken that the figures of the design shall alternate as shown by the illustration. The foundation may also be worked plain, and the design figures sewed instead of knitted in. When the band is of the requisite length, work four rounds more, narrowing 1 st. at the end of each, then work the front button-hole strap, which must be worked like the back button-hole strap, but longer, and with two button-holes. Crochet on the outer edge of the band (not including the button-hole straps), with red worsted, first a sc. round, and then a picot round as follows: Alternately 3 sc. on 2 st. of the preceding round; then 1 p. consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. in the first of the 5 ch.; with the p. pass over 1 st. of the preceding round.

Fig. 1.—KNITTED AND CROCHET GIRDLE.—FRONT.

Fig. 7 shows a section of suspenders worked with gray linen twist and red worsted, together with the back button-hole strap. For each half of the suspenders and the button-hole straps work with coarse gray linen a ch. foundation a yard long, and on this work as follows: 1st round.—10 ch., with this pass over 9 foundation st., 6 sc. on the following 6 foundation st., now always alternately 1 ch., 1 dc.; pass over 1 foundation st. with the latter. On the last 20 foundation st. work 1 ch., pass over 1 foundation st., 5 sc. on the following 5 foundation st., 9 ch., pass over 9 foundation st., and on the last 5 foundation st. work 5 sc.; now work 19 ch., and fasten with 1 sl. to the last foundation st. on the other side of it. The round worked on the foundation st. forms the middle strip of the suspenders. All around this strip work 4 rounds sc. with gray linen thread, widening at the end of the button-holes in such manner that the work neither draws nor gathers.—Around the band thus far completed (not including the button-holes) work 1 round of sc. with red worsted; at the ends work the sc. on the still free upper vein of the horizontal row of st. (see illustration), always working 2 sc. on one vein. Then work one round of sc. with gray linen thread, and one picot round with red worsted. For the picot round work 1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round, after each second following sc. 1 p., consisting of 3 ch. and 1 sc. in the first of these. Ornament the band thus far completed along the middle with leaflets of red worsted. To do this hold the back button-hole strap between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand in such a manner that the end is turned downward. Then work the leaflets of the right half of the band as follows: 1 sc. on the first dc. above the button-hole strap, 6 ch., 1 sl. on the fourth sc. (count from the red row of st. worked on the end of the band) of the 3d round worked on the open-work middle strip, inserting the needle under the still free upper vein of the sc. (As the band is held crosswise, this vein has a vertical position.) Now work 6 sc. on the 6 ch. previously worked, * 1 sc. on the following dc., 6 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth following sl. of the 3d round above referred to, 6 sc. on the 6 ch., and repeat from *. After completing the last leaflet at the other end of the band work 1 sc. on the following dc., 2 ch., 2 sc. on the following (last) free dc. of the middle strip. Take the front button-hole strap between the thumb and forefinger, so that the end of the strap is turned downward, and crochet the leaflets of the other half of the band as follows: 2 ch., 1 sc. on the following dc. on which 1 sc. has already been worked, 6 ch., 1 sl. on the fourth following st. of the 3d round of this half (inserting the needle under the free upper vein), 6 sc. on the 6 ch., 1 sc. on the following dc., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the following dc., 6 ch., 1 sl. on the fourth following st. of the 3d round referred to, 6 sc. on the 6 ch., and continue in this manner. In the same way rifle straps, shawl straps, etc., may be worked over an interlining of twine.

See illustration on page 452.

THIS design is worked in the common cross stitch with zephyr worsted and filling silk on canvas, in the colors given in the description of symbols. This border may be joined with strips of plush to cover sofas, fauteuils, etc., or for rugs.

See illustration on page 453.

WORK the design with red cotton on a piece of linen. First transfer the design to the linen (the line on the illustration shows how far the fourth part of the design extends), and then work the fish and shells at the outer edge, and the figure in the corner in point Russe embroidery and diagonal half-polka stitch. The coral-like figures of the border are worked in satin stitch in the original; they may, however, also be worked in quilted stitch or point Russe. The outer edge of the napkin may either be hemmed, raveled out, or edged with fringe.

See illustration on page 453.

THIS girdle is worked with pink knitting cotton, partly in Tunisian (Victoria) crochet stitch and partly knitted. Crochet first the front and then the two back parts, each separately, as follows: begin the front at one side edge with a foundation of 30 st. (stitches), and on this work 9 pr. (pattern rows) in the crochet stitch referred to; at the beginning of the 1st round of the 3d, 5th, 7th, and 9th pr. (under edge of the girdle) widen 1 st. each; this is done by working 1 ch. (chain stitch) each at the end of the 2d round of the 2d, 4th, 6th, and 8th pr., so that the first vertical st. in each following pr. may be taken up from the first vertical vein of stitches of the preceding pr. Shorten the 10th (inserted) pr. by 8 st. at the upper edge of the girdle, and by 7 st. at the under edge. The shortening at the upper edge of the girdle is done in working the 1st round of the relative pr., by leaving the last 8 st. of the preceding pr. unnoticed; at the under edge of the girdle the shortening is done in the 2d round of the pr., by leaving the 7 st. on the needle unnoticed, thus not casting them off. Work the 11th pr. in connection with the 7 st. left on the needle on all the st. of the 10th round, and on the following st. of the 9th round, which were left unnoticed. 12th to 15th pr. on the whole row of st., but at the beginning of the 12th, 14th, and 15th pr. (the under edge of the girdle) widen 1 st. each. The 16th pr. is shortened at the upper and under edge of the girdle by 7 st. each. Work the 17th to 21st pr. over the whole row of st. again, but at the beginning of the 18th and 20th pr. widen 1 st. each. The 22d pr. is shortened at the under edge of the girdle by 5 st. and at the upper edge by 6 st. 23d to 27th pr. on the whole row of st., but widen 1 st. each at the beginning of the 24th and 26th pr. The 28th pr. is shortened by 5 st. each at the upper and under edge of the girdle. 29th to 33d pr. on the whole row of st., but widen 1 st. each at the beginning of the 29th, 31st, and 33d pr. The 34th pr. is shortened at the upper edge of the girdle by 5 st., and at the under edge by 4 st. 35th and 36th pr. over the whole row of st. This completes one-half of the front; work the second half like the first half in connection with the latter, but in reversed succession of the pr.; besides this, in working this half, narrow at the under edge of the girdle in the same proportion that the widening was previously done in. For the right back piece of the girdle make a foundation of 34 st., beginning at the back edge, and on this foundation crochet 10 pr., leaving the number of st. unchanged. At the beginning of the following (the 11th) pr. work 1 sl. (slip stitch) on each of the first 6 vertical veins of st. of the preceding pr.; then take up one loop from each of the following 13 veins of st., and work 1 sl. on each of the remaining 5 vertical veins of st.; now work 6 ch. (the latter form a button-hole), cast off the following 13 st., work 5 ch., and fasten to the 1st sl. at the beginning of the pr. with 1 sl. Now work 20 pr. on the whole row of st.; in the 1st of these 20 pr. take up one loop each from the 5 ch. at the side edge of the work, and from the first 5 ch. of the 6 ch. at the other end of the work, so that the pr. counts 25 st. all together. In the 5th, 9th, 13th, 18th, and 19th of the 20 pr. widen 1 st. each at the beginning of each 1st round (the under edge of the girdle). Begin the second back piece from the side edge with a foundation of 30 st., and on this work 31 pr.; at the beginning of the 1st round of the 2d, 3d, 8th, 12th, and 16th pr. narrow 1 st. each. Finally crochet 1 sl. on each vertical vein of stitches of the 31st round. For the side pieces of the girdle, which are knitted in rounds, going backward and forward, with two medium-sized steel knitting-needles, make a foundation of 36 st. (the under edge), and on this knit as many rounds in simple ribbed design, alternately 2 st. knit plain, 2 st. purled, until the part is as long as the side edge of the crocheted front (58 rounds in the original). Work the edge st. of one side edge of a knitted part together with the side edge of the crocheted front from the under side by means of single crochet, so that the foundation st. of the knitted part form the under edge of the girdle, while the st. still on the needle of the last round form a straight line with the upper edge of the front. Join the still free side edge of each knitted part with the side edge of the corresponding back part in a similar manner. Take up the edge st. at the upper edge of the front and of each back part on separate knitting-needles; not only the vertical edge stitch of each pr., however, but also the horizontal edge st., so that 2 st. may be knitted on each pr. Now knit on all these edge stitches, and at the same time on the stitches of the last round of the side pieces, 16 rounds, going backward and forward. In the ribbed design of the side pieces, always alternately 2 st. knit plain, 2 st. purled; but at the beginning of the 1st round care should be taken that the ribs of the knitted side pieces are continued without a break. After working the 16th round cast off each 2 st. of one rib together as 1 st. Work 3 rounds of single crochet, going backward and forward, on the under edge of the girdle. In doing this always pass the needle through both upper veins of each st. The second round is continued also along the back edge of the right back; but along the latter form four button-holes at regular intervals, working 4 ch. at the relative place, and passing over three edge stitches. In the 3d round work 4 sc. on each ch. scallop of the back edge, and on each sc. there work 1 sc. Finally crochet 1 picot round on the under edge of the girdle. Each picot consists of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of the 5 ch. After working each picot, work 1 sc. on the third following stitch of the preceding round. Finally sew a large linen button behind each of the two button-holes formed in the 11th pr. of the right back; furnish the back edge of the left back of the girdle with two crocheted button-loops corresponding to the two buttons referred to, and furnish this part with four buttons, at a distance of three inches and one-fifth from the back edge; in order to fasten the buttons well this part must be faced there with a strip of flannel. In buttoning the girdle the back pieces overlap and underlap each other about three inches and one-fifth wide. In adjusting the girdle draw the button-loops of the left back piece through the two button-holes of the right back piece to the outside and over the buttons behind the button-holes.

Tatted Rosette for Lingerie, etc.

See illustration on page 453.

THIS rosette is worked with tatting cotton No. 80, with one thread (shuttle). Begin at one of the middle rings, working 8 ds. (double stitch—that is, 1 stitch right, 1 stitch left), 1 p. (picot) three-tenths of an inch long, 8 ds., and close this row of stitches in a ring; * turn the work after an interval of three-tenths of an inch of thread, work one of the outer rings of 3 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., 6 times alternately 1 p., 2 ds.; then again 1 p., 3 ds., 1 p., 3 ds.; after a thread interval of three-tenths of an inch work one ring like the preceding one; instead of forming the first p. in this ring, however, fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring. Turn the work, and after a thread interval of three-tenths of an inch work 1 ring of 8 ds., fasten to p. of the 1st ring, 8 ds. Repeat from *, fastening all the outer rings to each other as shown by the illustration. After working the last outer ring fasten the working thread, after an interval of three-tenths of an inch, to the first outer ring there, at the closing of stitches, and cut it off.

See illustration on page 453.

THIS border is worked in cross stitch with filling silk and zephyr worsted. It is suitable for bordering carpets, for window cushions, chairs, sofas, etc. The colors are given in the description of symbols.

UNDER THE MOON.

BY KATE PUTNAM OSGOOD.

LIKE a lily-flower uplifted
Full blown on the blue tide-sway,
Into the heaven blossoms
The perfect moon of May.

White under her own white glory
She sees, on the green young ground,
The fallen bloom of the cherry
Drift over a double mound.

There, where the cottage chimneys
Peer dim through a mist of trees,
They sat by the hearth at evening,
With the child about their knees.

Three empty seats by the fireside,
Two graves 'neath the orchard bough:
The dead are at rest together;
But where is the living now?

Pale in the smoky circle
That fain would shadow her noon,
Over the lights of the city
Trembles the large May moon.

But blind to that searching splendor,
Deaf to the riotous street,
He lies in a drunken slumber—
The child that played at their feet.

Were it not well, in the cradle,
Long since the babe had died?
Had the little head-stone risen
Those two green mounds beside?

Nay, this is not the ending,
O child of their love and prayer!
God's moon is one in the heavens,
His mercy every where.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XVIII.

SOMETHING FATAL.

AT seven o'clock Mr. Lovel composed himself for his after-dinner nap, and Clarissa, being free to dispose of herself as she pleased till about nine, at which hour the tea-tray was wont to be brought into the parlor, put on her hat and went out into the village. It would be daylight till nearly eight, and moonlight after that, for the moon rose early, as Miss Lovel remembered. She had a fancy to look at the familiar old place again—the quiet village street, with its three or four primitive shops, and single inn lying back a little from the road, and with a flock of pigeons and other feathered creatures always on the patch of grass before it; the low, white-walled cottages, in which there were only friendly faces for her. That suggestion of a foreign home had made her native village newly dear to her.

She had not held much intercourse with these Arden people since her coming home. The sense of her inability to help them in any substantial way had kept her aloof from them. She had not the gift of preaching, or of laying down the laws of domestic economy, whereby she might have made counsel and admonition serve instead of gold or silver. Being able to give them nothing, she felt herself better out of the way; but there were two or three households upon which she had contrived to bestow some small benefits—a little packet of groceries bought with her scanty pocket-money, a jar of good soup that she had coaxed her father's housekeeper to make, and so on—and in which her visits had been very welcome.

All was very quiet this evening. Clarissa went through the village without meeting any one she knew. The gate of the church-yard stood open, and Arden church-yard was a favorite spot with Clarissa. A solemn old place, shadowed by funereal yews and spreading cedars, which must have been trees of some importance before the Hanoverian succession. There was a narrow foot-path between two rows of tall, quaint old tombstones, with skulls and cross-bones cut upon the moss-grown stone; a path leading to another gate, which opened upon a wide patch of heath skirted by a scanty fir wood. This was the wildest bit of landscape about Arden, and Clarissa loved it with all an artist's love. She had sketched that belt of fir-trees under almost every condition—with the evening sun behind them, standing blackly out against the warm crimson light; or later, when the day had left no more than a faint opal glimmer in the western sky; later still, in the fair summer moonlight, or on a blusterous autumn afternoon, tossed by the pitiless wind. There was a poetry in the scene that seemed to inspire her pencil, and yet she could never quite satisfy herself. In short, she was not Turner; and that wood and sky needed the pencil of a Turner to translate them fully. This evening she had brought her pocket sketch-book with her. It was the companion of all her lonely walks.

She sat down upon the low boundary wall of the church-yard, close by the rustic wooden gate through which she had come, facing the heath and the fir wood, and took out her sketch-book. There was always something new; inexhaustible Nature had ever some fresh lesson for her. But this evening she sat idle for a long time with her pencil in her hand; and when at last she began to draw it was no feature of heathy ridge or dark fir wood, but a man's face, that appeared upon the leaf.

It was a face that she had drawn very often lately in her idle moods, half unconsciously sometimes—a bold, handsome face, that offered none of those difficulties by which some countenances baffle the skill of a painter. It was the face of a man of whom she had told herself that it was a sin even to think; but the face haunted her somehow, and it seemed as if her pencil reproduced it in spite of herself.

She was thinking, as she drew, of Lady Geraldine's postponed wedding. It would have been better that the marriage should have taken place; better that the story should have ended to-day, and that the frail link between herself and George Fairfax should have been broken. That accident of Lord Calderwood's death had made every thing more or less uncertain. Would the marriage ever take place? Would George Fairfax, with ample leisure for deliberation, hold himself bound by his promise, and marry a woman to whom he had confessed himself indifferent?

She was brooding over this question when she heard the thud of a horse's hoofs upon the grass, and, looking up, saw a man riding toward her. He was leaning across his horse's head, looking down at her in the next moment—a dark figure shutting out the waving line of fir-trees and the warm light in the western sky.

"What are you doing there, Miss Lovel?" asked a voice that went straight to her heart. Who shall say that it was deeper or sweeter than common voices? but for her it had a thrilling sound.

She started and dropped her book. George Fairfax dismounted, tied his horse's bridle to the church-yard gate, and picked up the little sketch-book.

"My portrait!" he cried, recognizing the carelessly penciled head. "Then you do think of me a little, Clarissa! Do you know that I have been prowling about Arden for the last two hours, waiting and watching for you? I have ridden past your father's cottage twenty times, I think, and was on the point of giving up all hope and galloping back to Hale, when I caught sight of a familiar figure from that road yonder."

He had taken a knife from his pocket, and was deliberately cutting out the leaf from Miss Lovel's sketch-book.

"I shall keep this, Clarissa—this one blessed scrap of evidence that you do sometimes think of me."

"I think of a good many people in the same manner," she said, smiling, with recovered self-possession. "I have very few acquaintance whose likenesses I have not attempted in some fashion."

"But you have attempted mine very often," he answered, looking over the leaves of the book. "Yes, here is my profile among bits of foliage, and scroll-work, and all the vagabond thoughts of your artistic brain. You shall not snub me, Clarissa. You do think of me—not as I think of you, perhaps, by day and night, but enough for my encouragement, almost enough for my happiness. Good Heavens, how angry I have been with you during the last few weeks!"

"What right had you to be angry with me, Mr. Fairfax?"

"The sublime right of loving you. To my mind that constitutes a kind of moral ownership. And to see you flirting with that fellow Granger, and yet have to hold my peace! But, thank God, all pretenses are done with. I recognize the event of to-day as an interposition of Providence. As soon as I can decently do so I shall tell Lady Geraldine the truth."

"You will not break your engagement—at such a time—when she has double need of your love?" cried Clarissa, indignantly.

She saw the situation from the woman's point of view, and it was of Geraldine Challoner's feelings she thought at this crisis. George Fairfax weighed nothing in the scale against that sorrowing daughter. And yet she loved him.

"My love she never had, and never can have; nor do I believe that honor compels me to make myself miserable for life. Of course I shall not disturb her in the hour of her grief by any talk about our intended marriage; but, so soon as I can do so with kindness, I shall let her know the real state of my feelings. She is too generous to exact any sacrifice from me."

"And you will make her miserable for life, perhaps?"

"I am not afraid of that. I tell you, Clarissa, it is not in her cold, proud nature to care much for any man. We can invent some story to account for the rupture which will save her womanly pride. The world can be told that it is she who has broken the engagement. All that will be easily settled. Poor Lord Calderwood! Don't imagine that I am not heartily sorry for him; he was always a good friend to me; but his death has been most opportune. It has saved me, Clarissa. But for that I should have been a married man this night, a bound slave for evermore. You can never conceive the gloomy, dogged spirit in which I was going to my doom. Thank God, the release came; and here, sitting by your side, a free man, I feel how bitter a bondage I have escaped."

He put his arm round Clarissa, and tried to draw her toward him; but she released herself from him with a quick, proud movement, and rose from her seat on the low wall. He rose at the same moment, and they stood facing each other in the darkening twilight.

"And what then, Mr. Fairfax?" she said, trembling a little, but looking him steadily in the face, nevertheless. "When you have behaved like a traitor, and broken your engagement, what then?"

"What then? Is there any possible doubt what must come then? You will be my wife, Clarissa!"

"You think that I would be an accomplice in such cruelty? You think that I could be so basely ungrateful to Lady Laura, my first friend? Yes, Mr. Fairfax, the first friend I ever had, except my aunt, whose friendship has always seemed a kind of duty. You think that after all her goodness to me I could have any part in breaking her sister's heart?"

"I think there is one person whose feelings you overlook in this."

"And who is that?"

"Myself. You seem to forget that I love you, and that my happiness depends upon you. Are you going to stand upon punctilio, Clarissa, and break my heart because Laura Armstrong has been civil to you?"

Clarissa smiled—a very mournful smile.

"I do not believe you are so dreadfully in earnest," she said. "If I did—"

"If you did, what then, Clarissa?"

"It might be different. I might be foolish enough, wicked enough— But I am sure that this folly of yours is no more than a passing fancy. You will go away and forget all about me. You would be very sorry by-and-by if I were weak enough to take you at your word; just as sorry as you are now for your engagement to Lady Geraldine. Come, Mr. Fairfax, let us both be sensible, if we can, and let there be an end of this folly for evermore between us. Good-night; I must go home. It is half past eight o'clock, and at nine papa has his tea."

"You shall go home in time to pour out Mr. Lovel's tea; but you shall hear me out first, Clarissa, and you shall confess to me. I will not be kept in the dark."

And then he urged his cause, passionately, eloquently, or with that which seemed eloquence to the girl of nineteen, who heard him, with pale cheeks and fast-throbbing heart, and yet tried to seem unmoved. Plead as he might, he could win no admission from her. It was only in her eyes, which could not look denial, on her tremulous lips, which could not simulate coldness, that he read her secret. There he saw enough to make him happy and triumphant.

"Say what you please, my pitiless one," he cried at last; "in less than three months you shall be my wife!"

The church clock chimed the three-quarters. He had no excuse for keeping her any longer.

"Come, then, Clarissa," he said, drawing her hand through his arm; "let me see you to your father's door."

"But your horse—you can't leave him here?"

"Yes, I can. I don't suppose any one will steal him in a quarter of an hour or so; and I dare say we shall meet some village urchin whom I can send to take care of him."

"There is no occasion. I am quite accustomed to walk about Arden alone."

"Not at this hour. I have detained you, and am bound to see you safely lodged."

"But if papa should hear—"

"He shall hear nothing. I'll leave you within a few yards of his gate."

It was no use for her to protest; so they went back to within half a dozen paces of Mill Cottage arm in arm, not talking very much, but dangerously happy in each other's company.

"I shall see you again very soon, Clarissa," George Fairfax said. And then he asked her to tell him her favorite walks; but this she refused to do.

"No matter. I shall find you out in spite of your obstinacy. And remember, child, you owe nothing to Laura Armstrong, except the sort of kindness she would show to any pretty girl of good family. You are as necessary to her as the orchids on her dinner-table. I don't deny that she is a warm-hearted little woman, with a great deal that is good in her—just the right sort of woman to dispense a large fortune. But I shall make matters all right in that quarter, and at once."

They were now as near Mill Cottage as Mr. Fairfax considered it prudent to go. He stopped, released Clarissa's hand from his arm, only to lift it to his lips and kiss it—the tremulous little ungloved hand which had been sketching his profile when he surprised her, half an hour before, on the church-yard wall.

There was not a creature on the road before them as they stood thus in the moonlight; but, in spite of this appearance of security, they were not unobserved. A pair of angry eyes watched them from across a clipped holly hedge in front of the cottage—the eyes of Marmaduke Lovel, who had ventured out in the soft September night to smoke his after-dinner cigar.

"Good-night, Clarissa," said George Fairfax; "I shall see you again very soon."

"No, no; I don't wish to see you. No good can come of our seeing each other."

"You will see me, whether you wish or not. Good-night. There is nine striking. You will be in time to pour out papa's tea."

He let go the little hand, which he had held till now, and went away. When Clarissa came to the gate she found it open, and her father standing by it. She drew back with a guilty start.

"Pray come in," said Mr. Lovel, in his most ceremonious tone. "I am very glad that a happy accident has enabled me to become familiar with your new habits. Have you learned to give clandestine meetings to your lovers at Hale Castle? Have I to thank Lady Laura for this novel development of your character?"

"I don't know what you mean, papa. I was sitting in the church-yard just now, sketching, when Mr. Fairfax rode up to me. He stopped, talking a little, and then insisted on seeing me home. That is all."

"That is all. And so it was George Fairfax—the bridegroom that was to have been—who kissed your hand just now in that lover-like fashion. Pray come in-doors; I think this is a business that requires to be discussed between us quietly."

"Believe me, you have no reason to be angry, papa," pleaded Clarissa; "nothing could have been farther from my thoughts than the idea of meeting Mr. Fairfax to-night."

"I have heard that kind of denial before, and know what it is worth," answered her father, coldly. "And pray, if he did not come here to meet you, may I ask what motive brought Mr. Fairfax to Arden to-night? His proper place would have been at Hale Castle, I should have supposed."

"I don't know, papa. He may have come to Arden for a ride. Every thing is in confusion at the Castle. I scarcely think he would be wanted there."

"You scarcely think! And you encourage him to follow you here—this man who was to have been married to Lady Geraldine Challoner to-day—and you let him kiss your hand, and part from you with the air of a lover. I am ashamed of you, Clarissa. This business is odious enough in itself to provoke the anger of any father, if there were not circumstances in the past to make it trebly hateful to me."

They had passed in at the open window by this time, and were standing in the lamp-lit parlor, which had a pretty air of home comfort, with its delicate tea-service and quaintly shaped silver urn. Mr. Lovel sank into his arm-chair with a faint groan, and, looking at him in the full light of the lamp, Clarissa saw that he was deadly pale.

"Do you know that the father of that man was my deadliest foe?" he exclaimed.

"How should I know that, papa?"

"How should you know it!—no. But that you should choose that man for your secret lover! One would think there was some hereditary curse upon your mother's race, binding her and hers with that hateful name. I tell you, Clarissa, that if there had been no such creature as Temple Fairfax, my life might have been as bright a one as any man need hope for. I owe every misery of my existence to that man."

"Did he injure you so deeply, papa?"

"He did me the worst wrong that one man can do to another. He came between me and the woman I loved; he stole your mother's heart from me, Clarissa, and imbittered both our lives."

He stopped, and covered his face with his hand. Clarissa could see that the hand trembled. She had never seen her father so moved before. She, too, was deeply moved. She drew a chair close to him, and sat down by his side, but dared not speak.

"It is just as well that you should hear the story from me," he said, after a long pause. "You may hear hints and whispers about it from other people by-and-by, perhaps, if you go more into society; for it was known to several. It is best you should know the truth. It is a common story enough in the history of the world; but whenever it happens it is enough to make the misery of one man's life. I was not always what you have known me, Clarissa—a worn-out machine, dawdling away the remnant of a wasted existence. I once had hopes and passions like the rest of mankind—perhaps more ardent than the most. Your mother was the loveliest and most fascinating woman I ever met, and from the hour of our first meeting I had but one thought—how I should win her for my wife. It was not a prudent marriage. She was my equal by birth; but she was the daughter of a ruined spendthrift, and had learned extravagance and recklessness in her very nursery. She thought me much richer than I was, and I did not care to undeceive her. Later, when we were married, and I could see that her extravagant habits were hastening my ruin, I was still too much a moral coward to tell her the naked truth. I could not bear to come between her and caprices that seemed a natural accompaniment to her charms. I was weakness itself in all that concerned her."

"And she loved you, papa?" said Clarissa, softly. "I am sure she must have loved you."

"That is a question that I have never answered with any satisfaction to myself. I thought she loved me. She liked me well enough, I believe, till that man crossed her path, and might have learned to like me better as she grew older and wiser, and rose above the slavery of frivolous pleasures. But in the most evil hour of her life she met Temple Fairfax, and from that hour her heart was turned from me. We were traveling, trying to recover from the expenses of the Court and a house perpetually full of my wife's set; and it was at Florence that we first encountered the Colonel. He had just returned from India, had been doing great things there, and was considered rather a distinguished person in Florentine society. I need not stop to describe him. His son is like him. He and I became friends, and met almost daily. It was not till a year afterward that I knew how pitiful a dupe of this man's treachery I had been from the very first. We were still in Italy when I made my first discovery; it was one that let in the light upon his character, but did not seriously involve my wife. We fought, and I was wounded. When I recovered I brought my wife home to Arden. Our year's retrenchment had left me poorer than when I left home. Your mother's beauty was a luxury not to be maintained more cheaply at Florence than in Yorkshire."

There was another pause, and then Marmaduke Lovel went on, in the same bitter tone:

"Within a short time of our return your brother was born. There are things that I can not even hint to you, Clarissa; but there have been times when the shadow of that man has come between me and my children. Passion has made me unjust. I know that in her worst sin against my love—for I went on loving her to the last—your mother remained what the world calls innocent. But years after I had believed there was an end of all communion between those two I discovered letters, even stolen meetings—rare, I confess, and never without witnesses, but no less a treason against me. Colonel Fairfax had friends at Holborough, by whose aid he contrived to see my wife. That he urged her to leave me I know, and that she was steadfast in her refusal to do me that last wrong. But I know, too, that she loved him. I have read the confession of that which she called her 'madness' under her own hand."

"Soon after your birth she began to fade. From my heart I believe it was this struggle between passion and the last remnant of honor that killed her. I need not tell you the details of my discoveries, some of them made not very long before her death. They led to bitter scenes between us; but I thank God I did believe her protestations of innocence, and that I kept her under my own roof. There were others not so merciful. Colonel Fairfax's wife was told of his devotion to mine at Florence, and the duel which ended our acquaintance. She found out something of his subsequent meetings with your mother, and her jealousy brought about a separation. It was managed quietly enough, but not without scandal; and nothing but my determination to maintain my wife's position could have saved her from utter disgrace. Yes, Clarissa, I loved her to the last; but the misery of that last year was something that no words can tell. She died in my arms, and in her latest hour of consciousness thanked me for what she called my generosity. I went straight from her funeral to London, with a bundle of letters in my pocket, to find Temple Fairfax. What might have happened between us, had we met, I can scarcely guess; but there were no scruples on my side. Fortune favored him, however; he had sailed for India a few weeks before in command of his regiment. I had some thoughts of following him even there, but abandoned the notion. My wrongs would keep. I waited for his return, but that never happened. He was killed in Afghanistan, and carried to his Indian grave the reputation of one of the worst men and best soldiers who ever bore the king's commission."

This was all. To speak of these things had profoundly agitated Marmaduke Lovel: but a sudden impulse had moved this man, who was apt to be so silent about himself and his own feelings, and he had been in a manner constrained to tell this story.

"You can understand now, I suppose, Clarissa," he said, coldly, after another pause, "why this young man, George Fairfax, is hateful to me."

"Yes, papa. It is only natural that you should be prejudiced against him. Does he know, do you think—" She faltered and stopped, with a bitter sense of shame.

"Does he know what?"

"About the past?"

"Of course he must know. Do you suppose his mother has not told him her grievances?"

Clarissa remembered Mrs. Fairfax's cold manner, and understood the reason of that tacit avoidance which had wounded her so deeply. She, too, no doubt, was hateful; as hateful to the injured wife of Colonel Fairfax as his son could be to her father.

"And now, Clarissa," said Mr. Lovel, "remember that any acquaintance between you and George Fairfax is most repugnant to me. I have told you this story in order that there may be no possibility of any mistake between us. God only knows what it costs a man to open old wounds as I have opened mine to-night. Only this afternoon you affected a considerable regard for me, which I promised to return to the best of my power. All that is a dead letter if you hold any communion with this man. Choose him for your friend, and renounce me for your father. You can not have both."

"He is not my friend, papa; he is nothing to me. Even if there were no such thing as this prejudice on your part, I am not so dishonorable as to forget that Mr. Fairfax is engaged to Lady Geraldine."

"And you promise that there shall be no more meetings, no repetition of the kind of thing I saw to-night?"

"I promise, papa, that of my own free-will I will never see him again. Our meeting to-night was entirely accidental."

"On your part, perhaps; but was it so on his?"

"I can not tell that, papa."

Mr. Lovel felt himself obliged to be satisfied with this answer. It seemed to him a hard thing that the son of his enemy should arise thus to torment him—an accident that might have tempted a superstitious man to think that an evil fate brooded over his house: and Marmaduke Lovel's mind, being by no means strongly influenced by belief, was more or less tainted with superstition. Looked at from any point of view, it was too provoking that this man should cross Clarissa's pathway at the very moment when it was all-important to her destiny that her heart should be untouched, her fancy unfettered.

"If nothing comes of this Granger business, I shall take her abroad," Mr. Lovel said to himself; "any thing to get her out of the way of a Fairfax."

He drank his tea in silence, meditating upon that little scene in the moonlight, and stealing a look at his daughter every now and then, as she sat opposite to him pretending to read. He could see that the open book was the merest pretense, and that Clarissa was profoundly agitated. Was it her mother's story that had moved her so deeply, or that other, newer story which George Fairfax might have been whispering to her just now in the lonely moonlit road? Mr. Lovel was disturbed by this question, but did not care to seek any farther explanation from his daughter. There are some subjects that will not bear discussion.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE Parisians, with characteristic elasticity, are rising from the ruins of their city, and shaking off the gloom which has overshadowed them. Citizens are returning in great numbers—many, it is true, to find their homes desolated; but the Parisians do not let trouble rest heavily upon them, and they will soon make other homes for themselves. Fearful as have been the scenes of the past months—the very memory of which would seem to us like ever-haunting ghosts—there is already, it is said, some manifest return to the fashion and gayety of former times. With a hopefulness almost strange even in the versatile Parisians, they look away from the past to the future. Yet we may fancy how many sad and desolated hearts bleed in secret over the ruin of what has been so dear to them—mothers, wives, and children bereft of all.

From Paris come numerous items of interest concerning the present aspect of affairs, from which we select only a few: Ten thousand laborers are employed in removing barricades, and in cleansing Paris and removing obstacles in the thoroughfares.—According to an estimate the destruction of property in Paris, including houses, furniture, securities, works of art, etc., amounted to £32,000,000. Merchandise to the value of £24,000,000 is also said to have been destroyed.—Workmen have already commenced to clear away the ruins of the Palais Royal, and to search in the dreadful mass of rubbish for metal objects which may be utilized. Pieces of glass are seen blended into strange figures from the heat. Stones became vitrified, and visitors to the spot are shown very peculiar amalgamations of metal, lime, shot, and porcelain.—One hundred and sixteen thousand muskets have been collected in one quarter of Paris.—The treasures of art in the Hôtel Cluny have escaped damage, and the building itself is only slightly injured.—The most valuable paintings of the Louvre are in the arsenal at Brest. Rubens's works are uninjured. The Venus de Milo is buried, and it is said that only three people in Paris know where it is secreted.

An English journal thinks that New York purchasers of diamonds are very difficult to suit. It states that the finest diamonds sold in Europe of late years have found their way to the United States, and that many gems highly regarded in France have been rejected by American commissioners.

An officer stationed at Fort Brady, Michigan, gives, in a private letter, a little sketch of the village of Sault St. Marie, which may interest those of our readers who have little idea of the social aspects of this far-away place. Sault St. Marie is situated on each side of the St. Mary's River, at the entrance to Lake Superior. The writer says:

"The village on the other side seems the pleasantest, probably because it is more distant; then, too, the green trees and the river in the foreground add much to its beauty. As a rule, all houses more than one story or a story and a half are public buildings. The inhabitants on both sides are mostly Indians, half-breeds, and traders of the Jewish persuasion. Just outside the reservation, or, as is claimed by the government, upon the reservation, is a convent, and it is quite romantic to be awakened early in the morning by the ringing of the bells calling the devout sisters to matins. This is a very ordinary frame building, with a very large bell attached. The great event of the place is the arrival of a boat. As soon as the deep, sonorous whistle is heard all the town turns out, and Indians, half-breeds, and dogs run down to the dock to meet it. It is amusing to look down the solitary street and watch the change. In a moment all work is abandoned, and the unwashed and uncivilized appear in droves where all was quiet as the grave. The dogs fight, and the half-breeds gabble, and make all sorts of ridiculous motions with their hands. The falls are just above, and are visible from my windows. The water falls from twelve to fifteen feet within a distance of a quarter of a mile, but the descent is gradual over rocks and stones, and is not very imposing. It resembles the rapids just above Niagara Falls. In the winter the mails are brought twice a week by dog trains from Marquette, eighty-five miles distant, which connects by rail with Detroit. Whatever isothermal circle Sault St. Marie may be in, it is sufficient to send the mercury down to twenty-five or thirty degrees below zero, where it remains all winter."

A law case which has puzzled two learned courts in Ireland, lately, turned on the identity of a parrot. Two maiden ladies living near Dublin had each a gray parrot, and each parrot had a red tail. Both ladies lost their precious birds about the same time. One gray parrot with a red tail was discovered in the neighborhood, and, of course, each of the bereaved spinsters claimed it as her own. Miss Plunkett first obtained possession of the feathered warbler; but Miss Farelly declared, with the shrillness of desperation, that Poll belonged to her, and brought suit for the recovery of her property. Neither of the two courts to which the cause was carried found itself able to determine whether the bird exhibited was the one lost by the plaintiff, or that belonging to the defendant—whether it was Polly Plunkett or Polly Farelly. And so the case was dismissed, and Miss Plunkett kept the bird. But we venture to say that before American lawyers would have let such a cause go out of court they would have cross-examined the parrot.

There are seventeen Japanese students connected with Rutgers College, at New Brunswick. At the Polytechnic Institute, Brooklyn, there are also several students, among whom is, practically, the uncle of the reigning Mikado—a Japanese prince of royal blood. We doubt whether it will be of much service to our readers to know the names of these Japanese; but here are a few as a specimen: Azuma, Takahiko, Foozimori, Shuitziro, Ikagawa, Motoi, Magome, Tameske, Takato, Shioji, Yangimoto, Naotaro.

Not long ago the young Japanese prince above referred to, who is heir-apparent to the imperial throne, was so unfortunate as to be attacked with measles. The fact was telegraphed to Japan, and created much alarm for a time, as this disease is very fatal in that country. Fortunately the prince has recovered.

The majority of the guests at Niagara Falls are, thus far, from the Southern States.—Newport will be made more comfortable this season than usual, in consequence of a city ordinance which has been passed to protect passengers landing from steamboats and railroads from the annoyance which hackmen generally feel authorized to inflict.—It is estimated that there will be three or four thousand more visitors at Long Branch this season than there were last.—Saratoga will feel comparatively safe from the perils of fire this year, thanks to the introduction of new water-works into the village.

A "winged porcupine," about an inch in length, is the latest entomological discovery in New Jersey. It has wings, beneath which are concealed a number of quills half an inch long. If any one interferes with this specimen it shoots out these splinters, which bury themselves in the flesh, causing an irritation like the bite of a mosquito.

Some one who bewails the increasing tendency to fashionable display and expenditure at weddings predicts that the day is not far distant when fence-posters will appear in the following style:

"GRANDEST NUPTIAL OF THE SEASON.—The lovely —— to the manly ——. Several novelties never before presented. New music, new dresses, new properties. Tickets, $1; reserved seats (middle aisle), 50 cents extra. N.B.—All persons occupying reserved seats are assured that their full names will be mentioned in the society papers."

In the mean time, however, persons of moderate views will find sensible suggestions, and fresh yet not too costly styles and patterns of wedding gear, in the pages of the Bazar.

One of the severest cases of personal affliction lately recorded is that of a Mr. Hawley, baggage-master at the railway dépôt in Springfield. While getting out a heavy trunk from the baggage car of a newly arrived train he was thrown down by the concussion of the backward-coming engine hitting the train, and in falling with his trunk hit another heavy trunk; this fell on his back, paralyzing his body and legs, and rendering him completely helpless. On his way to his home in New Hartford he was informed of the sudden death of his wife. The poor woman dropped on hearing, by telegraph, of her husband's misfortune, and died immediately. And a few days after his arrival at home he witnessed the death of his child.

There are at least a dozen persons in England engaged in the manufacture of sermons—so says a writer in St. Paul's Magazine. The terms vary with the quality of the article supplied; but about twenty-five dollars, gold, would secure to a country parson a supply of needful sermons without any wear and tear of brains. A regular church-goer in an English village is of opinion that the general stock of sermons possessed by the vicar has been preached forty-eight times, or has made forty-eight revolutions, and that they are already far advanced in the forty-ninth cycle. He believes them to have been written about seventy-five years ago.

They have a mild way of dealing with thieves in West Virginia. A newspaper published in that section of the country prints the following advertisement: "If the lady (?) who has been using my coal for the past few months will please call upon the next neighbor for her future supply, she will much oblige, as my stock is about exhausted."

An amusing sensation scene, not in the programme, recently occurred at the Theatre Royal, Manchester, England. The curtain was raised for Mr. Toole to address the Court, in re Bardell against Pickwick, when the whole of the jury mysteriously disappeared, their box suddenly giving way and ingulfing the good men and true. At first the vast audience who crowded every part of the theatre were silent, fearing some dreadful accident had occurred; but as the unlucky jurymen rapidly reappeared unhurt, though looking very foolish, they broke out into a perfect hurricane of laughter, which lasted several minutes. The curtain had to be dropped to allow the jury to be boxed again, and when Mr. Toole began his address he provoked another burst of risibility by alluding to the jury as "that worthy body of steadfast and immovable men."

Twenty years ago a Boston tailor retired from business on account of failing health. For a few years past he had suffered much from dizziness. A short time ago a surgeon discovered and extracted from his body a common-sized needle, with double thread four inches in length attached. As he had used no needle of the kind for twenty years, the surgeon supposed he must have swallowed it anterior to that period, and is of the opinion that the working of the needle and thread through the system caused the dizziness. Since the operation the patient feels greatly relieved, and is improving in health.

The funds in the public offices in Paris were secured by an ingenious stratagem on the part of the Versailles government. These funds, amounting to $15,000,000 in specie, bonds, and bank-bills, were placed in a wagon used for conveying bread and potatoes from the charity hospital to the alms-house at Issy. The evening before this vehicle passed through the Issy gate a similar one was sent by the hospital manager on trial, and to disarm suspicion. The guard allowed it to pass, while at the same time the driver secured a pass for the next day, written in the usual unofficial style of the Commune. Next day the wagon containing the treasure, hidden under sacks of potatoes and loaves of bread, arrived at the same gate, and was stopped despite the written order. The guard who gave the pass was away, and his successor would not respect it. He proceeded to inspect the wagon, and having overturned some of the sacks was about to remove those which covered the treasure, when a lieutenant who commanded the post arrived, and called out, "I know all about that cart; let it pass." The vehicle passed out. An hour and a half later the $15,000,000 was safe in Versailles. The same evening the Commune learned all, and proclaimed that they were robbed. They sent orders to Issy to arrest the manager of the hospice, but he had followed the millions which he had helped to secure.

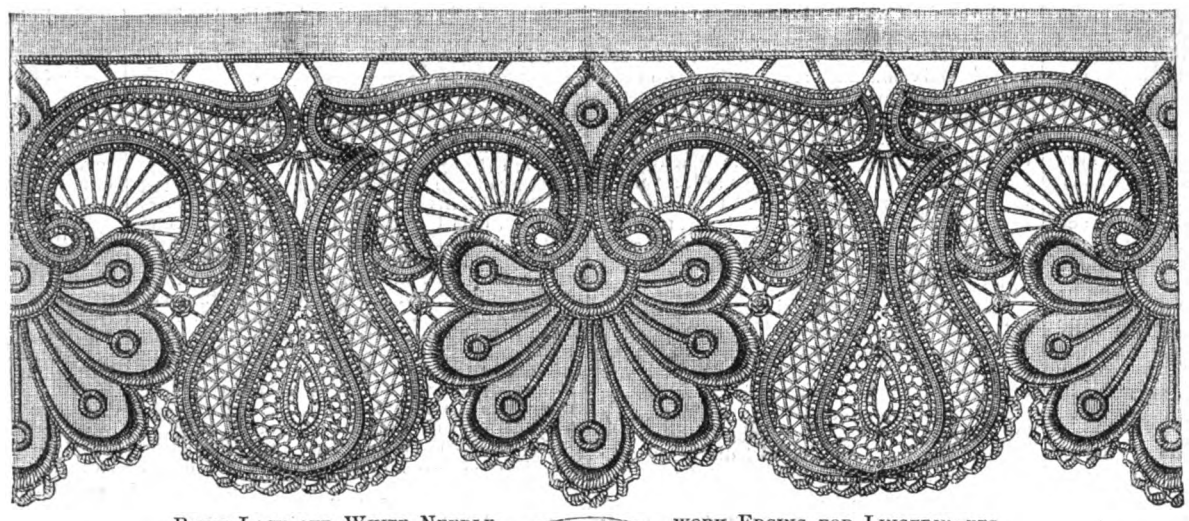
Point Lace and White Needle-work Edging for Lingerie, etc.

THIS edging may be used for ornamenting covers, lingerie, handkerchiefs, etc. Transfer the design to linen, work the requisite number of figures in white embroidery, baste them on the linen, and on the latter sew point lace braid, following the lines of the design. Where the point lace braid intersects the outer edge of the white embroidery figures, it must be fastened by a few stitches. In order to form the corners, lay the braid in a small pleat at each place required. Work in lace stitch as shown by the illustration, and make the picots at the outer edge. We would call the attention of any of our subscribers that may be unacquainted with the manner of working in point lace stitch to the directions for point lace embroidery given in Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 11, Vol. III. This lace is button-hole stitched to the edge of the material to be trimmed; short button-hole stitch bars are also worked between the button-hole stitched edge and the lace (see illustration).



POINT LACE AND WHITE NEEDLE-WORK EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Tapestry Designs for Covers of Pincushions, Emery Cushions, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE designs, of which the illustrations show one-quarter, are worked in cross stitch on canvas with zephyr worsted and filling silk. The description of symbols shows the colors to be used.

See illustration on page 457.

THIS design makes a very pretty cover for cigar-cases, needle-books, card-cases, etc. The foundation is of light brown leather. The principal lines of the design are worked with figured brown silk cord, which is sewed on with fine brown silk of the same shade; the short cross lines are worked with black silk twist, and edged with gold thread, while the knots between are worked with green silk. The figure on each side of the design is worked in satin stitch with green silk twist, and edged with gold thread; the little figure in the middle is worked in the same manner. The embroidery may, of course, be worked on velvet, cloth, or silk.

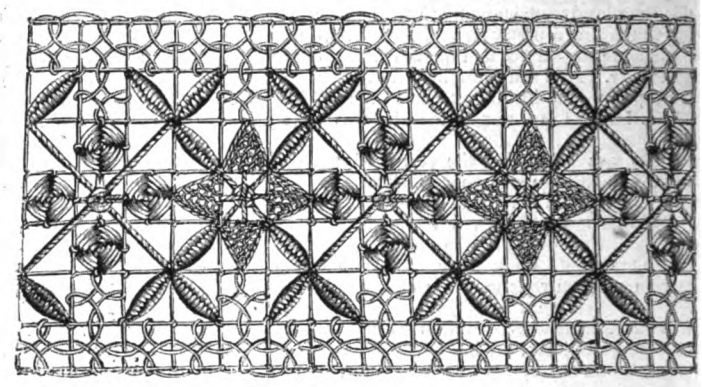

Fig. 2.—NETTED GUIPURE INSERTION FOR COVERS, PILLOW-SLIPS, ETC.

Netted Guipure Insertion for Covers, Pillow-Slips, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS insertion, which is suitable for trimming the above-named articles, as well as linen, is worked in straight netting with medium-sized thread on a netting mesh seven-tenths of an inch in circumference. The netted foundation of the border, Fig. 1, is then worked, as shown by the illustration, in point d'esprit and point de reprise, ornamented with wheels, and darned with glazed-cotton. The netted foundation of the border, Fig. 2, is also worked in point d'esprit and point de reprise; the triangular figures of the design are worked in button-hole stitch and ornamented with wheels.

Medallion for Porte-Monnaies, Cigar-Cases, etc. Colored Embroidery.

THIS medallion, which is suitable for the above-named purposes, and also for ornamenting baskets, etc., is worked in half-polka stitch and satin stitch on a foundation of the desired color of silk, satin, velvet, or gros grain. Work the embroidery with chêné, or parti-colored saddler's silk.

Design for Sofa-Pillow, etc. Application, Point Russe, and Satin Stitch Embroidery.

THIS design, of which the illustration shows one-quarter, is worked on a foundation of dark gray cloth. On this foundation two pieces of gray cloth of a lighter shade are button-hole stitched with gray saddler's silk of two shades. The application is also edged with diagonal half-polka stitches as shown by the illustration. Work the rose-buds on the foundation with chêné saddler's silk, and ornament the simulated ribbons in knotted and point Russe embroidery. The design may be worked on other material than silk, satin, or velvet; braid may be sewed on instead of the simulated ribbons, and the embroidery may be worked with various colored or plain saddler's silk. It is a beautiful pattern for a sofa-pillow or footstool.

Swiss Muslin Chemise Russe.

See illustrations on page 457.

THIS chemise Russe is made of Swiss muslin, trimmed with bands of Swiss muslin an inch and a quarter long and a quarter of an inch wide, through which two bands, corresponding in length to the neck of the chemise Russe, are braided in the manner shown by the illustration. At the points of intersection sew the bands together on the under side. To the upper edge of this trimming sew lace insertion three-quarters of an inch wide, headed with gathered lace. Trim the front edge of the right front with insertion edged with lace on both sides. Trim the sleeves in the same manner as the neck. Hem the bottom of the chemise Russe, and furnish it with strings for closing.

Tatted Rosettes, Figs. 1 and 2.

TWO LITTLE WORDS.

IF—BUT: paltry their worth—
Mere little words, you say?
Ah, friend of mine, they will rule the earth
Till the last man passes away!
The good they'll hold,
The bad enfold;
They'll conquer the strong and baffle the wise,
And stand at the heart of every surprise
From now till the Judgment-day.

If—but: warily fraught,
Often, as gentle as dew,
Gather and shine in a yearning thought,
Reflecting the heavenly blue.
Their ins and outs,
Their shades and doubts,
Lend to the grace of their clinging hold:
Rise! gird your soul with a valor bold,
Lest your very life they undo.

If—but: plausible pair!
Dangerous snares they cast,
Poisoning faith in a mental despair,
Or tangling advance with the past.
Shall this be so?
As God reigns, no!
Watchful in time, let us make them ours;
Strong by our strength, slaves of our powers,
Conquered and ruled at last!

SHIRTS VERSUS WIVES.

FIVE years had passed since Fred Lattimer and his wife Daisy had commenced life together, and so far they had lived in the utmost harmony.

She was an ambitious little woman, not in the sorosistical sense, but that she might please her husband, and make a happy home for him and the children. To carry out such an ambition is to be very unselfish and self-sacrificing. In spite of her many cares, Daisy was a bright and happy little wife; her husband was as the apple of her eye, and she was a gleam of sunshine to him. She managed her children with wisdom, and superintended her household prudently; she sang lullabys to quiet the baby, and clicked the sewing-machine when he slept; all the household sewing passed through her nimble fingers, and, in addition to all this, she made Fred's shirts! Every spring half a dozen linen, and every fall as many new cotton shirts, were, after being beautifully done up by Bridget, laid in Fred's bureau drawer.

Daisy liked to do this for Fred, and Fred was very proud of his wife's dainty workmanship.

At the gate of every paradise lingers a serpent, and there was one here, troubled and exasperated at the sight of so much domestic happiness; and I now proceed to chronicle his attempt to destroy it.

Fred was standing one morning before the glass adjusting his collar, and was noticing, with satisfaction, the satin-like smoothness of his shirt bosom. The demon of the shirt thought this a good time to commence his operations, so, perching on his shoulder, he whispered softly in his ear, "Don't you think your collar pulls just a little in the neck?" Fred started as the suggestion took form in his mind. "I do believe it does," he said to himself, "really. I wonder I never noticed that before. Yes, that certainly is very bad. Daisy must see to this at once." Then, raising his voice, he called to his wife, who was in the next room, "Daisy dear, come here a minute, won't you?"

"Yes, Fred," she replied; "just as soon as I get the baby out of his bath."

"There," whispered the demon; "that baby always comes first with her."

"That's so," acquiesced the husband. "Come, Daisy, can't you hurry up?" he called again, so impatiently that, wondering at his unwonted humor, she hurriedly wiped the pearly drops from baby's beautiful limbs, and, throwing a blanket over him, she laid him on the bed, and ran in, wiping her hands as she went on the baby's towel.

"Daisy," said her husband, "just look at this shirt of mine, won't you? It pulls me a little here in the neck. I think if you could manage to raise it a trifle in the back, it would make it looser here in front;" and he pulled impatiently at the offending garment as he spoke. As Daisy did not answer, he continued, "I think that all it wants is a gore or something in the back." Fred might as well have said a flounce, for all he knew about the merits or nature of either; but he liked to speak of gores and biases to show his perfect familiarity with the technicalities of sewing—the words have such a martial, manly sound, and it was his delight to suggest them as general remedies for all mistakes of the needle.

"I suppose," said Daisy, thoughtfully, "that I can rip off the band, and piece the shirt up in the back. But isn't it a pity to have it altered when it seems such a good fit?"

"A good fit!" repeated Fred; "why, I don't know what you can be thinking about, to say that. It don't fit me well at all."

"Why, Fred, how you do talk!" her little mouth puckering up the least bit in the world at his unusual tone. "I always thought you were satisfied with your shirts."

"So I have been," retorted Fred; "but can't a fellow grow? That's just the way with you women; you think there can be no improvement in any thing you do. I believe in progress. I am sure it won't hurt you to take these few stitches to please me, will it?"

"Oh no, Fred," said his wife; "I'll do it some time to-day. But there's the baby crying; I must run and dress him."

Fred took off the shirt, and marked with a pencil the width of a seam higher, which was all he thought it would need. The next one he put on had the same fault.

"The whole half dozen will have to be altered, of course," said the demon. "Daisy is so systematic that if there is a fault in one you will find it in all."

So Fred called out to his wife that he would leave the shirts lying on the bed, and that she might as well alter them all, and make one job of it.

After the baby had gone to sleep that morning the little wife sat down with the six shirts before her, and after several hours of unremitting industry the few stitches were completed, and the desired alteration made.

"Did you do my shirts to-day, Daisy?" was the first salutation of her husband as he came home at night.

"Oh yes, Fred," said she, kissing him; "and I hope now you will find them all right."

"Very well," said Fred; "I'll try one on after tea, and see."

After praising his wife's light biscuit, eating a whole beefsteak, and drinking three cups of coffee, he went to his room to try on the shirts, the demon following closely at his heels. Soon Fred's vexed voice brought Daisy to his side. "This won't do at all!" he exclaimed; "see what a bunch there is here in the back."

"That," she replied, "is the seam where I pieced it up; besides, when it was made higher in the back, it was a little longer than the band; so I held it in a little."

"Well," said Fred, angrily, "I won't have that great bunch in my back, I can tell you; the band must be made longer, if necessary."

"Then they won't fit your collars," she said.

"No matter," replied Fred; "I can't wear them this way;" and he looked cross and felt cross. He was already too much in the power of the demon to be polite to his wife.

"Can't you do these to-night?" said he, after a long silence. "I really want my shirts."

Poor Daisy! she was so tired; besides, there were all the button-holes in little Tommy's new pants, which she had promised him for his birthday, to-morrow, to be worked that evening. But after a moment's hesitation she said, as cheerfully as she could:

"Well, yes, if you'll give me the exact length you want the bands I will cut them out and baste them to-night, and sew them on with the machine in the morning."

"That's a dear," said Fred; "and I'll try them on and see if they are all right before you sew them."

Fred was in the habit of reading the paper to his wife while she sewed in the evening; but to-night, after he had cut out a paper measure for his shirt-band, he was so tired, and his shirt pulled so, that he couldn't read; besides, he wished that Daisy wouldn't sew evenings.

"Why," whispered the demon, "can't she leave the baby and her sewing and come down into the balcony and talk to you? Of course, to-night, she must do those shirts, but usually she is about some woman's nonsense or other."

Fred listened approvingly, and the demon perched on the balcony rail and chuckled at his success.

Daisy sat alone in her pretty sitting-room adjoining the nursery, and worked. A great cloud overshadowed her heart; but she loved her husband too well to believe that he had any thing to do with it, and she wondered what made her feel so tired and discouraged.

"Poor Fred!" she said to herself; "he must be tired too, for he hasn't read a word to me to-night. I hope he won't fall asleep on the balcony and catch cold."

The demon, now having thoroughly demoralized Fred, came up and sat on the back of her chair, and watched her a while draw the threads in the linen. Then he said, softly:

"Poor child! it is too bad to do such unnecessary work. Don't you find Fred's handkerchief when he loses it? Don't you brush his coat and part his back hair? Don't you listen when he reads to you those tiresome political speeches? Don't you always have what he likes for dinner? Are you not an accomplished housekeeper, a devoted mother, and a model wife? And he forgets all this in his vexation about a paltry shirt!"

Daisy wearily put aside the demon; but she could not help thinking that there was some truth in what he had said.

Just as she had finished the last button-hole in Tommy's pants Fred came up stairs.

"Well, Daisy," said he, so fretfully as to make the demon grin all over, "you are very sociable to-night."

"Why, Fred, I have been wondering all the evening why you didn't come up and talk to me; but I suppose, dear, you were too tired, weren't you?"—he doing nothing but pet the demon, while she, sewing away with a stitch in her side and a pain in her heart, was finding excuses for him.

"Of course I was," said her husband. "And now, if you have done my shirts, I wish you would put up your everlasting sewing."

"Oh, I am afraid he is going to have softening of the brain," she thought, "he has acted so strangely all day."

He, again, never noticing the tired red spot on her cheek, and she magnifying this exhibition of a selfish temper into the symptoms of a fatal disease.

Fred tried on one of the shirts. "Now Daisy," said he, "this is really too bad; you've got this band too large. Don't you see how loose and baggy it is?"

Daisy was going to say, "No, I really don't see" (for the difference between this one and the one she had taken off was just one-eighth of an inch); but the demon suggested again softening of the brain. So she said nothing, but gazed rather blankly into Fred's face.

"I do wish you wouldn't look at me in such a stupid manner when I want you to suggest any improvement," said her husband.

The little woman felt a big lump rise up in her throat, but she only replied,

"I really don't know what improvement to suggest."

"You'll have to make them a sixteenth of an inch smaller," said Fred. "Here, I'll measure my collars and mark them with my pencil."

So he went into the nursery, and measured and marked until long after midnight; and when he had completed his task to his own satisfaction, Daisy had, in spite of all her efforts to keep awake, fallen asleep upon her pillow.

"There," said the demon; "you see she takes no interest whatever in this matter, or she wouldn't go to sleep." So, without thinking of the tiresome day his wife had passed through, or of the sympathy and companionship he had failed to give her, or of the mental shock she had suffered, when a suspicion crossed her mind that the support of the strong and loving nature upon which she had learned to depend had been partially withdrawn from her, thinking only of the pull in that shirt, and connecting Daisy with it as being somehow the cause, he turned out the gas and crawled into bed.

And the baleful demon spread abroad his ebon wings wider and broader over the horizon of their happiness.

Having once commenced to find misfits and faults, they seemed to multiply daily, and for a time Daisy's hands were full of business.

Fred took the matter at last into his own hands, insisting that he should plan, and his wife should sew according to his direction. True, when a shirt was taken up on the shoulders and sewed in under the arms, the proportions of the garment lost their ease and grace.

Shirt after shirt being shorn of its amplitude, was found to be too diminutive for Fred's stalwart form, and could not be worn without confining his arms in a most uncomfortable manner, or would allow him no liberty of motion without first splitting up the back. To remedy this Fred put his ingenuity to the test in devising intricate and wonderful "pieces," "gores," and "diamonds," calculated and cut with mathematical accuracy, with which he puzzled poor, simple little Daisy, who knew nothing of angles or geometrical construction, insisting that she should sew them into positions at once novel and original; for Fred was guided by no precedent—he ignored all the laws of needle-work, and paid not the slightest regard to his wife's faint protest against his innovations. So she settled down into a calm, automatic obedience, and, regardless of material or garment, she pinned and basted and sewed according to his order; but all to no purpose—his shirts would not fit!

Thus matters were growing worse with the Lattimers, and the demon grew more and more jubilant every day.

About this time Mrs. Deacon Weston came with her knitting to spend the afternoon with her little friend.

Mrs. Weston was a kind, motherly sort of a woman, and was always welcome among the young people. Daisy determined to ask her for the pattern of the deacon's shirts, and begin all over again, and perhaps with a little of the old lady's experience she might do better in future. So after she had ensconced Mrs. Weston in the easiest chair, at the pleasantest window of the pretty sitting-room, she brought out her sewing and sat by her side.

"Making shirts, eh, Daisy?" said Mrs. Weston, looking intently at the little wife's work over the tops of her spectacles. "Why, what a funny shape!"

"Do you think so?" said Daisy, timidly. "I was going to ask you if you hadn't a nice pattern to lend me, for I don't seem to succeed very well of late."

"Oh, my dear child, I haven't made the deacon's shirts for many a long year. It is my candid opinion that no woman can make her husband's shirts to his satisfaction; if she can she may be assured that he is not long for this world. The only quarrel the deacon and I ever had was about this very thing. You have no idea how many incompatibilities and uncongenialities this subject brought up; and if I had not set down my foot just when I did, we should have been subjects to have delighted the most rabid divorce agent."

Encouraged by these words, Daisy told her friend of her attempts and failures; and that she might see the extent to which the thing had gone, she opened a closet door, and brought out a pile of abnormal garments, which were clipped and pieced into such shapes as to render it impossible for a human being to wear them. These she laid in Mrs. Weston's lap. The old lady laid down her knitting, and turned them over with an air of curious interest. Then laying her head back in her chair, she laughed until the tears rolled down her fat cheeks and dimmed her spectacles. Taking them off with one hand, she was polishing them on a sleeve of one of the deformities with the other, when she caught sight of Daisy's perplexed face.

"I know what you have gone through," she said. "Every married woman comes to this sooner or later. I, too, have my relics of the shirt war. Now I am going to give you some advice. Don't do any more of this kind of work. Put all these in the rag-bag, and let Fred have his shirts made in future by men who make it their special business. I have seen enough to know that if this goes on much longer, you will jeopardize and perhaps ruin your chance of future happiness."

Daisy went on with her sewing, and said nothing in reply; but a new purpose was born in her soul.

The very next time she attempted to carry out one of Fred's original improvements it was, as usual, not a success. Fred lost his temper, and rolling the shirt into a bundle, he pitched it across the room, and exclaimed, petulantly, "There's no use to try; I can't wear the thing, and it's all your fault, Daisy. I never yet knew a woman who had brains enough to make any thing fit for a man to wear."

Then Daisy's pretty, soft black eyes flashed, and she came and stood beside him.

"Frederic," said she, "I've tried hard enough to please you in this matter, but now I solemnly protest against doing it any more. In future you must get your shirts made by some one else. I shall lose the pleasure I have had in doing something for you, but you will be better pleased, and we shall both be happier."

After a short but spirited and decisive battle the matter was settled, and after that Fred had his shirts made in the city.

To say that he found no fault after this, or that the shirt-makers always succeeded in getting a perfect fit, would not be true; but other men seemed satisfied, and he felt that he must be; besides, he found that no man would follow his erratic orders with the submission of a wife.

And so, discomfited and disappointed, the demon of the shirt folded up his black plumage, and unwillingly crossed the threshold of their door, leaving Daisy and Fred to come back to their old life again.

Several years after, when this episode in their life was almost forgotten, Fred was one day rummaging over some old trunks, when he came upon a pile of linen shirts.

"I wonder why these are put away here," he said to himself; "they look as if I might wear them." Accordingly he brought them down, and proceeded to try one on.

"Why, Daisy, what shirts are these?" said he to his wife. "See this one, how beautifully it fits me. Now this is something like; why, it is perfect!"

"Those," said Daisy, with a slight twinkle of triumph in her eye, "are the ones you had before you commenced your alterations."

"You don't say so," said Fred, turning over the rest; "I wonder what could have been the matter with them. I'll take one down to-morrow to Muslin & Sons, and they shall keep it in future as a pattern."

And Fred's kiss of contrition obliterated the last trace of this sentence, that once had been rudely graven on her heart: "I never yet knew a woman who had brains enough to make any thing fit for a man to wear."

VASSAR COLLEGE.

WE attended the Commencement exercises of Vassar College for young women, at Poughkeepsie, on the 21st of June. We were not there to report the proceedings, of the intellectual character of which we might, with truth, speak in words of highest praise; and so we will only notice some of the more salient points of excellence in the college itself.

This was the sixth Commencement. Those who have regularly attended the ceremonies declare that they have noted every year a decided progress in the working of the college toward perfection, and the evidences of its vast power and influence for good in society as an instrument in the development of character into perfect fullness according to the best ideals.

The professors and their families live in houses under the college roof, and exert a most salutary social influence upon the students by their daily life of harmony and good neighborhood. Out of this, and the delightful methods of culture found in the college in the highest degree of perfection, has been created a most remarkable attachment of the graduates to the institution. There were at the late Commencement between seventy and eighty of the alumni as guests of the college. Among them was one of the class of 1868, with her husband, and her sweet babe a year old. The latter was the recipient of a silver cup from that class.

It is one of the glories of Vassar College that it makes no distinction in salary or position between its masculine and feminine professors. The two of the latter sex—Miss Mitchell, the head of the Department of Astronomy, and Miss Avery at the head of the Department of Physiology and Hygiene, and the resident physician of the college—receive each the same salary as the professors of the opposite sex. In this Vassar College acts in perfect accordance with the grand aim of the founder of the institution, namely, the elevation of woman.

The Museum of Natural History, arranged and classified for educational purposes, is rapidly increasing in importance. It is now equal, in a scientific point of view, to that of any college in the country. It has nearly a complete collection of specimens of North American birds, and a very large number of those of Central and South American birds. The time is doubtless nigh when every kind of bird known on the entire American continent, North, Central, and South, will be represented there. The collection contains at least fifty specimens not to be found in the British Museum. The collections of the department have already acquired a transatlantic reputation. Two eminent English scientists have recently asked for the loan of specimens to figure in their monographs. The cabinets of ornithology and mineralogy are known to naturalists as models of their kind.

The Art Department is assuming an aspect of great importance as an educator. The founder purchased a choice gallery of pictures in oil and water-colors, and drawings, mostly of the cabinet size, so convenient for copying, at a cost of $20,000, and presented it to the college. Included in the purchase was an art library, which, it is believed, has no equal in this country. Last year some fine plaster casts of statues, busts, and reliefs from the establishment of M. Venni, in Frankfort, Germany, were added to the collection; also a set of autotypes, or fac-similes, printed in permanent colors, of original drawings and etchings by Albert Dürer, Lucas Van Leyden, Raphael, and Michael Angelo. Orders are about to be sent to the celebrated establishment of Anderson, in Rome, for a large collection of magnificent photographs of specimens of ancient and modern art, by which the progress of the arts of design may be traced through all the periods and vicissitudes of their history. These specimens will be subjectively and chronologically arranged, classified, and labeled, so that the student may study the subject intelligently without a master. But the professor in charge will, in conversation and stated lectures, explain the technicalities and the significance of the different objects of art represented, and their relations to the history, literature, and civilization of the peoples whose languages the student may be taught in another department of the college. By this method the learner must incidentally acquire a vast amount of useful knowledge lying outside the realm of art, and have the memory of it fixed by the co-instruction of the eye, which seldom forgets. Among the gems of the art collection are four water-color drawings by Turner, which were purchased in Europe some years ago by the Rev. Dr. Magoon, and which are notable as being the only works of this distinguished artist, with the exception of two small sketches, in this country. One of these, the Pass of St. Bernard, which includes some dogs drawn by Landseer, is the missing illustration to Rogers's Italy, which Ruskin wished to repurchase when collecting those drawings, and received answer from Dr. Magoon that nothing short of a war with England would obtain it, but that the rest of the pictures would one by one follow the pioneer to America. Another of the drawings was made for Sir Walter Scott. They are remarkable for delicacy and harmony of color, and belong to Turner's best period.

The Philosophical Department is thoroughly equipped, and the able professor in charge has so arranged his implements and materials that the students have every facility afforded them that may be found in the best scientific schools. Professor Morse has just made a most interesting donation to this department. It is claimed that the first really successful daguerreotypes made on this continent were produced by him. These he carefully preserved, and the whole collection constitutes the donation referred to, and is the property of Vassar College, of whose board of trustees Professor Morse is a member.

The equipment of the Department of Astronomy is also complete. The observatory is one of the best in the country. The defining powers of its great telescope are said to be equal to those of any instrument of its kind in existence. The professor in charge has published in the American Journal of Science and Art, for June, 1871, an account, with illustrations, of her observations of changes on the surface of Jupiter that may be seen by few telescopes in the world.

The practical operations of the Department of Physiology and Health, presided over by Miss Avery, the resident physician of the college, seem to be directed with great skill. During the six years of the college existence, and her administration of this department, not a single death has occurred among the students, whose average number in attendance has been about three hundred and fifty. A hearse has been upon the college grounds only three times since the institution was opened, in 1865. These occasions were the conveying away of the remains of the founder, and the father of Professor Mitchell, both over seventy-five years of age, and of Miss Lyman, the lady principal, in whose system were the seeds of consumption when she came there.

Arrangements have just been made with the Western Union Telegraph Company for the establishment of a station in the college building, by which the students and their friends abroad may have instantaneous communication with each other, when necessary. This is an advantage hardly to be overestimated.

The Musical Department is managed by Professor F. L. Ritter with great ability. It maintains a very high standard of classical music, and gives evidence of cultured taste. At the Commencement the Philharmonic Society of the college rendered difficult compositions of Beethoven, Mozart, and Chopin with great skill and effectiveness.

We will only add that the trustees of the institution are ever ready to make the most liberal provision of means for maintaining for Vassar College the highest position among the educational establishments of the world, so that within its walls young women (there is no limit to the age of students over fifteen years) may have every advantage for learning that may be found in any college or university for young men in this country or in Europe. We are induced to speak so highly of this school from testimony and observation because of the very great importance to our country of such an institution for the thorough education of young women, the prospective mothers of future custodians of the highest interests of our republic.

LIVING IN GERMANY.

HIGH SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

IN Heidelberg and, in fact, the other university towns, as well as the metropolitan cities of Germany, there are facilities for the education of all, from the youngest to the most advanced. Thoroughness and fullness of study, together with inexpensiveness of cost, are characteristic of all the schools and institutions of learning. There is none of that American impatience to finish the education, as it is termed—to bound with our national elasticity of temperament from science to science, with a bare touch of each, which leaves no lasting impression—and burst at once into life, with an undiminished velocity, perhaps, but certainly with not much increased weight.

The Germans are deliberate in most things, but above all in the instruction of their youth. Elementary education, which is ordinarily presumed to be completed in the United States at the age of fifteen or sixteen, or even fourteen, is not over in Germany before eighteen or nineteen. A child is seldom taught systematically until he is seven years old. He is then placed at the primary school, where he is kept until he has made sufficient progress to be received into the lyceum or gymnasium. This is ordinarily at the age of nine or ten, or thereabout. He now enters upon the course of the higher school—called, as it may be, lyceum or gymnasium—which, if followed throughout and regularly, lasts nine years. The German thus does not complete his school education before the advanced age of eighteen or nineteen. His acquirements are, indeed, much more extensive and substantial than those of our self-confident striplings on leaving school, but they are, nevertheless, regarded as quite elementary. The instruction of the gymnasium, in fact, is superior, and equal in range to that of the American colleges, though without the pretension of teaching the abstract studies ostentatiously set down in their hypocritical curricula, but never pursued.

The studies of the gymnasium or lyceum are full and various. The teaching of the languages—ancient and modern—geography and history, arithmetic and mathematics, with their practical applications, drawing and music, is thorough. The youth who has passed creditably through the lyceum is generally a good classical, French, and English scholar, a competent accountant, and is well grounded in the elementary principles of science and philosophy. He thus is ready for the technical study and discipline necessary to all the higher occupations and professions. From the lyceum he goes, according to his future destination, directly to the manufactory, the banking or counting house, the office of the engineer or studio of the architect, or to the university to fit himself for the scientific or learned professions. With this liberal basis of acquirement it is not surprising that the Germans are taking the lead every where in trade, commerce, art, science, and learning.

There is nothing to debar the poorest inhabitant of Germany from the privileges of the gymnasium or lyceum. The cost of tuition is less than two dollars and a half a quarter! The time, indeed, required for a full course limits its benefits to those whose parents are sufficiently thriving to spare them from active labor for so long a period; but the sons of the most needy at an early age are able to avail themselves of some of its advantages. All foreign residents in Germany who study the best interests of their children will not fail to send them to a gymnasium.

The University of Heidelberg confers degrees in philosophy, embracing languages, literature, and science; in medicine, law, and divinity; and supplies the most ample and efficient means for the acquisition of the knowledge necessary to obtain them. The German student generally passes four or five years at the university; but its honors are accessible to all who, after the payment of a hundred dollars, can give proof, on examination, of deserving them, without the exaction of preliminary attendance upon the lectures. These are open to all on matriculating and paying the required fees. The charge of matriculation is eight dollars, and for a course of lectures of six months, from five to eight. For instruction in the laboratories attached to the scientific departments the price is sixteen dollars for the half year. Bunsen, the great chemist, besides his didactic course of chemistry, personally superintends the practical studies of his pupils, who, attracted by his widely extended reputation, throng in large numbers his laboratory. This offers, probably, the best opportunities in the world for the practical study of chemical analysis in all its varieties. With the rapid development of late, in the United States, of its mineralogical and metallurgical resources, there has been a sudden and great demand for mining engineers, metallurgists, assayers, and chemical analysts. This has consequently led many of our most enterprising and intelligent youth to the pursuit of chemistry and its kindred studies. The United States, we are proud to say, has a numerous and creditable representation in the Bunsen Laboratory. Helmholz, the greatest of living philosophers, whose last word, we regret to say, has been spoken from his familiar rostrum at Heidelberg—for he has gone, tempted by metropolitan rewards and honors, to Berlin—also superintended a practical course of study in his department. This, no doubt, will be continued by his successor. Kirchoff, the Professor of Physics, who divides with his distinguished coadjutor, Bunsen, the honors of that greatest revelation of modern science, the spectrum analysis, is among the most successful of the theoretical and practical teachers in the university.

The law department, illustrated by the famous names of Mittermaur and Vangeron, still deservedly attracts crowds of scholars from all parts of the world. The school of medicine, though sustained by the venerable reputation of the aged but energetic anatomist, Arnold, and competent associates, has not been able to withstand the competition of the metropolitan schools of Vienna and Berlin. As for the theological department, it is puzzling to discover its raison d'être—why it should exist; for even the divines hardly resist the prevailing German disbelief, and the most earnest of them, like Schenkel, seem not to oppose, but only strive with more and more perplexity to reconcile it with orthodoxy.

The student at Heidelberg, though he may be tempted as elsewhere to an unnecessary freedom of expense, can live well, with full enjoyment of all the privileges of the university, for five hundred dollars a year. His room costs him only from about a dollar to a dollar and a half a week, his day's dinner, at the usual students' boarding-houses, twenty-five cents, and he can dine at the best hotels for eight dollars a month. His two other meals together will not amount to more than the price of his dinner. Clothes are, at most, half as expensive as in the United States; and his menus plaisirs—small pleasures—though a very extensible commodity every where, can be kept within as narrow a limit of cost in Heidelberg as in any place we know.

SEA-WEEDS.

IN marine botany sea-weeds are called Algæ—a name which is applied to the vegetable kingdom of the waters. There is no sea from the poles to the equator free from them, though they abound on some shores much more than on others.

Specimens can be easily collected as soon as the tide ebbs, and the finest species are usually found in pools among the rocks. Those which grow on the rocks are invariably the most perfect, and great care should be taken to procure the entire plant, taking with it the roots or tendrils which hold it to the stone. As a general rule these plants change color if allowed to remain exposed to sun or rain; so the sooner they are gathered and dried the handsomer they are. The autumnal storms usually wash inshore very beautiful specimens of the three different classes of sea-weeds, and in October the handsomest varieties can be procured. Attention should be paid to the locality in which they are found; and be sure to note whether they are left by the receding tide, or are growing to the rocks.

When collected, prepare them directly, using water well salted, as fresh water dims the bright lines of those belonging to the Rhodospermæ, or second class.

Place the sea-weeds in a large shallow dish; cut drawing-paper to the requisite size, and slip it under the plant. Use a good-sized camel's-hair brush to spread out the minute fibres; if a pin is used it breaks the tiny filaments, and does not give as graceful an appearance to the branches. Then lift the paper carefully, in a slanting position, so that the water may run off. Lay the slips of paper thus prepared upon some flat surface, and let them dry for five minutes. Then place a sheet of common blotting-paper over each plant; upon that lay a piece of soft cambric without sizing, or a bit of old linen, then another sheet of blotting-paper. Thus arranged, the sheets must be laid between two pieces of stiff pasteboard, or book-binder's board, and subjected to heavy pressure. Every day the blotting-paper and cloth should be removed, dried, and replaced; and any specimens that are thoroughly dried can be carefully laid aside to be labeled and dated. They can be gummed into a scrap-book, or arranged as drawings are often secured, by cutting four slits, one in each corner of the page, and inserting the pasteboard between the openings. By so doing they can be taken out without injury to the book, and better specimens inserted. To keep them from fading they can be brushed over with "map" varnish, a colorless preparation; or one can make a varnish by dissolving small lumps of gum-mastic in spirits of turpentine. This makes them retain their original color for years.

When they are all collected and prepared, we must attend to their classification.

Harvey, in his "Manual of British Algæ," gives three distinct classes. The first is Melanospermæ, or the olive green species—the Greek word signifying black and seed, for on exposure to the air they grow black, and are of a woody substance and of a fibrous texture. To this species belong the "black beads" so frequently collected by visitors on the coasts of the Atlantic.

There are six families in this class of sea-weeds. Some of these species afford succulent food; and one species in China forms an important article of commerce. A tenacious glue is extracted by continued boiling, and the Chinese use it in manufacturing lanterns; it is also formed into window-shades.

One variety, called Padina pavonia, resembles the expanded tail of the peacock, and is very beautiful. It is plentiful in tropical seas, but its northern limit is on the southern coast of England. On our shores it is never found. In Scotland there is found a species of this class, from which knife-handles are made. It is called Laminaria digitata, and thus prepared it can hardly be distinguished from horn.

The second class is styled Rhodospermæ. All of these sea-weeds are of a rose red, purple, or reddish-brown hue. Their colorings are as perfect as those of flowers. Some of the species grow in brightly shaded fronds brilliant as ribbons; others are fine and soft as hair, possessing rosy red tresses; while some reflect the colors of the rainbow in their bright waving plumes. All the twenty-seven families of this class, with their numerous branches, are very beautiful. They are plentifully scattered on the Atlantic coast, and on the Pacific they are especially lovely. A wreath of shaded sea-weeds of this species is "a joy forever." Callithamion roseum is delicately tinged, and contrasts well with the grass green varieties. Moss-rose buds can be formed from the different colors of the second and third classes. The third class is called Chlorospermæ or the grass green genus. Under this head are comprised all the sea-weeds of a bright green hue. They do not equal in beauty the second class, nor can they boast of the utility of the first class, yet they possess many attractions. They embrace twenty-two families, and are scattered all over the world. Some of them are of a glutinous character, and must be dried, and not pressed, after being brushed out on the paper. There are others that will not adhere to it, and require a little isinglass dissolved in whisky to attach them.

The handsomest and richest specimens of this class are found in the lowest tide pools. Ulva linga is a beautiful specimen of this genus; its emerald green plumes are found from the Baltic to our Atlantic shores. The limits of this article give us no space to describe all the wonders contained in sea-weeds. A microscope is needed to unfold to us their rare beauties.

"It seems as if these wondrous plants had thought
And power to choose out places for their growth;
As if they sought to bless the homeliest haunts,
And clothe the rock with beauty; bidding men
Passing, perchance in haste, to pause, and think
Of Him who made them, and look scorn no longer
On lowlier ones, whom the Most High hath placed In fitting stations."

USEFUL RECIPES.

COCOA-NUT PUDDING.—To one and a half pints of grated cocoa-nut add one pint of new milk, two cupfuls of sweet cream, and four eggs—the yolks and whites beaten separately—two tea-spoonfuls of melted butter, two crackers rolled fine; sweeten to taste.

A very nice plain mixture for cocoa-nut pudding, suitable for "every-day life," is made by making a blanc-mange of one quart of milk and four table-spoonfuls of corn starch; while hot, melt a small piece of butter in it; let it cool, and add the yolks of six eggs, sugar to taste, and about a tea-cupful of grated cocoa-nut, then the beaten whites. Both this and the preceding require the pie-dishes lined with puff paste, and then the mixture poured in, baking in a rather quick oven three-quarters of an hour.

PLAIN PLUM PUDDING.—A very nice one for "every-day" use can be made by breaking into small pieces a stale loaf of baker's bread, letting it soak in milk until it has absorbed all it will, draining it off thoroughly, and working out all the milk you can with the spoon. If you have any beef suet add a little, but it will do very nicely without. Then stir in half a tea-cupful of molasses, half a pound of brown sugar, the same quantity of stoned raisins, a quarter of a pound of currants rolled in flour, and a few pieces of citron if you have it. Boil in either a mould or pudding-bag the same time you would an ordinary plum pudding the same size. Eat with wine sauce.

RICE-FLOUR PUDDING.—Put on to boil one quart of milk; mix in a bowl a little over half a pound of ground rice with enough milk to make it smooth; when the milk in the stew-pan comes to a boil, add the rice, and let it bubble once; take it off the stove, and stir in, until melted, a quarter of a pound of butter; let it get cold; then add a scant gill of cream or new milk, half a pound of best white sugar, a very little lemon peel finely shredded, nutmeg to taste, yolks of five eggs well beaten in, and then the beaten whites. It can now be either used for puddings in pie-dishes lined with thin puff paste, or baked in a pudding-dish well greased, sending it to table hot, and eating with sauce. Or, line a pudding-dish with puff paste rolled thin, and bake a light brown.

APPLE PUDDING.—Select juicy apples that are a little acid. Pare, core, and cut them into small pieces; when you have about three pints, put them on to cook. Let them stew until entirely done; take them off the stove, mash them well, and add a lump of butter about the size of a small egg, sugar to taste, and a very little cinnamon; when cold, beat in three eggs. Butter the sides and bottom of a deep baking-dish; strew in bread crumbs until the bottom is covered to the thickness of about an inch; then about half the depth of the stewed apples, a thin layer of crumbs, the rest of the apples, and another thick layer of crumbs: set it in the oven to bake, which, if quick, will take about half an hour. Just before taking it out sift white sugar over the top; put it in the hottest part of the stove to brown a minute or two. Either eat cold with cream, or hot with a sauce.

A NICE OMELET FOR BREAKFAST.—Beat two eggs, yolks and whites together, in a bowl until very light. In a cup put one tea-spoonful of corn starch; add slowly a scant half tea-cupful of milk (new milk is best); when well stirred and smooth, pour this over the eggs, and beat all well together for a few minutes; a little chopped parsley can be added if wished. Cook as other omelets. In making any kind of omelet salt and pepper should not be added until sent to table; and to have them perfectly light and not tough, the ingredients must be well and quickly beaten with the fork. The quantity given for this omelet is enough for three persons.

THE FOURTH OF JULY.

A LOVER'S DEVICE.

A YOUNG gentleman in Amsterdam had been a year or two ago paying his addresses, without success, to a young lady. The father of the maiden was altogether obdurate, and could not be induced to favor the suit; but the swain had observed certain symptoms which led him to believe that his attentions were not wholly unacceptable to the lady. When the festival of St. Nicholas approached some waggish friends proposed a plan of offering his hand and heart, the drollery of which might possibly soften the unwilling father and assure the lady of the entire devotion of his person.

On the eve of St. Nicholas a long and rather narrow box, with some holes in the lid, was conveyed to the house of Mynheer ——, addressed to Jufvrouw with the swain's compliments, in addition to which, without the latter's knowledge, the facetious friends had painted in large letters, "een dikke vrijer," a fat lover. The box arrived at the usual five o'clock dinner-hour, and the daughter seeing the box in the hall, and reading the address, wished at once to open it. But her father, who perhaps smelled a rat, and knew better than his daughter the possible humors of the day, said, "No, let us have dinner first, and meanwhile have the box brought into the dining-room." With some trouble the box was removed there by the maids. Dinner dragged its slow length along, was artfully protracted, and the opening of the box kept in abeyance until it was almost time to go to bed. Then the hammer was missing, the screw-driver could not be found, and at lass the opening of the wonderful box put off until next morning. "Goede nacht; slaap goed;" all departed save Mynheer ——, the father. With bed-candle in hand, he went to the box, listened carefully for a moment or two, and then, giving the box a slight kick, proceeded no moralize aloud, "What a fool that little donkey of a fellow is to suppose I will ever let him have my daughter! I wonder what he has sent her. What can these little holes be for? Ah! here is one of mevrouw's knitting-needles—let us poke one in and see if we can make out."

"For God's sake, don't," said a stifled voice from the box, "or you will poke my eye out!"

"Bless me, who's this? What can it be?"

"I am Mynheer F——," said the voice; "for Heaven's sake, let me out; I can't stand it much longer."

"Will you promise never to speak to my daughter again if I do?"

"No, I won't; I'll die first."

"Very well, then—good-night."

"Don't be so inhuman; I shall be dead in another hour."

"Will you promise?"

"No," said the voice in the box, more faintly; "never."

"Well," rejoined the father, kicking the box, "if you have not done for her more than most sweethearts would, you have certainly got into less."

"Well, you are a brave little soul. I'll let you out."

Sly father took out screw-driver and hammer from his own pocket, where they had been lost, and let out the poor lover's very cramped, but plump and comely person.

"Now I am a free man," said the latter, in a somewhat weak voice, "I give my free promise, as you have saved my life, not to speak to your daughter again without your permission."

Small wit on the one side, and diplomatic gratitude on the other, made them so well pleased that they shook hands and parted such good friends that F—— soon after overcame Mynheer ——'s repugnance to the match, and, before the next St. Nicholas, won the lady too, thanks to his ingenious device.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MINNIE.—Make your striped percale, if intended for a suit, by Short-Sacque Suit pattern; if for a house dress, by wrapper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV.

MRS. W. H. M.—For your white muslin make a demi-train, over-skirt, and basque. Trim with flat pleatings, a band of wide black velvet ribbon, and bows at intervals. Make your striped grenadine by cut paper pattern of Postilion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. Trim with bias ruffles of the same.

NELLIE.—Any house-furnishing store will supply you with fluting-irons. We do not give addresses in this column.

MRS. L. E. B.—Trim your black grenadine with bias ruffles of the same, gathered, and, if you choose, a very narrow edging of pointed lace.

ZENOBIA.—Your sample is English poplin. Make by Traveling Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 21, Vol. IV., and trim with bias bands of the same and fringe.—We know nothing of your previous letters.

DELA.—Your shawl would be very suitable to arrange in the way you describe.

MRS. E. W. N.—Polonaise is pronounced po-lo-naze.

ALMEDIA.—When we speak of elderly ladies we mean those considerably over forty years of age.—Get a black grenadine, and make by Apron-Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV. Trim with ruffles of the same.

KITTY G.—Any one of the polonaise suits of which patterns are given will look well in black alpaca.

M. B. G.—A clerk in a store should be treated with the courtesy that a lady extends to every one with whom she has relations; but there need not be very ceremonious salutations, as these retard business.

MRS. C. B. H.—Make a buff piqué suit, Gabrielle, and long sacque for your little boy to travel in. White straw turban. Get lisle-thread gloves for your little daughter.

SIBINE KARIUS.—An apron-polonaise of black silk with ruffled skirt, and Swiss muslin pleatings peeping from beneath the ruffles, is the best plan for your stylish black silk suit. You need not line your linen waist.

MRS. F. G. G.—Make the bride's Swiss muslin with a train, long over-skirt, and half-high, square-necked basque, trimmed with side-pleated flounces edged with Valenciennes. One trained muslin petticoat and a short one is enough under it. Make pongee by Short-Sacque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV.

AGNES I. C.—Use Swiss muslin instead of tarlatan for your commencement dress, and make by directions given above to "Mrs. F. G. G."

S. A. M.—The beaver mohair is a lighter quality, and more silky-looking than alpaca. We prefer the mohair for the present season.

YOUNG MOTHER.—Read New York Fashions in Bazar No. 26, Vol. IV., for directions about your child's clothes.

HUBBY.—Get gray English mohair or pongee for your traveling suit, and trim with bias silk bands and fringe. Baste oil-silk inside your dress lining. Many ladies wear a linen shoulder cover, shaped like a yoke, with strings to tie down under the arms.—There are salves sold for bunions; but we fear there is little help for them, as they are enlarged bones. As tight shoes produce them, loose shoes may relieve them.

MISS ELLA M. C.—Cut and trim your green silk by pattern of Pointed Waist Suit. The black silk will look well made by Apron-Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., trimmed with ruffles and lace. The Postilion-Basque Suit pattern shown in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., is what you want for the striped silk.

MRS. B. H.—Your blue sample is very worthless Japanese poplin. Trim it with blue velvet ribbon, though it is scarcely worth it. Your French gray silk will look well with Swiss muslin pleatings on the skirt, and worn under a Swiss polonaise. The piqué braid like your sample is still used.

MRS. W.—Read reply above to "Mrs. F. G. G."

A READER.—Get a Swiss muslin polonaise to wear over your checked silk.

MRS. C. R. G.—The Gabrielle and walking coat in Bazar No. 27, Vol. IV., will best suit boys of two or three years. Piqué sacques, short and loose, with seams under the arms and on the shoulders, trimmed with an embroidered cambric ruffle, are worn by children. Corduroy or ladies' cloth is used if a thick garment is required.

MRS. G. S.—We do not furnish addresses in this column.—We give a cut paper pattern of little boys' suit in this number.

A. PHILLIPS.—For shoes read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 26, Vol. IV. Wear your hair in flowing braids, with curls between. Trim your silk with pleatings of Swiss muslin; your satin with white lace.

MRS. E. J. A.—The "Bazar Book of Decorum" costs $1, and is sent, prepaid, from this office.

N. P. T.—Your sample would look very pretty trimmed with white lace, or with pleatings of Swiss muslin.

MISS H. P. Z.—Put bias bands of the same, edged with black braid, on the flannel boating dress, and straight pleatings on the linen.

B. S. P.—We can not decide which is the best model for cutting dresses. The Bazar uses its own plan, explained in Bazar No. 36, Vol. II.

MISS JULIA B.—Trim your green silk with bias bands of the same, fringe, and ruffles.

C. F. M.—Piqués are made with basques or with short sacques. Bias bands, braid, and pleated muslin frills are the trimming. Flat bands of solid-colored silk, or ruffles of the same, or black velvet ribbon and fringe, trim Japanese silks. A pleating of the same, or a bias fold, should trim your linen polonaise.

MATTIE.—Read directions in New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 25 and 27 for hints about children's dresses.

M. K. J.—Read answer just given "Mattie."—It is polite to express pleasure at your friend's visit.

FANNY.—We can not suggest any change in your organdy and grenadine, as they are suitably made for the house, and the material is not appropriate for the street. Put Swiss muslin pleatings inside your sleeves.

GUITAR.—In presenting your strange friend to your hostess you should introduce the stranger to the hostess, and not vice versa.

S. GRANT.—We have attended to your request. The address was correct as given you. We think the designs you want have been furnished in back numbers of the Bazar.

MRS. S. J. C.—Your subscription for three months was received April 29, and the paper sent you at once and regularly.

MARGUERITE.—We have never given the pattern of the marguerite polonaise. The linen overall pattern is that of Water-proof Cloak in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV.

BAZAR WORSHIPER.—Your linen suit would scarcely be warm enough to wear to Niagara. Your silk with a linen overall would be more comfortable.

A. W. V.—Seven yards of ladies' cloth will make you a plain riding habit. Water-proof cloth and thick alpaca are also used. Black, dark green, and blue are the fashionable colors.

MRS. R. P. W.—Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV., contains the cut and description of the wrapper pattern.

M. C.—Loop the poplin skirt by pleats in the side seam. The ruffle extends up the back of the blue over-skirt. Black lawn should be made with a box-pleated blouse-waist, and should be worn over black.

MRS. HELEN C. B.—Modistes here would make your organdies with a polonaise and ruffled skirt, your striped percale by the Short-Sacque Suit pattern, and your polka-dotted percale by the wrapper pattern sent you.—Thanks for your appreciative letter.

MISS M. O.—We do not procure samples for our readers.

DIAMOND D MOHAIRS

It is true and not strange that the prominent brands of alpacas which have appeared of late years have lost all their temporary popularity. The reasons are evident: first, the importers relied on a name or ticket to sell the goods, without regard to intrinsic worth; and, second, the various brands (whose name is legion) were wanting in all the qualities that go to make the Diamond (D) Mohair, the only alpaca of which any lady should make a dress. The Diamond (D) Mohairs are made of pure lustre yarns, and always retain their brilliancy and color. They do not crease or wrinkle as common alpacas do, and are to be had of the leading retailers in the United States.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

NO FEAR OF A RELAPSE.
Thousands who suffer from chronic constipation dare not take the ordinary purgatives, because the short relief they afford is followed by still more terrible constriction and a general aggravation of the disease. For these the mild laxative, corrective, and tonic operation of is literally the one thing needful. Almost imperceptibly, and without any griping pain, it restores the natural peristaltic action of the bowels, while it tones their membranous lining, and thus prevents a return of the constriction when the laxative action of the agreeable and ebullient draught has subsided.

Waltham Watches.
We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

PURIFY THE BLOOD AND BEAUTIFY THE COMPLEXION BY USING
HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and
HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

A curious story is told of three young candidates for a Scottish ministry. The first one put upon his trial, while putting on his robes, happened to descry an ancient-looking, well-worn roll of paper, which proved to be a sermon upon the text, "Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents." Seeing that the old sermon was much better than his new one, the aspirant to pulpit honors took possession of it, delivered it as his own, and then returned it to its old resting-place. The sermon was a good one, and pleased the hearers, although they would have preferred one delivered without book. Great was their astonishment the following Sunday when preacher No. 2 treated them with the same sermon from the same text; but it was too much for Scottish patience when a third minister, falling into the same trap, commenced his sermon by announcing that "Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents;" and one old woman relieved the feelings of her fellow-sufferers by exclaiming: "De'il dwell him! Is he never gaun to flit?"

A short time ago a lady and gentleman were married very quietly in the country, and proceeded in their carriage to spend the honey-moon among the lakes, the gentleman giving strict orders to his Irish footman on no account to state to inquirers that they were newly married. When leaving the first inn on the road the happy couple were much astonished and annoyed to find the servants all assembled, and, pointing to the gentleman, mysteriously exclaiming, "That's him! that's the man!" On reaching the next stage the indignant master told his servant he had divulged what he had impressed upon him as a secret, and that he had told the servants at the last inn they were a newly married couple.

"Be jabers, an' it's not true, yer honor," replied the servant; "I tould the whole kit that yer honor and yer honor's lady (God bless her!) wouldn't be married yet for a fortnight!"

For a specimen of logical consecution of ideas we venture to commend this from a school-boy's composition: "Tobacco was invented by a man named Walter Raleigh. When the people first saw him smoking they thought he was a steamboat, and as they had never seen a steamboat, they were frightened."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 30.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' Breakfast and Dress Caps, Figs. 1–10.

THE caps shown by Figs. 1–10 are just as diverse in form, material, and colors as are the purposes for which they are intended; they are designed for breakfast, day, and evening wear, according to the material and trimming used, and may be varied to suit the individual taste.

Fig. 1.—SWISS MUSLIN CAP. This cap is trimmed with gathered Swiss muslin strips, which are worked in button-hole stitch; the upper strip is set on with a heading. The two strips are turned up at the front like a diadem, while at the back they form drooping ends. Under the diadem a ruche of black velvet ribbon rests on the hair. Black velvet strings are tied under the chignon.

Fig. 2.—WHITE TULLE CAP. The round crown is surrounded by a puffing underlaid with light blue ribbon. Blonde and insertion loops are set at the outer edge of the cap. A row of narrow blonde edges the pendent tulle ends at the back. A blue ribbon rosette with ends is set at the side of the cap.

Fig. 3.—SWISS MUSLIN BREAKFAST CAP. Cut a round crown of white Swiss muslin ten inches and a half in diameter, gather it, and wire the edge. (The width of the crown and wire must be regulated to suit the head.) The trimming consists of a strip of Swiss muslin seventy-three inches and three-quarters long, trimmed with narrow lace; this strip is three inches and three-quarters wide at its widest part, above the ear, while toward the back it is sloped to a width of one inch and three-quarters, and toward the front to a width of one inch. This Swiss muslin strip is box-pleated, and set on the crown, the seam being covered by a twisted cherry-colored ribbon, with a bow at the front. The strings consist of straight Swiss muslin strips twenty-eight inches long and eight inches wide; these are trimmed with lace, laid in two deep pleats at the top, and, thus reduced to a width of three inches and three-quarters, are set on the cap.

Fig. 4.—SWISS MUSLIN CAP. This cap has a closely pleated round crown thirteen inches and three-quarters in diameter. It is made like Fig. 3. The Swiss muslin strip forming the trimming is side-pleated. Green ribbon trimming.

Fig. 5.—PLAIN SWISS MUSLIN CAP. Round crown fifteen inches and a quarter in diameter, pleated, so as to elevate it slightly like a hood. The trimming consists of plain hemmed Swiss muslin strips two inches wide and forty-four inches long, which are set on in box-pleats. The chignon is covered by a Swiss muslin veil fourteen inches long and fifteen inches and a quarter wide, which is trimmed like the cap, and rounded off at the corners. A pink silk ribbon, with a bow, is set at the right side of the cap. Descriptions of the remaining caps are given in the Supplement.

BEST POWDER FOR POLISHING GLASS.

ACCORDING to the London Engineer, the best powder for polishing glass or metals is probably that used by Lord Rosse in preparing the mirror of his great telescope. This is prepared by extracting the peroxide of iron from a solution of pure sulphate of iron by precipitating it by means of ammonia. The deposit is washed, pressed until almost dry, and then brought to a dull red heat, just visible in the dark. The only points of importance are in reference to the purity of the sulphate of iron, the use of ammonia in considerable excess, and the taking care not to allow the heat above that just indicated. The resulting powder should be a pale red, slightly tinged with yellow.

FIRE-FLIES.

SEE the air filling near by and afar—
A shadowy host—how brilliant they are!

Silently flitting, spark upon spark,
Gemming the willows out in the dark;

Waking the night in a twinkling surprise,
Making the starlight pale where they rise;

Snowing soft fire-flakes into the grass,
Lighting the face of each daisy they pass;

Dancing like jewels high up in the pines,
Or drowsily poised on the low-swinging vines;

Startling the darkness, over and over,
Where the sly pimpernel kisses the clover;

Suddenly setting their tapers around,
Now on the fences, now on the ground,

Now on the bushes and tree-tops, and then
Pitching them far into darkness again;

There like a shooting-star, slowly on wing,
Here like the flash of a dowager's ring;

Playing their pranks of living and dying
All in an instant, merrily flying;

Setting the dark, croaking hollows agleam,
Spangling the gloom of the ghoul-haunted stream;

Sweet in their gentleness, daring, and cheer,
No depth too dark for them, no place too drear;

They pulse and they sparkle, they glimmer and glow,
Teaching a lesson wherever they go:

Ever in gentle souls shineth a light—
Trusting it ever, no gloom can affright.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Mocking-Birds.

MY DEAR JACK,—Perhaps you think that I interpret too liberally both the word manners and the word road. But a preacher may make his text mean what he chooses, and an author has the same liberty with his title. Indeed, I know of little advice which, taken literally, is less effective than to stick to the text. The adviser means always his view of the text; and it is very possible that he may be wholly unable to perceive the subtile relation between the text and the improvement upon which the preacher is most intent. The most imaginative and poetic minds move so swiftly, and take so much for granted in those who listen, that the logic of their action is unperceived. A lantern in the hand of a man who by its aid finds the straightest path through the marsh seems a mere dancing will-o'-the-wisp to the spectator. There are men whose conversation is like a swarm of fire-flies in a meadow on a summer night. It seems to be mere erratic glitter, but it is really intentional and connected motion. So, if you can not always see at once what the preacher is "driving at," it is not necessary to suppose that he does not know himself.

So with the connection between a book and its title. It is often fanciful; sometimes, as the author acknowledges, it is forced. But titles have sometimes a purpose unrelated to the thing entitled. Thus I have known titles to books which were meant not to describe the subject, but only to pique curiosity. Leigh Hunt has an amusing paper upon titles in his "Indicator," I think, in which he recounts the utter absurdity which might be made to do duty for the purpose. Then there is another kind, which is not grotesque, and does not appeal to the sense of humor, but which excites other and pleasing emotions. A famous and successful publisher once told me that two things were indispensable to the "average" story, as he called it: one is an agreeable title, and the other is an agreeable end. And he related some curious and interesting anecdotes of books which had been saved by changing the title or the catastrophe. A kind, domestic title he thought of great service. It conjures pleasing images. It awakens an expectation which the imagination illuminates. "Make the reader cry as much as you will," said the shrewd counselor, "but don't leave him crying."

I am not troubled, therefore, when you do not at once see the connection between my text and my sermon. Perhaps my object is merely to leave you wondering why I did not say this or that good thing which the subject so obviously suggested, or to push aside the curtain at the door of the cathedral, as it were, and usher you into the vast coolness and dimness where you can loiter and meditate at will, with a feeling of gratitude, possibly, to the janitor. Why may I not strike the key upon a tuning-fork, as in the old country choirs, and leave all the sweet melodies and the rich harmonies to you gentlemen and ladies with the trained and beautiful voices? Indeed, my dear Jack, that is all that I can do, and I often think if the writer who sets the key with his pen instead of the tuning-fork could but follow a little the myriad thoughts and fancies which spring in the mind of his readers, he would be confounded and abashed. That is a consequence and a reward so incalculable that I understand what the same sagacious publisher meant when he said to a young author, "what you want is fame, not money." I suppose that the young fellow was not so sure of that, and he probably thought that the publisher was only intent upon making a good bargain for himself. But I can see that he had another purpose. He honored the hope and enthusiasm of the author. He knew that if the work succeeded—that is, made his name known—it would be an added inspiration to further effort. But if he had said that the book might give the author a little money, but no fame, he would have dashed those eager and soaring hopes to the ground. Fame was literally capital for that young man. It would put money in his purse.

You see that this letter is an illustration of what I have been saying about texts, for certainly I have not stuck very close to mine. I am writing to you upon the subject of mocking-birds; and as I sit and listen to my little feathered neighbor at the window whistling and warbling, I feel somehow as if he had bewitched me with his own nature, so that I seem to be writing of one thing when I am really thinking of another, just as he seems to be a thrush or a robin, while he is really a very different bird. This is what is called a Southern mocking-bird that I hear; but we have a Northern brother of his, the cat-bird, who is most lively and noisy through the early summer in the deep shady thickets along winding streams. There is a dell at Mrs. Honeysuckle's where I often sit with a book entirely alone, and this practical joker warbles and scolds all the morning in the trees over me. He is a terrible little Hector, and scolds more angrily and absurdly than all his feathered kind. But he suddenly becomes good-natured, and pours out the songs of all the birds as freshly and cheerily as if he were somebody else continually. He always seems to me like the wall in the story in the "Arabian Nights" from which flowed the wine you wished. You had but to tap it and turn the faucet, and lo! your heart's desire. And so my lively warbler stops his harsh, petulant strain, and says to me, "Will you have canary?" and out ripples the delicate trill of Mrs. Margery's bird at her window, and delights me as if it were, indeed, canary wine in song. "Will you have the hermit-thrush?" and the cool, clear notes of that gurgling sweetness seem to drip over me.

He goes from one to another; and if I can see his little head, it bobs at me "What d' ye think o' that?" and if I could discern his eyes, I know that they would wink at me like those of Robin Goodfellow. Yet admirable and amusing as it is, it is so because I know it to be imitation. It is a monologue by the old Matthews. Now he is an old woman, now a baby, a Frenchman, and then a Chinaman. It is exquisitely entertaining, but it is Matthews all the time. We know that it is not an old woman, infirm and begging, or we should pity her with all our hearts; we should not laugh more heartily the older and weaker we saw her to be. And so with this feathered ventriloquist. I know that it is my little cat-bird all the time; and therefore the more inimitable his imitation, the more perfect the illusion, the greater the pleasure, because I know that it is not Mrs. Margery's bird escaped, nor a wood-thrush, nor any other bird than the doughty little Hector of the spray.

But it is not every mocking-bird that gives us that unalloyed delight, and it is a pity, because there is no more common bird. One came to see me yesterday, and I was certainly amused, but not in the same way as with the cat-bird. If you know Hortensius, and have heard him speak, you have heard a charming orator, and you have remarked what the French might call a distinguished personality or individuality. He is emphatically himself. He has tones of voice, movements of the head and hands, an action of the body, forms of expression—in one word, and in the sense in which I use the word in these letters, he has an individual manner. It was young Echo who came to see me yesterday; but if you had been in the next room you would have been sure that it was Hortensius. Echo greatly admires him, and I agree with him. But his admiration has consumed him. It seems to have eaten away himself. He bends his head, he raises his hand, he modulates his voice, he moves his body, he rounds his phrases, in the exact tone and with precisely the manner of Hortensius. It is so striking and ludicrous that nothing he says seems to be of importance or arrests your attention, because it is but a faint echo of what Hortensius would say. You feel irresistibly that if this were a person who had any force of his own, any thoughts, any opinions, any individual character, he could not be so wholly overpowered by another individuality. His own voice is probably only a petulant scold; but if we want to hear Hortensius we will go to him. Yet Echo is but a single specimen; and there is a very large family of Hortensian mocking-birds.

Another class you know if you know Plato. The philosopher is serene and simple and thoughtful. He has also a hundred characteristic tones and ways. They belong to him, as we say; by which we mean only that he is wholly unaffected. Grave, contemplative, with a subtile and sweet humor, he is one of the men who make us love and respect our common humanity more. And have you never remarked the Platonic mocking-birds—the little Platos? I observe, but in silence, scores and scores of them. They have all of Plato but that which makes him Plato. They are Plato as you would be Shakespeare if you smoothed your hair and trimmed your mustache like the bust. They are Plato as the wax figure in the palace at Berlin, covered with the old clothes of the king, is Frederick the Great. The features and form are well moulded, and the clothes are his own. Instead of saying in their own way what they themselves think, the little Platos imitate Plato's way of saying what they think Plato might think. The result is infinitely funny in itself; but it is certainly contemptible for the little Platos. My little Hector of the bough is a bird only, and he plays the part of other birds perfectly. But here is a human being, and all that he does is to try to be another human being imperfectly. Now a daw is very well, but a daw as a peacock is absurd. Elia is not Shakespeare. But Elia trying to write like Shakespeare would end in Elia supremely ridiculous. I do not mean that all the little Platos could be distinguished; but they could be honest and respectable individuals instead of poor imitations.

And my neighbor's mocking-bird reminds me also of the family of the same kind of bird, which sing not in cages, but in books. Once a nightingale came into the Honeysuckle dell, and the grove was ravished with his song. He flew away, but still for many and many a day the dell rang with his sweet singing. The little Hectors, forgetting to scold, cared only to repeat and prolong the wondrous music. And if we could not have the nightingale, we were glad enough to have the mocking-bird. So now and then a great singer comes, and the heart of the world listens and responds. He touches all the stops, and "draws an angel down." And while he is still singing, on every side the mocking-birds begin. Often they are mistaken for the singer. Those who have not heard the song are enchanted with the imitation. There is many a little Hector, whose name I will mention to you privately, who passes for a very pretty nightingale. I go into the bookstore or the library, and I look at those piles of poetry—many of the books of to-day, of yesterday—and I am relieved to know that we need not read them. My neighbor's mocking-bird in the gilded cage is pleasant to hear; but if I hear a nightingale in the garden I should not heed the mocking-bird—no, nor a grove of mocking-birds. As for us, dear Jack, you and I can not be Hortensius or Plato in one way, but we can in another. We can be precisely like them in being ourselves.

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

UNNATURAL PROTECTORS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

THERE is a kind of woman whose character one could never evolve from his moral consciousness, and whose existence in this country one could never credit except on unimpeachable testimony. These women are so radically different from the genius of the place and the age, so entirely aside from the line of our national development, both in its strength and its weakness, that I am not sure but we ought to cherish them as a sort of memento mori—a needed reminder that human nature is the same in all ages and countries, and that, though we pride ourselves on our independence and energy, there is a latent indolence or passivity in the blood, which occasionally shows itself, and which may at any time burst out—perhaps it would be more appropriate to say creep out—and reduce us to the undignified, unresisting subordination of the "effete despotisms" of the Old World.

I mean women who by death or disability are deprived of their natural guardians—who have to choose between taking care of themselves and being taken care of by persons on whom they have no claim, and who choose the latter. The natural guardians of a woman are her father and husband. They, of their own free-will and choice, assumed her life, and it is their shame if they do not, or their misfortune if they can not, provide for her. But nobody else is her natural guardian. Upon no one else has she an unspoken claim. Into no other home than theirs has she an undisputed right to enter, and no other doors is it impossible justly to close against her.

A father dies, leaving his family penniless. It is a wrong thing to do, but men will sometimes do it. We should all think it selfish and unmanly for the sons to go on their way and leave the daughters to go on theirs unhelped. It is, happily, a sight we seldom do see. I often wonder at the bravery, fidelity, and delicacy with which boys assume a burden devolved upon them often through what was nothing more or less than the improvidence or incapacity of their fathers. They "fight the bitter fight for two," or three, or a dozen without taking on airs, simply because it is the thing to do, and never imagine themselves heroic. But just as disgraceful as it would be for boys to neglect their sisters is it for sisters supinely to permit themselves to be a burden upon their brothers. A sister has no such claim upon her brother as it is ever safe to presume on. She can not, after arriving at maturity, be honorably supported by him unless at his expressed and perfectly untrammeled desire. Even then the connection may not be free from embarrassment. I can hardly conceive of a case in which independence would not be preferable. For a time the common support may not be onerous, and the common home may be delightful. But by-and-by the brother forms new attachments, and his marriage puts a new face on matters. He must either maintain two establishments, which he may be far from able to do, or he must have wife and sister in the same; and very few houses were ever built large enough for such an arrangement. Men and their wives, sisters, and mothers may all be saints; but when the code of laws regarding married women is perfected it will be a State-prison offense for a man ever to propose to his wife, in esse or in posse, to live in the family with his female relatives. If his wife propose it, or they invite and she accept, that is her own affair; but for a man to arrange it, and call that providing for his wife, is a part of the naïve and touching blindness which distinguishes men in their conduct of delicate domestic affairs. A girl must then be in some sense cast off by her brother, or she must be a superfluous member of his household, and uncertain at any time whether she may not be a burdensome and undesired one. The time may come when she will be needed and summoned; but how much better for her to be self-sustaining from the beginning, and be summoned! This does not necessarily involve isolation or even separation from her brother; but it does involve a partnership whose benefit shall be reciprocal, and in whose existence both shall have a power of choice.

There are women who will rest, or at least exist, upon weaker ties than these; who will depend for support on the merest shadow of a claim; who, strange as it may seem, appear to think that it is more unladylike to work than it is to endure an obligation. They fondly imagine themselves to be decayed gentlefolk, and that their narrow, straitened, useless life allies them to the English nobility; so they deny themselves society, amusement, travel, all largeness of life. They shut themselves in dingy rooms, ever growing dingier; live in dressing-sacques, from which they emerge only on rare state occasions; devote all their powers to making elegant garments out of shabby ones, and very likely succeed; expend in the struggle to live respectably on the allowance furnished by some grudging relative an amount of time, industry, ingenuity, and perseverance which, wisely directed, would secure an ample income—and find their one consolation in the reflection that they are ladies. But a lady would rather dig ditches and die in the last one than live on charity. A gentlewoman is decayed beyond all tradition of past grandeur and all hope of future resuscitation before she can levy contributions on reluctant connections—become the recipient of unwilling bounty. No occupation is so menial as beggary, and no beggary is so mean as indirect beggary.

Sometimes these women may be found clinging together, and sometimes they attach themselves singly to other households, and occupy an undefined and always unhandsome position. Few sights are more pitiable. "Anxious and aimless," bitter but repressed, without natural play of the faculties or freedom of choice, dependent upon the will and perhaps the caprice of men who do not love them, and who partially despise them, with their good qualities depreciated and their faults magnified, their greatest virtue an enforced patience, and the tenderest feeling they excite a half-contemptuous pity, they tread their dreary way from a youth without spirit to an old age without respect.

To be obliged to support herself is a woman's misfortune.

To shift the obligation from her own shoulders to those of another is her fault.

The best place for a woman is in the home that wants her.

The worst place is in the home that does not want her.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BATHING DRESSES.

THE bathing season brings with it inquiries about bathing dresses. The polonaise over dress is in vogue this year—a slight change from the yoke blouses of last season. This polonaise is a very simple garment, a sort of long sacque, belted, made with a straight width and gores behind, and two front widths sloped on the sides. It extends just below the knee, has a broad sailor collar, or else a pelerine cape deep enough to cover the bust; coat sleeves, and a belt of the material held on by straps of the trimming on the seams under the arms. The trowsers are of the regular Turkish shape, straight, full, buttoned on the sides, and closed at the ankle by a band or an elastic in the hem. The polonaise suit is especially commended when flannel is used. The cape does away with the objection that a plain polonaise did not conceal the body sufficiently. Box-pleated shirt waists, made in the manner described for cambric dresses, look well in light serges and moreen; but the pleats render them too heavy when made of flannel. A regular over-skirt, looped and draped in the most approved manner, is attached to a belt and worn with the pleated shirt. The third style is the yoke blouse, the yoke square or pointed, the body and skirt in three full widths, or else cut off and gathered to a belt, the waist drooping over the belt in Garibaldi fashion. Imported suits are more fancifully gotten up than those made to order at our furnishing houses. They have jaunty little paletots or else postilion-basques, and are often low at the throat, with short sleeves. The plainer garments described above are preferred here.

Flannel, either plain or twilled, is the material most used, as it is substantial and does not fade. But the wiry summer serges are commended for bathing dresses, as they do not cling very closely to the figure even when dripping with water. Navy blue is the favorite color, as it has a jaunty nautical look; after this comes cadet gray, shepherd's check in black and white, or else the gay Highland plaids. The prettiest flannel suit shown has a polonaise of navy blue, trimmed with two rows of white cotton tape stitched down flatly as a border and outlining a yoke. The deep sailor collar has a white star on each shoulder, or else the monogram of the wearer is wrought in white; large gutta-percha buttons down the front. The price is $8 50 without the monogram. A gray flannel suit with yoke blouse is braided with white soutache in a Greek design on the outside seams of the trowsers, on the yoke, belt, and cuffs: price $9. A flannel suit of shepherd's check has a border of blue braid; and another, of gray, is trimmed with black and scarlet braid in Rob Roy plaid. Some very plain flannel suits of coarse quality are sold as low as $4 50 or $5. The fanciest costumes are of white moreen or stiff serge trimmed with blue braid. These soil easily, and cost $8 50. For the same price are gray, scarlet, and deep blue serge suits, that will prove more serviceable.

The best bathing shoes are high buskins of thick unbleached cotton duck, with cork soles. They are bound and tied with checked worsted braid, and cost $1. A sort of Manilla sandal, to be strapped on the foot, is sold for the same price. A skull-cap of oil-silk to protect the hair from salt-water is also marked $1. It is merely a round piece like the invisible nets worn on the hair, with a band of rubber run in the hem. More fanciful caps are trimmed with quillings of scarlet or blue braid. Some unique designs for these caps are shown in engravings on another page. A fall at the back like a Havelock, to protect the neck from the sun while in the water, is very useful. Ladies who do not fear the effects of salt-water on the hair wear loose and flowing tresses, and tie on a broad-brimmed hat of coarse straw. Bags of Manilla hemp, thicker and closer wrought than those formerly used, are shown for carrying bathing dresses: 75 cents to $1.

The bathing suits worn by gentlemen are of gray or sailor blue flannel, made like a student's blouse, with a shirt yoke, a belt set in, and a skirt to the knee. They are less trimmed than those for ladies, and cost $8.

TRAVELERS' ARTICLES.

Various contrivances of use to the summer tourist are shown in the fancy stores. Substantial brown canvas and the russet-colored Russia leather, pretty and fragrant, are fashioned into many convenient articles, and secured with bands and lock of Viennese gilt. Dealers say that the Russia leather goods of next season are to be black; but these will look like ordinary leather, and will scarcely supersede the handsome brownish-red now in vogue. First on the list of indispensables is a canvas necessaire for carrying combs, brushes, and other toilette articles, keeping them separate from the other contents of trunk or bag. It is in two sizes, worth $4 50 or $6 50. Shawl straps of Russia leather, gilt mounted, are provided with handles when carried by ladies; with a long strap to pass over the shoulder for gentlemen. The first cost $2 75 to $3 50; the last cost $3 25 to $4. There is a quantity of str ps to these, enough to enwrap parcels, books, papers, water-proof, etc., thus almost doing the service of a sachel on short trips. Russia leather folios lined with russet silk are fitted with pockets for paper and envelopes; small, compact, and stiff enough to write upon, they are all that a lady needs in the way of a writing-desk when traveling: from $6 50 to $8 50 is the price. Canvas folios bound with Russia leather are $5 to $7. To accompany these folios is the travelers' inkstand, also of the odorous leather, with spring fastening, and an inside cap of gilt, making it doubly secure: it is brought out in three sizes, costing from $1 20 to $2. A pretty stand, circular, about a foot long and two or three inches broad, has an inkstand in one end, and is provided with places for writing materials: price $7 50.

Another tourists' case, of finer Russia leather, has pockets for holding paper and envelopes, is fitted with pen-box and inkstand, and will open out as a folio for writing on the lap: this is in various sizes, costing from $10 50 to $30. Still another writing-case for travelers is rolling, and may be made into a small space and confined with strap and buckle: furnished with pen, pencil, paper-knife, scissors, inkstand, and blotter, it costs $15. A journal for recording incidents of travel has pages the size of commercial note paper, and is bound in russet or in black leather. It has gilt corners, a plate on which the owner's name is to be engraved, and—item of value—a gilt clasp, fastened by a key. Flexible cases of Russia leather for holding a pack of cards are shown for gentlemen who while away the hours of travel with whist and euchre: price $2.

Among novelties for ladies is a Russia leather belt with a pendant for carrying an umbrella slashed to the side like a sword: price $3 75. The chatelaine bag of leather, attached to a belt of the same, was introduced last year in the pale brown leather then fashionable; it is now shown in russet-color, and is worn in the city on morning shopping tours, as well as for country excursions: price $8 to $12. A pretty and useful novelty is a chain of fine Viennese gilt, supplied with a hook that fastens it to the belt of any dress, while a ring at the other end holds the fan or umbrella: these cost from $3 50 to $4 50 each.

STATIONERY.

Tinted writing-paper and visiting cards are restored to favor. These are not of the deep, coarse hues that once offended taste, but are faintest tints, mere shadows of color, so delicate and soft that they are approved by fastidious people who had protested against any paper but that of immaculate whiteness. Palest rose and lavender are preferred by ladies; also the empress tint, as stationers call the Nile green—that lovely shade, at once both blue and green, adopted by Eugénie in opposition to the vulgar yellowish Metternich green. The tint fades into white near the edges, forming a slight line of border around the paper. Two sizes of paper, the note and letter sheet, furnish a lady's escritoire. These are of slender shape, twice as long as their breadth, so that when doubled across the centre they will fit the square envelopes now used. Ladies select thicker French paper than that formerly seen, in new designs of waved tracery over the whole sheet, with double parallel lines too faintly traced to hamper the writer, and wide enough apart to permit the large, angular hand that women of fashion now affect.

The number and street of city residences is now engraved on the right-hand side of note sheets, just above where the date is written. The name of a country-seat is engraved in rustic letters, as "The Willows," Irvington; and stationery thus marked is placed in chambers for the use of guests.

Monograms have attained perfection in quaintly combined antique letters daintily colored in the centre, the edges boldly raised and gilded as a border. The colors contrast prettily with the tint of the paper; the pale empress paper has a monogram of black and gilt, or of turquoise blue; monograms or crests of French gray and gilt or deep violet and gold are on pale lavender. Cipher monograms on white paper are in intricate devices of two shades of blue, or a French gray letter is wrought on one of lapis blue, each letter with raised gilt edge, or else pale buff is combined with scarlet and gold. Another fancy is a dark background shaped like a shield, made of finest lines of gilt or crimson, with the letters of white in bold relief, the merest line of color finishing their edges. For those who do not use monograms stationers stamp gratis the letter of the family name, raised, in exquisite colors, with the desirable line of gilt as a border. Young ladies have their first names stamped on paper and envelopes—a pretty fashion, provided the name is pretty. Rosa is shown in old English text on dainty rose-colored paper, Maud and Blanche in bright blue on white.

Blue-tinted paper, substantial and business-like, is in favor with gentlemen. Their monograms are larger and usually less fanciful than those designed for ladies.

Visiting cards are of thick Bristol-board without enamel, and tinted to match note paper, each lady selecting a tint, and using it as her own until it becomes associated with her. Cards are long and narrow, those for ladies being larger than the English card used by gentlemen. The name engraved in script is preferred to old English letters at present. Ladies who have regular reception days in each week have the day engraved on the left-hand corner, the name of their hotel, country-seat, or number and street of city residence on the right-hand corner. Engravers usually charge $1 50 for a hundred cards ready for use. The lady has her own plate, or else pays an extra sum for it.

Stationers have devised a good plan for marking family libraries. A slip of paper has engraved upon it the crest of the house, with the family name below, and is pasted in each book. If the book belongs to any one member of the family, his or her name is engraved in full in antique letters. These are printed by the thousand at a small cost.

The new idea for marking clothing and household linen is to stamp them with the monogram of the lady of the house in indelible ink. The letters are cut on wood, and the die, with ink and all necessaries, is furnished for $5.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; UNION ADAMS; and KIRBY & Co.

PERSONAL.

MR. ORANGE JUDD has added his name to the roll of public benefactors by giving to the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Connecticut, a magnificent Hall of Natural Science, which he has built at a cost of one hundred thousand dollars.

—London has a fresh sensation in Mlle. MIRAMON, who has achieved a greater success than any light soprano who has appeared in London since the debut of NILSSON. The papers are positively gushing about her. NILSSON, meanwhile, is pursuing the even tenor and soprano of her way at our watering-places, gaining strength for her operatic campaign next fall.

—One of the notable features of the late Commencement at Harvard was the delivery of the Latin Salutatory by CHARLES JOSEPH BONAPARTE. This BONAPARTE is of the Baltimore family. The papers do not speak of it as any thing above the ordinary level of such performances. It is something, however, that a BONAPARTE should have been selected for what is always a college event of importance.

—Mr. HORACE CAPRON, who resigns the office of Commissioner of Agriculture, to go to Japan, where he is to be the chief of the agricultural and mineral department of the government, can well afford to do so, as he is to receive a salary of $30,000 a year, and facilities to live in a Japan casy style. He will show them what he "knows about farming."

—A fine "old buck" has recently deceased at East Conneaut, Ohio. His name was BUCK. After building a house and furnishing it nicely, he proceeded to create his own rib and person a woman by allowing his hair to grow long, and by purchasing a complete wardrobe of female attire. From that time forward, when "at home," he designated himself as Miss BUCK, and never appeared in another character, unless some one called, as was sometimes the case, and asked for Mr. BUCK. He had a great variety of costly dresses such as are worn by females, as well as male attire.

—Miss M. E. DYOTT owns and edits a bright little paper at New Rochelle, New York, called the Pioneer. She is about eighteen, petite, neat figure, bright eyes, talented, business tact, and all that. Besides being editor, she is publisher, foreman, compositor, pressman, book-keeper, cashier, mail-clerk, and also fills several other positions of responsibility about the institution. She is assisted by two boy type-setters. She has conducted the paper for about two years, or since she became an orphan. The printing-office is one half of her cottage in Church Street, the other half being her home.

—"Lothair," the Marquis of Bute, the richest of England's nobility with perhaps a single exception, is about to wed, having, in honeyed words, persuaded Miss FOX, a niece of Lady HOLLAND, to "change her local habitation and her name." She is said to be a lady of rare beauty and accomplishments.

—It is announced, with becoming diffidence, that Miss HOSMER is soon to leave Rome for Vienna to pay a visit to Lady Bloomfield, wife of the English embassador; thence to England to see Lady Ashburton and Lady Alford. Think of that!

—They tried to induce General M'CLELLAN to receive a serenade from a militia company last week at Orange, New Jersey. He said he had ceased to be martial, and that military honors would be unsuited to his position as a private gentleman.

—A lady who saw much of the DICKENS family twenty-nine years ago, when DICKENS was thirty years old, has been writing about them in the Englishwoman's Magazine. Of the wife she says: "A great deal of amusement was excited by Mrs. CHARLES DICKENS perpetrating the most absurd puns, which she did with a charming expression of innocence and deprecation of her husband's wrath, while he tore his hair and writhed as if convulsed with agony. He used to pretend to be utterly disgusted, although he could neither resist laughter at the puns nor at the pretty comic moue she made (with eyes turned up till little but the whites was visible) after launching forth one of these absurdities."

—Mrs. YELVERTON (now Lady Avonmore), who has made this country her residence, has in press a volume in which several well-known characters will figure. She has recently completed a volume of travels, shortly to be published in England, and is now engaged on a novel, in which is to be embraced the story of her life.

—What a young woman can do is shown in the case of Miss ESTHA GREATBATCH, who has just passed a great batch of examinations at the second special examination for women at the university at London. She stood first in French and in harmony and counterpoint; also took the second prize at the examination which followed Professor GUTHRIE's lectures on Physics at the London Institute in February, 1870; and, out of seventy-four candidates, the prize for the examination in physical geography which followed Professor HUXLEY's lectures on that subject in 1869. In 1868 Miss GREATBATCH passed as a Junior with first-class honors, and gained a prize for mathematics at the Cambridge Local Examination. In December, 1870, she passed as a Senior with first-class honors, gaining the MILL-TAYLOR scholarship and a prize for political economy. Miss GREATBATCH did not take up the MILLS-TAYLOR scholarship, which can only be held at Cambridge. She is a pupil of the North London Collegiate School for Girls, where she has received her whole education.

—Senator SCHURZ enters the lecture field this fall. He has refused tempting offers by a lyceum agent to deliver three hundred discourses on Mormonism, preferring to select his own themes and talk in his own way.

—Mike ROGERS, the poet, Mr. GROTE, the historian, who died recently, was a banker. He was an advocate of popular rights and of the progressive movement in England toward substantial republicanism. His financial experience and association with men in active business was very valuable to him in his literary work. In person Mr. GROTE was a grave and venerable old gentleman, of average height, slightly bent, with gray hair, a smooth face, a remarkably broad forehead, and peculiarly winning manners. He was seventy-seven, and had long been in infirm health.

—Hon. ANDREW D. WHITE, president of Cornell University, has done himself the honor to add to his previous munificent gifts to that institution $50,000—$20,000 for a library, the remainder for a house for the president.

—The most superb of the toilettes worn at a recent drawing-room reception of the Queen at Buckingham Palace was that of Lady Poltimore, which attracted interest from the fact that the magnificent point d'Alençon veil her ladyship wore was worn by MARIE ANTOINETTE on the occasion of her marriage to LOUIS XVI. It is regarded as a relic of special eminence and of very high figure.

—WILLIAM THAW, Esq., a wealthy gentleman of Pennsylvania, being melted to good deeds, has given $100,000 to the Western University of Pennsylvania, whereby Mr. THAW frees the institution from debt.

—The Rev. Mr. BESKOW, who is the WARD BEECHER of Stockholm, draws immense crowds; and yet he is said to have but one sermon, which he presents in a thousand different forms. He is known there as the kaleidoscopic clergyman.

—Mr. WOODWARD, the gentleman who figured so conspicuously in the Rock Island corner some three weeks ago, is a man of small stature, about forty years of age, dark complexion, reticent, doing nearly all his business through some twenty or thirty brokers, and having one place as his head-quarters. Outside "the street" he is given to works of piety and benevolence, being a prominent Churchman, taking special interest in Sunday-schools, and a liberal giver to the various organizations connected with the Episcopal Church.

—There is considerable talk of Prince NAPOLEON's coming over to spend a portion of his time, and perhaps settle down, among us. If he does, we must all turn to and give him a lift.

—How those old musical composers did continue to live on in Paris!—AUBER, eighty-nine; CHERUBINI, eighty-two; GOSSEC, ninety-six; MONSIGNY, eighty-eight.

—Mrs. and Mr. S. M. SMITH have returned. They started from Boston three years ago for a long and leisurely journey in their carriage. They traveled twelve thousand miles by horses, and thirty thousand by steam, saddle, and canoe in the far West and in Mexico. Visited every place of importance in the countries through which they meandered. Figure $25,000.

—Prince BISMARCK has given to Mrs. B. the table on which the Versailles treaty was signed.

—The Congregationalists of Plymouth Church have captured an ABBOTT—not a mitred one, but a lady of that name, whom Miss KELLOGG ferreted out among the Hoosiers and brought to New York, where her fine voice could be heard and appreciated. Last Sunday night, after service, Mr. BEECHER and some three hundred Puritans who had cunningly found out what was going on remained and heard Miss A. sing "I know that my Redeemer liveth" and other pieces, each of which showed her to have great voice and decided dramatic talent of expression.

—FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE writes to a lady here that she is so overwhelmed with business that for eighteen years she has never had, but twice, a week's holiday, and is and has been a prisoner in her room for years.

—Of the worthy or worthless Mr. WORTH, the noted man-milliner of Paris, a correspondent writes: "Embassadors' wives and court ladies used to go and take tea with the fellow, and dispute the honor of filling his cup or putting sugar into it. I once went into his shop—a sort of drawing-room hung round with dresses; I found him lolling on a chair, his legs crossed before the fire. Around him were a bevy of women, some pretty, some ugly, listening to his observations with the rapt attention of the disciples of a sage. He called them up before him like school-girls, and after inspecting them, praised or blamed their dresses. One, a pretty young girl, found favor in his eyes, and he told her that he must dream and meditate several days over her, in order to find the inspiration to make a gown worthy of her. 'Why do you wear these ugly gloves?' he said to another; 'never let me see you in gloves of that color again.' She was a very grand lady, but she slipped off her gloves and put them in her pocket with a guilty look. When there was going to be a ball at court ladies used to go down on their knees to him to make them beautiful. For some time he declined to dress any longer the wife of a great imperial dignitary, who had not been sufficiently humble toward him. She came to him in tears, but he was obdurate, and he only consented at last to make a gown for her on the condition that she would put it on for the first time in his shop. The Empress, who dealt with him, sent to tell him that if he did not abate his prices she would leave him. 'You can not,' he replied; and, in fact, she could not, for she stood by him to the last. A morning dress by this artist, worth in reality about four pounds, cost thirty pounds; an evening dress, tawdry with flounces, ribbons, and bad lace, could not be had under seventy pounds. There are about thirty shops in Paris where, as at this man-milliner's, the goods are not better than elsewhere, the [illegible] value. They are patronized by fools with more money than wits, and chiefly by foreign fools."

Bag for Bathing Clothes.

THIS bag, which is intended to hold bathing clothes, is furnished with a covering, which is made in braid-work with worsted braid in two shades of brown half an inch wide. The bag is lined with gray carriage leather, and furnished with soufflets of dark brown cashmere. Cut of black muslin one piece from Fig. 59, Supplement, having previously joined on the piece turned down. Stretch the dark brown worsted braid, which is cut in separate pieces, on the muslin. The length of the bag must be observed in making each piece of braid, as these pieces are set on in close succession, and are fastened on the muslin at the ends by a few stitches. Run the light brown braid through the foundation thus formed, beginning at the upper straight edge of the bag; in doing this, alternately take up two dark brown pieces of braid and pass over the next two pieces. To obtain the design shown by the illustration take up only the first piece of braid at the beginning of the second row instead of the first two pieces of dark brown braid; at the beginning of the third row, however, pass over the first two pieces of dark brown braid. The manner of continuing the work is then shown by the illustration and by the three completed rows of braid. The light brown pieces of braid are also fastened on the muslin at the ends with a few stitches. After the braided foundation is finished, sew through it with long stitches of dark brown silk, following the direction of the slanting dark brown rows. Line this part of the bag with gray carriage leather, and cut of the latter and of dark brown cashmere two pieces each from Fig. 60, Supplement. The under edge of each soufflet is gathered from : to *, and overseamed to the bag according to the corresponding figures. Bind the outer edge of the bag with braid, furnish it with buttons and elastic cord loops, and also with tassels and coarse woolen cords, which form the handles of the bag.

Squares for setting together Covers, etc., Figs. 1–4.

THESE squares are partly worked in netted guipure and partly in white embroidery, according to the relative illustrations. They may be used for the purpose above referred to as well as for covering toilette cushions.

Crochet Bib, Figs. 1–4.

See illustrations on page 469.

THIS bib is worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 60, and is edged with crochet lace. Fig. 61, Supplement, gives the pattern for half of the bib. To obtain this shape, widen or narrow at the outer edge. Begin the bib at the lower extremity of the point at the right of the front with a foundation of 2 st. (stitches), and on this crochet, according to the shape of the pattern, the 1st–5th rounds.—Sc. (single crochet); it is to be observed, however, that the thread must be laid on anew at each round. The foundation is begun in the 6th round. Each foundation figure consists of four loops (see illustration, Fig. 2, which shows a full-sized section of the crocheted foundation). In forming each loop, pass the needle, instead of working the next st., through the corresponding st. of the 2d round; draw the working thread up in a loop from the under side to the outside, and work 1 sc. on the next st. of the 5th round; in doing this, fasten the loop at the same time. The loops are repeated in this round after an interval of 11 st. each. 7th round.—Sc. For the remainder, work the foundation as shown by Fig. 2. For the lace at the outer edge of the bib (see Fig. 3), crochet on a foundation the 1st round.—Dc. Crochet Bathing Slipper, Figs. 1 and 2.

THE front of this slipper is worked in single crochet with white Saxony wool, at the same time inserting red zephyr worsted in a palm-leaf design. A cork sole, covered on the inner side with wadding, is covered with a crochet sole of white Saxony wool, corresponding to the shape of the sole of the slipper. Red worsted balls, sewed on in close succession, form the trimming of the slipper. Fig. 33, Supplement, gives the pattern of the front, and Fig. 32 gives that of the sole. Begin the front of the slipper at the toe with a foundation of the requisite length (21 stitches in the original), and on this work sc. (single crochet), always from right to left (thus the thread must be laid on anew at the beginning of each round). Besides this widen at the beginning and end of each round corresponding to the shape of the pattern; in working the 1st stitch of each round lay on a red worsted thread, which is passed partly along the under side and partly along the outside of the work, in order to form the design. In the second round this thread is first passed along the under side, then to the outside before working the first of the three middle stitches of the round. Now work the three middle stitches referred to without paying any attention to the red thread, then again pass the red thread on the under side, and crochet the remaining stitches of the round. The red thread must be fastened in working the last of these stitches. The third round is worked in a similar manner, but in order to form the design, the red worsted thread must be passed to the outside before the five middle stitches of the round, and to the under side after the five middle stitches. In the fourth round pass the red worsted thread to the outside before the five middle stitches of the round, work 6 sc. with white worsted, and then pass the red thread on the under side. The whole front piece of the slipper is worked in this manner, observing the illustration, Fig. 2, which shows a full-sized section of the crochet-work. The cork sole, which must be of the shape given by Fig. 32, Supplement, is first covered on one side with wadding, and then with the crochet sole, which is worked in single crochet with white Saxony wool. Join the sole with the front piece according to the corresponding figures, bind the latter along its free edge with red worsted braid, and trim the slipper with small red worsted balls as shown by the illustration.

point of the next point, one picot of 4 ch. and 1 sc. on the dc., 3 ch., 1 dc. on one of the st. in the next hollow of the point, 3 ch., and repeat from ∗. Finally, work the belt pieces, which are an inch wide and six inches long, in sc., and fasten them to the bib from : to ∗ and from × to ●. The lace shown by Fig. 4 may be used instead of Fig. 3; it is crocheted as shown by the illustration.

Mignardise and Crochet Blouse, Figs. 1 and 2.

THE insertion which is sewed together to make this blouse is crocheted with fine white mignardise and twisted crochet cotton. The illustration, Fig. 2, page 468, shows a full-sized section of the joined insertion. Work the insertion as follows: On the loops at one side of the mignardise the 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on each of the next six loops, after each sc. 3 ch. (chain stitch), ∗ 1 sc. on the following loop, 1 sc. on the seventh following loop (thus passing over six loops), 3 ch., 1 sc. on each of the following five loops, after each sc. 3 ch. Repeat from ∗. 2d round.—1 dc. (double crochet) each on the second, third, fourth, and fifth ch. scallops of the next mignardise scallop of the preceding round, 2 ch. each after the first, second, and third dc., and 4 ch. after the fourth dc.; the first and last ch. scallop of each mignardise scallop is thus left unnoticed. These two rounds are also worked on the loops at the other side of the mignardise, but the design must now be transposed; the sc. must, therefore, always be worked on the seven loops opposite every six loops that have been passed over at the other side of the mignardise. Overhand the insertion together on the wrong side, observing the shape of the blouse. The pattern for the back and fronts of the blouse are given by Figs. 7 and 8, No. III., Supplement. The sleeves are made from the sleeve pattern given by Fig. 34, No. XV., Supplement to Harper's Bazar, Vol. IV., No. 28. Join the blouse in the usual manner, cover the seams on the wrong side with a narrow piece of linen tape, and trim the blouse as shown by the illustration; the trimming consists of insertion edged with lace on both sides. For the lace, crochet on the loops at both sides, of mignardise of the requisite length, one round each like the first round of the insertion. On this round work on the upper side of the lace one round as follows: ∗ 1 sc. on the third ch. of the first ch. scallop of the next mignardise scallop, one picot (of 3 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of the 3 ch.), five times alternately 1 sc. on the third following st. of the preceding round, one picot; then 1 sc. on the third following st. of the preceding round, and repeat from ∗. On the under side of the lace crochet, first, one round like the second round of the insertion, and then an open-work double crochet round. It is to be observed that the lace must be continued along the neck. Run black or colored velvet ribbon, one-fifth of an inch wide, through the blouse as shown by the illustration, and bind the bottom with Swiss muslin half an inch wide. Buttons and button-loops close the blouse.

ORIENTAL THRIFT.

THRIFT is so much of an heir-loom with some nations, and a prudent propensity to save is so intimately interwoven in their natures, that on this point, at any rate, there appears to be a radical difference between them and their neighbors. Perhaps of all the races the most thrifty—employing the word in its true sense—are the Chinese and Hindoos. Thrift is a word of very wide interpretation. It does not mean, as the root principle and guiding star of those whose beacon it is, mere stoical abnegation of the good things of life. The essence of true thrift is to make the most out of such material as comes to hand; to waste nothing, to toss away nothing; not to neglect what might be valuable adjuncts to the essentials of our sustenance; to be careful, thoughtful managers of whatever we have to manage. The two great Eastern races are our masters in this respect. They have so very many mouths to feed that they must husband all their resources. Every spoonful of rice, whether produced by the garden culture of China, or by the ruder tillage of India, is eagerly snatched at; every onion, every gourd, is pressed into the service of man. Instead of bird's-nesting, the urchins of the hamlet catch small fish, or gather roots and berries. The large and constant demand for food stimulates its supply to the highest pitch. Waste and lavishness, except on the occasion of a wedding-feast or of some red-letter day in the Buddhist or Brahminical calendar, are unknown. To a Hindoo audience in particular, the parable of Dives and Lazarus would not come home as an illustration of familiar every-day life. The rich man of their experience does not care to fare sumptuously every day. He may be, and probably is, a mighty merchant prince and colossal money-lender. His villa at Garden Reach, or his mansion in Benares, very likely swarms with miscellaneous dependents, and the costliest London-made furniture may encumber his ill-arranged saloons. Yet this Baboo, who annually defrauds the Indian income-tax collectors to an extent which surpasses all the evasions of the British shuffler, and whose whim it sometimes is to offer to the upper ten hundred of local European society balls of unparalleled splendor, is any thing but self-indulgent. Those who partake of his grandiose hospitality seldom care to think, in the midst of those floods of iced Champagne, and tables piled with every dainty, how very sparely and plainly their entertainer is contented to subsist. A handful of rice and a few yards of cotton cloth are the simple requirements in the way of food and raiment. His poorest servants and hangers-on are as delicately nourished as he, their master and lord. They have pulse and vegetable curry, a little oil wherewith to anoint themselves, a little ghee and a pinch of salt, and so has the founder of the feast. The Dives of Bengal lives almost as temperately as an anchorite. The Pole is a born prodigal. Thrift, in his eyes, is something ignoble, and saving a mark of meanness. He will feast and glitter to-day, at the risk of laying up for himself a succession of hungry and miserable morrows. But then he has hope. That bright, illusive residuum at the bottom of Pandora's box of horrors has been thoroughly domiciled in poor Poland. The whole gifted nation, so clever and so indolent, so winning of manner and so unstable of purpose, seems always possessed by a Micawberish fancy that something delightful is about to turn up. Never mind mortgages and debt; never mind the bad husbandry that keeps the soil sterile, or the lack of forethought which fills the pastures with stunted cattle and raw-boned, ragged sheep. What matter if the peasant be over head and ears in the books of the Jewish brandy-seller, and if every roof be ruinous and every field weed-grown? Something is sure to happen. A salt-mine will be found, perhaps, or a factory will be built, or a war will come that will clear off old scores, and fill our purses in some inexplicably convenient way. So let us have out the crazy old carriage, and the shaggy, half-broken horses, and drive along the sandy roads to somebody's château, that we may dine and dance and conjure dull care away by the potent charms of generous Hungarian wine and the wild Magyar waltz. The Poland of our day must be in some respects very like the Ireland of the Edgeworths—generous and chivalric, but unthrifty and improvident.

DUTCH FUNERALS.

WHEN mynheer dies the body is at once removed from the chamber of death into another room, generally the dining-room, or one of the chief rooms of the house, the blinds are drawn close up to the top, and the shutters completely closed, so that the house looks, and is intended to look, empty: the soul of the house is gone. The notary is immediately sent for, and seals are put by him without delay upon every article or room he may think proper to select. Next comes the aansprecher, a very noticeable person in Amsterdam and the large towns, and a relic of by-gone times, probably the ancient feudal herald. (Mutes and nodding plumes, and all the various trappings and frippery of our own funerals, are without doubt heraldic and feudal in their origin.) A herald he certainly is, and of woe, for it is his duty, taking a list of friends and acquaintances, to go round to all with a message in set form to the effect that Mynheer So-and-so (next follow his titles, dignities, and offices) is dead. Every body then puts on some sign of mourning, and goes that very day, the day of death, to the house, where the family sit in the drawing-room ready to receive condolences. Is it possible to imagine any more trying formality for all to go through? Yet there the bereaved ones remain, in the house of death, in the darkened chamber, compelled to display their grief in the presence of all their friends, and to say a few words to each in answer to their expressions of sympathy and grief. Even a little toddling thing of four or five will march up to mevrouw and utter its little set speech about "sad loss," which is certain to produce a fresh outburst of grief and tears. To crown all, any visitor can ask—is even expected to ask—for a last view of the dead body of their friend as it lies in a sort of state in the shell. The funeral is always an expensive affair. Many aansprechers, occasionally forty or fifty, seem to be required. Undertakers' coaches are there without end, and friends send their empty carriages to swell the state, as with ourselves. Ladies wear very deep crape and long veils. The widow's veil reaches to her feet for the first few weeks; she wears no cap, but her mourning, with a gradually shortening veil, lasts two years. A gentleman in deep mourning is expected to go about at all hours for six weeks in black, with a dress tail-coat and white neck-tie.

A LOVE-SONG OF SORRENTO.

COME away to the shade of the citron grove,
Carina!
To hear the voice of the brooding dove,
Carina!
Her soft throat swells as she tells her love
To her tender mate in the myrtle above,
And their tremulous pinions responsive move,
Cara! Carina!

Ah! Love is sweet as the spring is sweet,
Carina!
For me thou makest the spring complete,
Carina!
The young wind bloweth unto thy feet
A drift of flowers thy steps to meet,
And the wounded blossoms perfume the heat,
Cara! Carina!

They are tokens for only a bride to wear,
Carina!
Yet I would crown thee if I might dare,
Carina!
Ah! shy and sweet and tender and rare,
Put away from thine eyes thy shining hair
Nay, now, have I startled thee unaware?
Cara! Carina!

My heart is lying across thy way,
Carina!
As thou crushest the flowers, wilt thou crush it—say,
Carina?
Or, sadder yet, wilt thou let it stay
Where it is lying, well away,
All on this pleasant morning in May?
Cara! Carina!

My beautiful flower of flowers! No,
Carina!
Thou wilt not scorn it nor crush it so,
Carina!
One true little word before we go;
Close—nestle close—and whisper low—
Low while the faint south breezes blow,
Cara! Carina!

Thou'lt wear nothing but white when we are wed,
Carina!
Thou'lt have orange blossoms about thy head,
Carina!
The maidens shall string them on silver thread;
On a rose-leaf carpet thou shalt tread,
While the bride-blush maketh thy beauty red,
Cara! Carina!

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER XI.

THE climaxes of life come only occasionally. When borne upon the height of them we think we can endure any thing; all beside them seem so small. But when they are over, and we have sunk back into the level of every-day life, it is different. The sword-stroke we hardly felt; the daily pin-pricks drive us wild. It is sure to be so; we can not help it.

At first Hannah thought she could. After that Sunday morning she and Bernard talked no more together—why should they? Their minds were quite made up that both love and marriage were lawful to them—if attainable. But seeing that an immediate union was impossible, and a separation almost equally so, they spoke of neither again, but tacitly determined to go on living together as before—in no way like lovers, but as like brother and sister as was practicable—both for their own sakes, and for the sake of outward eyes.

This decided, Hannah thought her way would be clear. It was only a question of time and patient waiting. Any year the Bill might be passed, and their marriage made possible. In the mean time it was no worse than a long engagement; better, perhaps, since they had the daily comfort of one another's society. At least Hannah felt it so, and was cheerful and content. What Bernard felt he did not say; but he was not always content; often very dull, irritable, and desponding. At such times Hannah had great patience with him—the patience which had now the additional strength of knowing that it was to be exercised for life.

It was most needed, she found, after he had been to the Moat House, whither, according to her wish, he steadily went, and went alone. Had she been his wife, or even openly his betrothed, she might, spite of all she had said, have resented this, but now what could she resent? She had no rights to urge. So she submitted. As to what passed on these visits she asked no questions, and he gave no information. She never saw Bernard's people now, except on Sundays, with the distance of a dozen pews between them. Young Mrs. Melville still called, punctiliously and pointedly, leaving her pair of grays standing outside the gate; but she excused herself from asking Hannah to the Grange, because if the girls were there it would be so very awkward.

"And the girls are always there," added she, querulously. "I can't call my house my own—or my husband's either. Hannah, when you marry you'll be thankful that you've got no sisters."

Hannah smiled. She saw that of the real truth of her position with regard to Mr. Rivers Adeline guessed nothing. It was best so.

As weeks passed another change gradually came. Invitations—the fear of which had sometimes perplexed her, for how should she meet the Moat House family even upon neutral ground?—almost totally ceased. Her neighbors left off calling—that is, her grand neighbors; the humbler ones still sought her; but she fancied she read in their eyes a painful curiosity, a still more painful compassion, especially when they met her and Bernard together—a chance which occurred but seldom now. For he, too, seemed to have a nervous dread of being seen with her, and avoided her so much that she would often have thought he had forgotten every word that had passed between them save for the constant mindfulness, the continual watchful care which a man never shows except to the one woman he loves best in the world.

Yet sometimes even having so much made the weak heart crave for a little, a very little, more; just a word or two of love; an evening now and then of their old frank intercourse, so safe and free. But neither ever came. Bernard seemed to make it a point of honor that whatever people chose to say, they should be given no data upon which to come to the smallest conclusion. Within, as without the house, all the world might have heard every word he said to Miss Thelluson.

Whatever suspicion was whispered about the village, it rose to no open scandal. Every body came to church as usual, and no one applied to Mr. Rivers's bishop to restrain him from preaching because he retained as his housekeeper a lady whom the law persisted in regarding as his sister. But the contradiction was that in spite of her being counted his "sister," people did talk, and would talk; and, of course, the sharpest lash of their tongues fell, not upon the man, but upon the woman.

Slowly, slowly Hannah became aware that every servant in the house, every family in the parish, kept an eye upon her, observing, condemning, sympathizing, defending—all by turns—but never leaving her alone, till she felt like the poor camel in the desert, whose dying gaze sees in the horizon that faint black line coming nearer and nearer—the vultures which are to pick her bones. She would have gone frantic sometimes, brave woman as she was, in the utter impossibility of fighting against the intangible wrong, had it not been for the child.

Rosie became not only her darling but her friend. She had now almost no other companion, and wanted none. All grown-up people seemed worldly and shallow, dull and cold, compared to the pure little soul, fresh out of heaven, which heaven itself had sent to comfort her. As Rosie's English increased they two held long conversations together, very monosyllabic, certainly, and upon the simplest of topics—"bow-wows," "gee-gees," and so on—yet quite comprehensible and equally interesting to both. For is not a growing soul the most interesting and lovely, as well as most solemn sight, in all this world? Hannah sometimes stood in awe and wonder at the intelligence of the little woman not yet three years old.

They two understood one another perfectly, and loved one another as even real mother and child do not always love. For never in all her little life had Rosie heard a harsher word than, "Oh, Rosie, Tannie so sorry!" which sufficed to melt her at once into the most contrite tears. Pure contrition, with no fear of punishment—for she had never been punished. To her innocent, happy heart no harmless joy had ever been denied, no promise ever broken. She knew that, and rested in her little ark of love as content and safe as a nautilus in its shell, swimming over the troubled waters of poor Tannie's lot like a visible angel of consolation.

Day by day that lot was growing more hard to bear, until at last chance brought it to a climax.

One forenoon, just before Mr. Rivers was going out, there drove up to the House on the Hill a pretty pony carriage and pair of grays, and out of it stepped a little, bright, active, pretty woman—the Countess of Dunsmore.

"I knew I should surprise you," cried she, kissing Hannah on both cheeks, and telling her how well she was looking; which she was, in the sudden pleasure of the meeting. "But I wanted to surprise you. We are visiting at Highwood Park; Mr. Rivers and I met your sisters there at dinner, you know, and promised to come and see them; but of course I came to see Miss Thelluson first. Well, my dear, and how are you? And how is your pet Rosie?"

The little Rosie answered for herself, being so greatly attracted by Lady Dunsmore's ermine tails, and, perhaps, by her sweet motherly face, that she made friends with her immediately. But Hannah was nervous—agitated. She knew exactly the expression of that quick dark eye, which saw every thing and saw through every thing, whether or not the lady mentioned the result of that observation.

Bernard, too, was a little constrained. He knew Lady Dunsmore slightly, and evidently was not aware that Hannah knew her so well; for Hannah was not apt to boast of her friends, especially when they happened to have titles. Yet the sight of her warmed her heart, and she had hundreds of questions to ask about her old pupils, and endless reminiscences of her old life with them—so peaceful and contented. Yet would she have had it back rather than the life now? No!—unhesitatingly no!

She felt this, when, having put the blithe little countess in her carriage, Bernard returned. He walked heavily down the garden in deep thought.

"A charming person, Lady Dunsmore, and a warm, steady friend of yours, Hannah."

"Yes, she was always kind to me."

"Kinder than others have been since," said Mr. Rivers, sighing. "Would you like to go and pay her the long visit she asks for?"

"No."

"And what shall you do about that invitation she brought you, to go with my sisters to dine at Highwood Park?"

"What can I do except not go? To explain is impossible."

"Yes." After a moment's thought Mr. Rivers went on: "Hannah, may I say a word? Evidently my people have been quite silent to Lady Dunsmore about you; she expected to meet you at the Moat House. They perhaps are sorry, and would be glad of an opportunity to atone. May I speak to them?"

"Stop a minute. What shall you say? For I will have nothing said that would humiliate me."

Bernard looked tenderly at the flushed face. "My love, any man humiliates himself who for a moment allows the woman he has chosen to be lightly esteemed. Be satisfied; I shall keep up your dignity as if it were my own; for it is my own."

"Thank you." But there was only pride, no sweetness, in the words. They made him turn back at once.

"Oh, Hannah, how long is this state of things to last? How can we bear it if it lasts very long?"

She replied nothing.

"Sometimes I ask myself, why should we bear it, when our consciences are satisfied, when the merest legal form stands between us and our happiness? You do not feel the suspense as I do; I see that; but do you know it sometimes almost drives me mad that I can not marry you?"

His agitation was so extreme that Hannah was frightened, both for his sake and lest any servant should come in and find them thus. Oh, the misery of that false life they led! oh, the humiliation of concealment!

"Why should all the world be happy but me? Why should that foolish old Morecamb— But I forget; I never told you he was going to be married. I tell you nothing; I never have a chance of an hour's quiet talk with you."

"Why not? It would make me much happier."

Those pure, sad, beseeching eyes—he turned away from them; he could not bear them.

"Don't ask me. I dare not. If I saw much of you I would not answer for myself. I might"—he laughed—"I might even horrify you by asking you to go abroad and get married, as old Mr. Melville did. But I will not; no, I will not. And if I would, you would not consent?"

"No."

"I was sure of it. One might as well attempt to move the monument as Hannah Thelluson after she had once said no."

His manner was so rough, so reckless, that it pained her almost more than any thing she had yet experienced. Was their forced, unnatural kind of life injuring him? And if so, ought it to continue? And if it must be ended, was not she the one to do it?

"Bernard," she said, "will you come home to-night?"—for it was now not the rule, but the rare exception, his staying with her of evenings—"then we will have one of our old talks together, and perhaps we may settle something; or feel, when we look them calmly in the face, that things are not so dreadful as they seem. Now go. Hark! there is Rosie calling over the staircase for papa."

He had a real fatherly heart now—this young man, from whom, in his full flush of youth, life's best blessing, a wife's love, was first taken, and then tantalizingly denied. He snatched at the joys still left to him, and clasping his little girl in his arms, pressed his hot forehead upon Rosie's breast.

But all that day his words and tones rang warningly through Hannah's heart. This could not last—it was against human nature. So much, yet so little as they were to one another. They must be more—or less. Should she leave him; for a time, perhaps? or should she go quite away? She knew not what to do; nor what to say when he should come home to her to-night, and appeal to her, with the innocent, half-child-like expression his face sometimes wore, for comfort, counsel. How could she give either? She needed both herself.

And when their formal dinner was over, and they sat together in their pleasant drawing-room, with the yellow twilight glimmering outside—for summer was coming back again, the third summer since Rosa died—life seemed to Hannah so hard, so hard!

She gave him his tea almost in silence, and then he proposed a stroll in the garden, up and down the front walk, which was in full view of the house. Into the sheltered green alley—the "lovers' walk"—these two poor lovers never went; never dared to go.

But such happiness as they could get they took, and Hannah had risen to fetch her shawl, when they saw entering the gate the last apparition they expected to see—Lady Rivers. For months she had not crossed their threshold. But then—Hannah would have been more than mortal not to have remembered this—it had been crossed that morning by the Countess of Dunsmore.

Lady Rivers was by no means a stupid woman. Her faculty for discovering which way the wind blew, and trimming her sails accordingly, amounted to absolute genius. Not being thin-skinned herself, she never looked for that weakness in others; so had under all circumstances the most enviable coolness and self-possession. The graceful air with which she entered by the French window, kissed Bernard in motherly greeting, and shook hands with Miss Thelluson as if she had seen her only the day before, was most inimitable.

"How comfortable you look here! it is quite a pleasure to see you. May I ask for a cup of tea? your tea used always to be so good, Miss Thelluson. And you had a visit from Lady Dunsmore? So had we afterward. What a charming person she is; and a great friend of yours, I understand."

Hannah assented.

"I must congratulate you; for a lady, especially a single lady, is always judged by her choice of friends."

"I did not choose Lady Dunsmore for my friend; I was her governess."

"Indeed! Anyhow, she has evidently a great regard for you. By-the-bye, does she know any thing of the—the little uncomfortableness between us lately, which, as I came to say to-night, is, I trust, entirely a thing of the past. Don't speak, Bernard. In fact, this visit is not meant for you. I came over to tell Miss Thelluson of something which—as Mr. Morecamb was the cause of difference between her and me" (Hannah opened her eyes)—"will, I trust, heal it. He is engaged to be married to my eldest daughter."

Hannah offered the customary good wishes.

"It is indeed a most suitable marriage, and we are quite pleased at it. So now, my dear, let by-gones be by-gones. Will you come with Bernard to meet Lady Dunsmore at dinner on Friday?"

Never was there a more composed putting of the saddle upon the wrong horse, ignoring every thing that it was advisable to ignore, for the sake of convenience. And many a woman, prudent and worldly wise, would have accepted it as such. But, unfortunately, Hannah was not a prudent woman. Against certain meannesses her spirit revolted with a fierceness that slipped all self-control.

She glanced toward Bernard, but his eyes were turned away; he had the moody, uncomfortable look of a man dragged unwillingly into women's wars. Thrown back upon herself, alone, quite alone, pride whispered that she must act as if she were alone, as if his love were all a dream, and she once more the solitary, independent Hannah Thelluson, who, forlorn as she was, had always been able till now to hold her own—had never yet experienced an insult or submitted tamely to an injury. She would not now.

"I thank you, Lady Rivers, for the trouble you have taken, but it will be quite impossible for me to accept your invitation."

Lady Rivers looked amazed. That any concession she made should not be joyfully received—that any invitation to the Moat House should not be accepted with avidity: the thing was ridiculous. She paused a moment, as if doubting she had heard aright, and then appealed to Bernard.

"Pray assure Miss Thelluson that she need not hesitate. I have watched her narrowly of late, and have quite got over any little prejudices I might have had. I and the girls will be delighted to see her. Do persuade her to come with you."

"Excuse me, but I always leave Miss Thelluson to decide for herself."

The cold voice, the indifferent manner, though she knew both were advisable and inevitable, smote Hannah to the core. That bitter position of love and no love, ties and no ties, seemed to degrade her almost as if she had been really the vile thing that some people thought her.

"Mr. Rivers is right," she said; "I must decide for myself. You wished my visits to you to cease; I acquiesced. It will not be quite so easy to resume them. As Mr. Rivers's sister-in-law and housekeeper I shall always be happy to see you in his house; but I fear you must excuse my coming to yours. Let us dismiss the subject. Shall I offer you a cup of tea?"

Her manner, gentle as it was, implied a resolution strong enough to surprise even Bernard. For Lady Rivers, she colored, even beneath her delicate rouge; but she was too prudent to take offense.

"Thank you. Your tea, as I said, is always excellent; and perhaps when we have more attractions to offer you we may yet see you at the Moat House. In the mean time I hope, Bernard, that Miss Thelluson's absence will not necessitate yours?"

And she looked hard at him, determined to find out how he felt in the matter, and to penetrate, if possible, the exact relations between the two.

It was a critical moment. Most men—even the best of them—are, morally, very great cowards, and Bernard was no exception to the rule. Besides, Hannah was not his wife or his betrothed; she had not even called herself his friend; she had given him no rights over her, asked no protection from him. What could he do or say? Irresolute, he looked from one to the other, excessively uncomfortable, when Hannah came to the rescue.

"Of course my brother-in-law will go without me: we are quite independent in our proceedings. And he will explain to Lady Dunsmore—the utmost it is necessary to explain, as I never talk of my private affairs to any body—that I do not pay many visits. I had rather stay at home with my little girl. That will be perfectly true," she added, her lips slightly quivering. "I prefer Rosie's company to any body's. She loves me."

Bernard started up, and then, fearful of having committed himself, sat down again. Lady Rivers, though evidently vexed, was equal to the situation, and met it with a dignified indifference.

"Pray please yourself, Miss Thelluson; no doubt you act upon your own good reasons. You are, I always understood, a lady who never changes her mind; but if you should do so, we shall be glad to see you." And then she passed over the matter, as too trivial to bear further discussion, and conversed in the most amiable manner for another half hour. Finally, with a benign "Good-evening, Miss Thelluson; I am sure Lady Dunsmore will be much disappointed at not seeing you," she terminated the visit as if it had been any ordinary call.

Hannah was not surprised. It was the fashion of the Rivers family not to see any thing they did not wish to see. The only thing that vexed her was about Bernard. He had said nothing—absolutely nothing—except telling her, when he took his hat to accompany his step-mother home, that he would be back immediately. Was he displeased with her? Did he think she had acted ill? Had she done so? Was it her duty to submit to every thing for his sake? Surely not. He had no right to expect it. Was it because she loved him that she felt so bitterly angry with him?

Yet when, sooner than she had expected, he returned, and threw himself into his chair, pale and dejected, like a man tied and bound by fate, who sees no way to free himself, the anger melted, the pity revived. He too suffered—they suffered alike. Why should they reproach one another?

"So you have had your way, Hannah." Yes, there was reproach in the tone. "Are you quite sure you were right in what you have done?"

"Quite sure; at least, that unless I were some other than myself, I could not have done differently."

And then they sat silent, in stiff coldness, until the last ray of amber twilight had faded out of the room. What a pretty room it was!—just the place to be happy in; for friends or lovers, or husband and wife, to sit and dream together in the quiet gloaming, which all happy people love—which is so dreadful to the restless or the miserable.

"We should have rung for lights," said Bernard, pulling violently at the bell. "You know I hate the dark."

And when lights came they saw one another's faces—his burning crimson, hers pale and in tears.

"Oh, Hannah, Hannah, how miserable we are! As I said, if this goes on much longer, how shall we bear it?"

"I do not know." Then, steeling herself against both anger and pain, "Bernard," she said, "what did you wish me to do? Your family have no claim upon me, nor I upon them. We are, as things stand, mere strangers. Are they to throw me off and pick me up again when and how they choose? Am I to submit to it?"

"I did not ask you."

"No, but you looked it. You would have liked me to go to the Moat House."

"Yes. I wish you to be friends with them. I want them to love you."

"They do not love me; they only receive me on sufferance, and I will go nowhere on sufferance. I can live alone. I want no society; but where I do go I want to be loved, I want to be respected. Oh, Bernard!" and she looked piteously in his face, "sometimes I am tempted to say, with you, if this lasts long, how shall I ever bear it?"

"How shall I bear it? It is harder for me than you."

"Perhaps. But you forget it was your doing, not mine."

And then both drew back, appalled at the sharpness of their words—at the bitterness of these mutual recriminations.

Bernard held out his hand. "Forgive me. You are right. It was I who brought all this trouble upon you, and now I have not strength to meet it—either for you or for myself. I am so miserable that it makes me wicked. Something must be done. What shall it be?"

"What, indeed?"

"Hannah, decide. Don't look at me in that dead silence. Speak out, for I can bear it no longer. Shall we part? Or—will you marry me at once?"

He could have hardly known what he was saying, or else, in his despair, any thing seemed possible to him. Not to her. She was very gentle. She did not even draw away her hands which he had grasped: she scarcely seemed to recognize the insult he was unwittingly offering her. She only answered, sorrowfully, yet without the slightest indecision, "We will part."

Three little words—but they brought Bernard to his senses immediately. He fell on his knees before her, and passionately begged her forgiveness.

"But you do not know what I suffer. Inwardly, outwardly—life is one long torment. At the Moat House I have no peace. They talk at me—and at you; they try every means of worming out my secret from me. But they shall not. I will hide it at all costs. People may guess what they like, but we are safe so long as they know nothing. God help me! I talk as if we were committing a deadly sin, when my love of you is the best thing—the only good thing in me." He looked up at Hannah, and ground his teeth. "It is an accursed law," he said; "a law made only for fools or sinners; and yet it may suffice to blast both our lives."

"No," Hannah answered, "nothing could do that—except ourselves."

"A commonplace truth!" and Bernard laughed bitterly.

"It is God's truth, though; His right and wrong are much simpler than man's."

"What is right and what is wrong? for I am growing so mad I hardly know. Show me—preach to me: I used to tell you you could preach better than the clergyman. Only love me, Hannah—if there is any love in that pale, pure face of yours. Sometimes I think there is none."

"None—oh, Bernard, none?"

For a minute she stooped over him; for a minute he felt that she had not a stone for a heart. And then the strong, firm, righteous will of the woman who, however deeply loving, could die, but would not do wrong, forced itself upon him, lulling passion itself into a temporary calm. He leaned his head against her; he sobbed upon her arm like a child; and she soothed him almost as if he had been a child.

"Listen to me," she said. "We must endure—there is no help for it. It is a cruel, unjust law, but it is the law, and while it exists we can not break it. I could not twist my conscience in any possible way so as to persuade myself to break it. No form of marriage could ever make me legally your wife."

"Not in England. Out of England it could."

"But then—as soon as we came back to England, what should I be? And if, in the years to come— Oh Bernard, it is impossible, impossible."

She said no more than that—how could she? But she felt it so intensely that, had it been necessary, she would have smothered down all natural shame, and said out to him—as solemnly as if it had been a vow before God—her determination never, for any personal happiness of her own, to entail upon innocent children the curse of a tainted name.

"I understand," Bernard replied, humbly. "Forgive me; I ought never to have said a word about our marrying. It must not be. I must go on my way alone to the end."

"Not quite alone—oh, not quite alone."

But, as if more afraid of her tenderness than of her coldness, Bernard rose, and began walking about the room.

"You must decide—as I said; for my own judgment altogether fails me. We can not go on living as we do: some change must be thought of; but I can not tell what it should be."

"Why need it be?" said Hannah, timidly. "Can we not continue as we are?"

"No." A fierce, abrupt, undeniable No.

"Then—I had better go away." He looked so terrified that she hastily added, "Only for a time, of course; till the bitterness between you and your people softens; till we can see our way a little. It must be made plain to us some day; I believe it always is to those who have innocent hearts."

And as she sat, her hands folded on her lap, pale and sad as she looked, there was such a sweet composure in her aspect that Bernard stopped and gazed—gazed till the peace was reflected on his own.

"You are a saint, and I am—only a man; a very wretched man sometimes. Think for me—tell me what I ought to do."

Hannah paused a little, and then suggested that he should, for a few weeks or so, part with Rosie and herself, and let them go, as Lady Dunsmore had earnestly wished, to pay her a visit in London.

"Did she say so?" said Bernard, with sensitive fear. "Do you think she said it with any meaning—that she has any idea concerning us?"

"You need not be afraid even if she had," was the rather proud answer. Alas! how quick they were growing to take offense, even at one another. Yes, it was best to part. "I mean," Hannah added, "that, even if she guessed any thing, it would not signify. I shall confess nothing; and I have often heard her say that a secret accidentally discovered ought to be held just as if it had never been discovered at all. Be satisfied—neither Lady Dunsmore nor I shall betray you, even to one another."

And for a moment Hannah thought with comfort that this good woman was her friend—had grown more and more such as absence discovered to both their mutual worth. It would be a relief after the long strain to rest upon this genial feminine companionship—this warm and kindly heart.

"She will treat me like a friend, too—not like her old governess, if you are uneasy about that. Or, if you like it better, I shall be received less as poor Hannah Thelluson than as Mr. Rivers's sister-in-law and Rosie's aunt. I am to go about with her every where—she made me quite understand that. A strange, changed life for me; but my life is all so strange."

And Hannah sighed. She felt as if she had let her oars go, and were drifted about involuntarily, she knew not whither, hardly caring whether she should ever touch land; and if she did, whether it would be as a living woman or a creature so broken down and battered that she could neither enjoy nor suffer any more. Who could tell? Fate must decide.

Mr. Rivers listened to her silently, but full of thought—thoughts which, perhaps she could not have followed had she tried. He was a very good man, but he was also a man of the world; he would not have been a Rivers else. He saw at once the advantage of Lady Dunsmore's countenance—not merely because she happened to be a marquis's daughter and an earl's wife, but because in any society she was the sort of person whose friendship was valued and valuable. Was it human nature, or only masculine nature, that, dearly as he loved Hannah, Bernard unconsciously prized her the more because she was prized by such a woman as the Countess of Dunsmore?

"Go, then," he said. "I will not hinder you. Pay your visit; you will be happy; and it will in many ways be a good thing." Then with a nervous eagerness that, in spite of her reason, pained Hannah acutely, "When does she want you? How soon can you start?"

"Any day, since you are so glad to get rid of me."

"Oh, Hannah!"

They stood side by side, these two lovers, between whom was a barrier slight and invisible as glass, yet as impossible to be broken through without sore danger and pain. They could not break it; they dared not.

"Things are hard for us—very hard," said Bernard, almost in a groan. "We shall be better apart, at least for a time. I meant to have gone away myself to-morrow; but if you will go instead—"

"I can not to-morrow. I will as soon as I can."

"Thank you."

She did not sob, though her throat was choking; she only prayed. Dimly she understood what he was suffering; but she knew he suffered very much. She knew, too, that however strangely it came out, in bitterness, anger, neglect, still the love was there, burning with the intensity of a smothered fire—all the more for being suppressed. The strength which one, at least, of them must have, she only cried to Heaven for—and gained.

"Good-by," she said; "for we shall not talk thus together again. It is better not."

"I know it is. But you love me: I need not doubt that?"

"Yes, I love you," she whispered. "Whatever happens, remember that; and oh! keep me in your heart till death."

"I will," he said; and snatching her close, held her there, tight and fast. For one minute only; then letting her go, he bade her once more "Good-night and good-by," and went away.

Three days after, Miss Thelluson, the child, and the nurse started for London together, Mr. Rivers himself seeing them off from the railway.

Rosie was in an ecstasy of delight—to be "going in a puff-puff with Tannie" being to the little maid the crown of all human felicity. She kept pulling at her papa's hand, and telling him over and over again of her bliss; and every time he stopped and listened, but scarcely answered a word. Grace, too, looked glad to go. Easterham, with James Dixon still hovering about, was a cruel place for her to live in. Hannah only looked grave and pale; but she smiled whenever her little girl smiled; and to the one or two persons who spoke to her at the railway station, where, of course, they were known to every body, she spoke also in her usual gentle way.

Only when Mr. Rivers kissed Rosie, saying, "Papa will miss his little girl," and then turning, shook hands with her silently, Hannah grew deadly pale for a minute. That was all. The train moved off, and she saw him walking back, solitary, to his empty house.

Life has many anguishes; but perhaps the sharpest of all is an anguish of which nobody knows.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE prospective visit of the Emperor and Empress of Brazil to this country awakens special interest in details concerning Brazil itself. It is an empire of modern date, having become an independent state in 1822, during the reign of Dom Pedro I., father of the present Emperor. The Brazilian royal family descends in the direct male line from the house of Braganza, the female line of which is now ruling over Portugal. The royal family of Portugal took refuge in Brazil in 1807, and in 1815 the "colony" was elevated to the rank of a kingdom. On the return of the Portuguese court to Europe in 1821, a national congress assembled at Rio de Janeiro, and on May 13, 1822, chose Dom Pedro, eldest son of King John VI. of Portugal, as "Perpetual Protector" of Brazil. This protectorship was changed into empire in September of the same year. Dom Pedro having become unpopular during the latter years of his reign, abdicated his throne in 1831 in favor of his only son, then a child five years old. During his boyhood the empire was racked with civil wars, but on his majority being proclaimed, at the age of fifteen, a period of peace and prosperity commenced for Brazil. The young sovereign showed wonderful prudence and ability; and maturer years have proved Dom Pedro II. to be a monarch of enlightened mind, cultivated and progressive. He has been unsparing in his efforts to raise his country to a high and hopeful condition. Slavery still exists in Brazil, but its days are probably numbered; and a government measure is now under consideration by the Brazilian Chamber of Deputies which has for its object the gradual emancipation of slaves and the compensation of masters.

Ocean Foam is the very appropriate name of a Cape May newspaper. Whether certain Illinois journals which display the startling cognomens of Hawk's Eye, Owl's Call, and Turkey Wing are equally felicitous we will not venture to say.

The little girls will thank Mrs. Craik—better known as Miss Mulock—for giving them such a charming volume as "Little Sunshine's Holiday." Written in a style at once simple and beautiful, and represented to be the truthful experience of a little girl taken to enjoy a holiday trip, the little folks will find it peculiarly attractive. This is the first of a series of volumes, to be published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, which Mrs. Craik has undertaken to prepare for girls of all ages. No one could be better fitted for such a task; and from her preface we perceive she has entered upon it with genuine interest. In closing, she says: "I was once a girl myself, and I have a little girl of my own. I think that both mothers and girls may trust me that I will do my best."

The public thoroughfares of this city seem to grow more and more unsafe. A few days ago a lady applied for surgical treatment for a wound received under the following mysterious circumstances. She was passing the corner of Grand and Lewis streets on her way to the Williamsburg ferry, when she heard a report like that of a pistol, and felt something strike her dress. She was not at the time aware of being wounded, but while on board the ferry-boat discovered that she had been hurt and was losing blood. On probing the wound the surgeon found that a bullet had passed through her thigh, narrowly escaping the femoral artery. The young lady disavowed all knowledge of the cause of the shooting.

A new list of abbreviations should be added to the spelling-books. A package marked "1 box Tom Cats," recently received by a Cleveland merchant, was discovered to mean a box of tomato catsup; but all merchants might not have been investigating enough to find out this fact.

The Evening Mail regards it as the most astonishing event since the discovery of America, and a sure sign that the millennium is at hand, that our local Jehus have formed a Low Fare Association, agreeing not to charge more than fifty cents for a single passenger and trunk to any part of the city. It will indeed be amazing if one can trust to such an agreement being faithfully fulfilled. Time will show.

A new version of "Enoch Arden" has appeared in Freeport, Long Island. Twenty-seven years ago a young man married a belle of that village. As the newly wedded pair had the good wishes of the entire community, the wedding-day was made a half-holiday by the simple villagers. The young husband followed the sea for a livelihood, but he did not prosper, and finally, when the gold fever broke out, he sought the new El Dorado. His wife was yet young, and with his two children struggled on. A few letters were at first received, but soon they failed to arrive, and his wife gave him up for lost. A short time ago Freeport had a genuine sensation in the arrival of the long-lost one; but it brought sadness to the heart of his once wife, for she had found a new husband and a father for her children. The husband, however, found no fault, and accrediting the unpleasantness to his own unmanliness, instead of recriminations, settled a considerable fortune on his two children, and suddenly left the neighborhood.

Pistols and candles do not always agree. A Tennessee youth went to bed leaving a burning candle and a loaded pistol on the table. The dripping sperm set fire to the table, the table ignited the pistol, the barrels began to explode, and when the young man awoke he was nearly burned, smothered, and shot to death. His pillow received the balls and saved his head.

The Princess Royal of Prussia is said to be engaged on a work entitled "Female Labor in Germany," the object of which is the enlightenment of the British public with regard to the resources of female workers in her adopted country, and the suggestion of the same domestic activity among the women and girls of the working classes in England. Her Royal Highness has made herself highly popular in Berlin by her attention to the education of the poor.

The Paris Figaro estimates the value of the building materials alone, in the public edifices and other property destroyed in Paris, at fifty-two million dollars. This, of course, makes no allowance for artistic value and historical association. An army of a hundred thousand men must be employed for five years to replace the lost structures. The Figaro says of the men who have wrought this destruction: "The Tyrtæuses of the revolutionary Commune have declared a hundred times that they would triumph or be buried under the ruins of Paris. They have but half kept their word. They left their disciples, their admirers, their fanatics, to be buried, while, far from seeking a death in which there would have been some degree of grandeur, they themselves took advantage of the tumult caused by the conflagration to steal away in all sorts of disguises from danger and punishment. Yet men can be found to plead extenuating circumstances in their favor, and to talk of indulgence, amnesty, and pardon. But if the sight of the smoking ruins were not enough to put away all idea of clemency, we need only think of the men in whose hands the ringleaders put the incendiary torch, and who have perished, crushed by the ruins or shot in platoons along the crumbling walls. What was only just for the obscure accomplices can not be too much for the real authors of the crimes. Future indulgence would imply the condemnation of past severity, and would be giving encouragement to future criminals."

The deaths from small-pox in London are reported to be over two hundred a week. Familiarity has, to a great extent, brought about its proverbial result—contempt for danger: so say local papers.

About twenty stores have been opened on Bellevue Avenue, Newport, just for the gay season. The merchants are mostly from out of town. Bellevue Avenue, with its macadamized road and fine villas, is one of the most pleasant drives in the country. The avenue proper is two miles in length, and the extension, built three years ago, is nine miles long. A more splendid ocean drive can scarcely be found.

An exchange asserts that the white-looking, cheap sponges sold on the streets are dangerous to health; that in many cases they have done service at hospitals in contagious diseases, and that the cleansing process has only been partial. The chlorine used in cleaning them gives the attractive white appearance; but dark sponges are safer and stronger.

Crochet Shawl worn as a Summer Hood.

THE shawl from which this hood is arranged is crocheted with fine white split zephyr worsted in the design shown by the illustration on page 468, and is edged with a ruffle worked in a similar manner, and also with bows of pink silk ribbon an inch and a half wide, as shown by the illustration. The foundation of the shawl is thirty-two inches square. Begin with a foundation thirty-two inches long, and on this crochet as many rounds in the design shown by the illustration on page 468 until the foundation is as long as it is broad. For the ruffle on the edge make a foundation which must be longer by one-half than the circumference of the foundation. On this foundation work 30 rounds in the foundation design, and on the stitches of the last round work the following edging: 1st round of lace.—Slip stitches up to the next 4 ch. (chain stitch) of the last round, * 9 ch., and, going backward, one single crochet on the 8th of the 9 ch. (thus passing over the 9th ch.), three times alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet) each on the second following ch., then 1 ch.; pass over the next 4 st. (stitch) of the preceding round with the point thus formed, 10 slip stitches on the following 10 st., and repeat from *. 2d round.—1 dc. on the first slip stitch of the preceding round, 1 dc. on the second of the next ch.; these two dc. are not each worked off separately, but together; * then 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following ch. of the point (this is the same ch. on whose other vein 1 dc. has already been worked), 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following ch. of the point, 1 ch., 2 dc. divided by 1 ch. on the st. at the extremity of the point, 3 ch., 2 dc. divided by 1 ch. on the same st. on which the preceding 2 dc. have been worked; now, going forward at the other side of the point, 1 ch., and twice alternately 1 dc. each on the following dc. of the point, 1 ch., then 1 dc.; this, however, is not worked off alone, but together with the following dc., which must be worked on the fourth of the ten slip stitches of the preceding round; 1 ch., 1 dc. on the third following slip stitch of the preceding round, 1 dc. on the second of the 9 ch. of the following point; the 2 dc. last worked are not worked off each separately, but together. Repeat from *. Work similar edging on the foundation stitches at the other side of the strip. Gather the strip, at a distance of an inch from one side, to fit the size of the shawl, and set on the ruffle thus formed; the ruffle must be gathered more closely at the corners of the shawl. The shawl thus completed is now doubled, so that it forms a triangle, with the lower half projecting four-fifths of an inch beyond the upper one, then lay the front edge (the fold) of the shawl over on the right side about two inches wide, and arrange the shawl at the middle at a distance of nine inches and three-quarters from the front edge, in a box-pleat two inches wide. Turn the back corner (double layer of the shawl) over on the outside, so that the point of the ruffle overlaps the front edge of the shawl, as shown by the illustration. Lay the corners, which are folded on the outside, in a pleat, so that the ruffles meet, and trim the hood thus arranged with pink bows as shown by the illustration. The head-dress thus formed is extremely becoming, somewhat resembling a Mary Stuart cap, and will be found very convenient, especially at the sea-side.

PRECIOUS STONES.

SHAKSPEARE, in his celebrated lines on Anne Hathaway, enumerates the "Orient list"—

"The diamond, topaz, amethyste,
The emerald mild, the ruby gaye"— and to these must be added the sapphire. With the exception of the diamond, these gems are known by the name of corundum stones, and are also, with that exception, the hardest among the mineral products of nature.

As the diamond is pure crystallized carbon, so the corundum stones are pure crystallized clay. The green, violet, and yellow corundum stones are distinguished as the Oriental emerald, amethyst, and topaz, the true emerald, amethyst, and topaz being distinct minerals. Adamantine spar is a common kind of corundum; and emery, so extensively used in polishing glass and other fine surfaces, is of the same nature.

All the corundum stones are found in greatest abundance in Asia, hence the epithet Orient gems. The finest rubies are still procured from India, though others of an inferior kind are found in Bohemia. Many rubies, rudely cut and imperfectly polished, are seen in antique jewelry. Though they occur set as rings, they are seldom engraved, owing to the excessively hard nature of the stone. The ruby or carbuncle figures extensively both in Oriental romance and medieval superstition. It was supposed to give light in the dark, and in the time of the learned Camillus Leonardus—physician to Cæsar Borgia—was endowed in the popular belief with many wonderful virtues. It was an antidote to poison; and if the wearer were threatened with misfortune the stone lost its crimson glow, and turned dark; when the evil was passed or averted, it resumed its pristine color.

Pale sapphires may be rendered entirely colorless by exposure to intense heat; they thus also acquire great brilliancy, and are sometimes passed off as diamonds. There are several intaglios engraved on these white sapphires that were at one time believed to be on the more precious gem. The sapphire, as well as the ruby, was formerly considered as an antidote to poison, and a preservative against infection. Dioscorides says that the sapphire, inclosed in a box with a spider, "kills her suddenly, such is his power over her poison." According to Solinus, "this is the gem that feels the air and sympathizes with the heavens, and does not shine equally if the sky be cloudy or bright."

The true emerald, instead of being pure clay like the corundum stones, has a mixture of flint and glucine, besides small portions of iron and lime. According to some chemists, its beautiful grass-green color is attributable to the oxide of chrome; others refer it to the carburet of hydrogen, similar to the chlorophyle, which is the coloring matter in leaves of plants.

APRON FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.

No other gem is so liable to flaws and defects as the emerald; even the smallest Peruvian stone scarcely escapes one flaw, if not more. This is so much the case that a perfect specimen is looked upon with suspicion, for no gem has been more thoroughly imitated.—This liability to defect renders emeralds extremely various in price.

The Orientals have a great veneration for the emerald to this day; they believe that it has the power of endowing the wearer with courage, and of averting the plague. By the ancients it was supposed to be beneficial to the eyesight. Nero is said to have watched the gladiatorial combats by means of their reflection in an emerald. Theophrastus mentions the custom of wearing an emerald set in a ring, and refers it to the idea that occasionally casting the eyes upon it was refreshing to the sight; and ancient gem engravers were in the habit of keeping one of these stones by them, to turn to when their eyes were strained by the minuteness of their work.

If a large emerald be held so as to reflect the light, it will appear as if it were silvered at the back; and its plane being brought to a particular angle with the ray of light, its green disappears, and it precisely resembles a fragment of looking-glass. It is the only gem susceptible of this change.

On the conquest of Peru the Spaniards obtained possession of an immense emerald, something of the shape and nearly the size of an ostrich egg. This was supposed by the Peruvians to be the abode of the goddess Esmeralda. The priests persuaded the people that no offerings were so acceptable to this goddess as her own children, and on holy-days quantities of emeralds were brought into the temple by her worshipers. It is said that the Spaniards found many hundred-weight of these jewels. Cortéz presented one hundred-weight to the king; and when he married, among other valuable gifts to his bride were emeralds cut into various forms; one of these, carved as a rose, so much excited the envy of the queen as to cause the imprudent Cortéz to lose his favor at court.

The topaz is harder than the emerald, and in this respect ranks next to the sapphire. It consists of about one-half clay, one-third flint, and the remainder fluoric acid. The topaz varies in tint from pale yellow to orange. The yellow topaz, by burning, may be changed into an agreeable pinkish hue, and is in this state much admired. Some of the topaz stones found in Brazil are white; these, when polished, are almost as brilliant as white sapphire, and receive the name of nova minas, or nova mina diamonds.

A few blue topazes have been found as beautiful in color as the sapphire, only not so hard. The true topaz is found in Brazil, and in Bohemia, Saxony, and other parts of Germany. It was believed by the ancients to have the same property as the ruby, that of giving light in the dark, and was thought to lose its color in the presence of poison.

The amethyst is the least hard among those stones properly termed jewels. It is crystallized flint, its beautiful violet color being due to the presence of iron and manganese. The Oriental amethyst is extremely rare; previous to the French revolution, Monsieur D'Augny, a wealthy financier, was the only private person known to possess a specimen. The real amethyst resembles the Oriental gem, or violet corundum stone, only in color. It is frequently found in masses, some large enough to allow of drinking cups being carved out of the solid piece. These cups were believed, both in ancient times and in the Middle Ages, to counteract the intoxicating power of the wine. The amethyst was also thought to dispel sleep and sharpen the intellect. A fine, clear, deep-colored amethyst is the proper stone for a bishop's ring. The amethyst is a favorite stone with engravers; intaglios of all ages are found carved in this gem. Even Egyptian and Etruscan scarabei in amethyst are not uncommon. The most precious set of amethysts in existence is a necklace that belonged to Queen Charlotte; it is valued at £2000. According to strict etiquette, this is the only precious stone it is allowable to wear while in mourning.

MY LOVE.

I WONDER does she recall
The night when first I met her:
I was standing there in the hall,
Thinking 'twould be much better
To go and smoke a cigar
In my own little rooms close by
Than to stand and gaze afar
On the big rooms I couldn't get nigh.

Tenderly some, some gravely,
Were chatting in groups and pairs,
While she and her mother bravely
Were struggling to get up stairs.
She turned, and I saw her face—
Only an instant she turned—
And I fell that instant from grace,
And forgot all that I had learned.

I wonder did she remark
Me standing there as she passed,
Or know that into the dark
A ray from her eye had passed?
We were not so far asunder
As she passed along the hall—
What a fool I must be to wonder!
She never saw me at all.

MY FIRST DINNER-PARTY.

"MABEL," said my aunt to me as I sat at my work in the bay-window, ever and anon letting it drop idly in my lap to gaze out at the beautiful carriages and gayly dressed people that passed to and fro beneath my eyes—"Mabel, my cold is really too bad to allow of my going to Mrs. Dalton's to-night, so I have written her a note to say you will take my place, in case she should not know of any other substitute. It would never do to have an empty chair at a dinner-party, and it would be but a poor compliment to ask any one as late as the same day."

"But, aunt, I have no fit dress to wear; and, besides, I shouldn't know how to behave. I have never been at a dinner-party in my life."

"All the more reason you should not let slip so unusual a chance," said my aunt, authoritatively. "It is one of the privileges of your visit to me that you get a glimpse at least of society."

Now my aunt thought a great deal of society, and of her place in it, and, I believe, considered that the dreary months I spent with her at Britson were quite repaid by the advantages to be derived from her reflected glory. As, however, I left a cheerful home in the country and young brothers and sisters for the grand but unhomelike apartments of my formidable aunt at Britson, I am afraid I did not look upon my advantages in the right light.

But I was a poor clergyman's daughter, and consequently, it is hardly necessary to add, one of a numerous family—I being the eldest of the thirteen. For this reason, I suppose, I had always been the one selected to go and stay with Aunt Neville whenever a peremptory summons had come to my mother (her niece) to send one of the children to her. We all—mother included—stood in some awe of Aunt Neville; she had such a commanding presence, dressed so handsomely, and moved in such high circles—compared, that is, with our very limited one. She was apt to be somewhat imperious too, when thwarted, though most kind and genial in a general way. No wonder, with her warm heart and open-handed hospitality, she was a universal favorite. Her very peculiarities, her hot partisanship, her strong prejudices and hearty likes and dislikes, all added, I think, to her popularity.

As for myself, I both loved and feared her, but could not throw off the feeling of restraint and shyness which continually harassed me in her company, especially when any of her numerous visitors were present. I was not "come out," being barely seventeen, and was, therefore, treated as a child on all occasions of ceremony, never appearing at my aunt's table when she had friends with her, and usually left in the carriage when I went with her making calls. Thus it was no wonder that this sudden idea of going alone to a dinner-party nearly took away my breath. But my aunt was not to be withstood when she spoke in that authoritative tone. The most I could do was to repeat my first objection, namely, the want of a dress.

"Nonsense, child!" said my aunt. "Summers shall see to that. A muslin frock can be soon got ready, and I will lend you my necklace and chaplet of pearls. But mind you are ready punctually at a quarter to seven. I shall order a cab for you; it is not worth while to take out the horses for so short a distance."

"Where does Mrs. Dalton live?" I asked.

"Let me see," replied my aunt; "the address must be on her note. She is an old friend of mine, but has only lately come to Britson, so that I have not found her out yet. Ah! here in good time comes her reply. I will let you keep the address."

So saying, she glanced over the note given her, and then handed it to me. I grasped it eagerly, as a criminal might a queen's pardon. Surely it would contain a release. But no; it ran as follows:

"MY DEAR MRS. NEVILLE,—Though deeply grieved to lose so valuable an addition to our party as yourself, we shall be very pleased to see your young niece, and only wish you could both come to us. We shall be almost entirely a family gathering; therefore she need not fear a formal dinner-party. I subjoin my address, as there are other Daltons living also in Cumberland Street, who do not belong at all to us. Bid your niece, therefore, be particular as to the number. Yours sincerely, EMILY DALTON."

The note was so kind and friendly that I felt somewhat relieved, and listened attentively to a long story my aunt had to tell me about her friends.

"Mrs. Dalton is a sweet woman, who has been sorely tried," she said. "Her husband is dead, and her eldest son—a fine, handsome fellow—had a sun-stroke when he was with his regiment in India, and has never been the same since. I don't mean that he is mad; but at times he is very peculiar, and has to be humored in his queer fancies. He will probably dine with you; so I tell you this that you may not appear surprised at any thing he may say or do."

Dear me! here was another and quite unexpected cause of fear. Not fear of any harm to myself, but a great dread lest I should not acquit myself properly under these trying circumstances. A first dinner-party in itself was bad enough, but going all alone, and to a house where one must be continually on the watch not to offend by word or look the peculiarities of a sun-stricken host, or the feelings of a sensitive mother, was overwhelming. However, there was no help for it, my aunt's anger being still more to be dreaded than even this ordeal.

By a quarter to seven, precisely, I came into my aunt's apartment for approval and last directions.

"Yes, Mabel, you look very well indeed. Your features are good, your hair glossy, your eyes a good color, and your dress in excellent taste; it wants but the indescribable air and bearing acquired by mingling in good society to make you a very passable young lady. But pray hold up your head when you enter the room, and speak out bravely when you are spoken to. And, above all things, remember what I told you of the son, and don't lose the paper with the number of the house."

Nervously I fumbled in my pocket to ascertain with renewed certainty that the note which I had just put there had not taken to itself wings and flown away. I had repeated the number of the house to myself at least twenty times, but at the last moment had snatched Mrs. Dalton's letter, as I thought, from my dressing-table, lest by any unforeseen accident my memory might prove treacherous.

The cab was at the door, and I in it the next moment, whirling away past brilliant shop windows and grand mansions ablaze with light, till I felt bewildered with the dazzling splendor of Britson by gas-light, and by the novelty of my present position.

My thoughts went back to my country home and our few Christmas parties there, when Willie and Fred and Kitty and I would be bundled up in warm wraps, and drive off in father's old-fashioned four-wheel through dark lanes to the house of a neighboring clergyman, or to the next town, where some of our young friends lived. I recollected how mischievous Willie had tormented us on more than one occasion by pulling up suddenly our jog-trot steed, and suggesting that it was the wrong day, or that we had come to the wrong house. Surely my evil genius led my thoughts into this train, for suddenly a panic took me. I tried in vain to remember whether 18 or 8 was the number of Mrs. Dalton's—my Mrs. Dalton's—abode. With trembling fingers I drew the note from my pocket. At this juncture the driver pulled up.

"Cumberland Street, miss; what number, please?"

How I applauded myself for my forethought in bringing the letter! Otherwise I had been utterly lost. The note was in my hand, the gaslight was as bright as day, but the letters seemed to swim before my eyes, as—horror of horrors!—I recognized Kitty's school-girl scrawl in the place of Mrs. Dalton's elegant handwriting. I had carelessly left her note, too, on my table that morning, and in my hurry had seized the wrong one.

"What number did you say, miss?" The cabman was at the door, impatient to be quit of his charge.

"I—I don't know," I stammered.

"Be you only out for a drive, then?" suggested the man, with a grin, which made me shiver, and determine not to be laughed at by him at any rate.

"I wish to be set down at Mrs. Dalton's," I said, "but am not sure of the number; it is 18 or 8, I think."

The man rubbed his forehead as he said, "Mrs. Dalton? I guess I know her house; 'tain't 18 nor 8, but 28."

"But there are two Mrs. Daltons," I urged; "and I am almost sure it is one of those numbers."

"Well, we've passed 8, and I know it ain't that house, 'cause Dr. Bethamy hangs out there; but we'll try 18 if you like, my lady, and if that ain't right, you just trust to me."

I had begun to think the man very impertinent before, but seeing my real distress, I suppose, his tone had been kind as he ended his remark, and I was fain to look upon him as a friend, and take his advice. A grand powdered footman answered the door at No. 18. Mrs. Dalton did not live there; the only lady of that name he knew of resided at No. 28, and had a dinner-party to-night, he knew, as his master was going. This information, elicited by my loquacious driver from the stiff footman, seemed decisive. I told the man to drive on and deposit me at No. 28.

Yes, Mrs. Dalton resided there. The two grand footmen looked askance at my homely driver and conveyance, but, on my alighting in evening attire, duly admitted me into a brilliantly lighted hall. Thence an elderly lady, as she seemed to me, conducted me up the broad staircase to a spacious boudoir, where a bright fire burned. I should certainly have taken this lady, in her rustling black silk and distinguished coiffure, for my hostess had she not addressed me thus as she ushered me into the comfortable apartment:

"My mistress will be so pleased to hear you are come, Miss Mabel; she was afraid you would not arrive in time. But, perhaps, as you are rather early, you will excuse her not being quite ready to receive you, and will make yourself comfortable here while I take her the good news."

I signified my glad assent. I would willingly have remained where I was all night.

I ensconced myself in a delicious arm-chair, rested my feet on the polished fender, and began to ponder my situation. There were two things that struck me as rather odd. First, that I should be greeted by my proper name in a house totally strange to me; second, that my hostess should have had such fears of my not being in time. Very probably my aunt had spoken of me as "Mabel" in her note, which would explain the first mystery; but surely she would not have been so unkind as to betray to a stranger my failing of unpunctuality, against which she herself was very irate.

I had plenty of time for my surmises, till at length, getting tired of them, I turned to a bookcase by my side, and, taking down the nearest volume, was quickly buried in "Jane Eyre." We never read novels at home—not that we were forbidden, but that we were utterly out of the way of them—therefore it is no wonder that, with such an introduction to the land of romance, I was completely spell-bound, and had forgotten entirely where I was or what was before me, till suddenly aroused by the silver tones of the clock on the mantel-piece striking eight, and at the same moment by the turning of the handle of the door and the entrance of the grandest lady I had ever seen.

On she came toward me, in her trailing black velvet robe, glittering with diamonds, and I shrank back farther into my arm-chair, feeling all power to speak or move taken from me by this splendid apparition. A very handsome woman she was—I saw that at a glance—and a very haughty one besides. Never have I seen any thing to equal the fire of her dark eyes, the poise of her queenly head, and the proud curve of her short upper lip. No wonder I trembled before her.

"So you are Mabel?" she said, with a look of surprise, I thought, on her handsome face. "You are not at all the young lady I expected to see from your aunt's description; but no doubt this deception was one of her little pleasantries," she concluded, with a scornful smile.

I had risen by this time, and extended my hand to return her greeting, feeling renewed discomfort from these unpleasant revelations. To think of my aunt going out of her way to make a joke of her shy niece by giving her friend so untrue an impression of her! Surely she might have spared me this mortification.

But I had no time for vexing thoughts, as my hostess, saying, "We must become better acquainted after dinner, as it is time we were in the drawing-room to receive our guests," swept out of the apartment, I following her along a wide corridor into a grand saloon aglow with many lights, which, by numerous mirrors, were reflected beyond my powers of counting. Never before had I seen such splendor. My eyes were quite dazzled, and it was not until we had reached the farther end of the gorgeously furnished room that I perceived we were not the sole occupants of it.

Lounging on a couch by the blazing fire, in an attitude of supreme négligé, reclined a very handsome man in evening costume. Here then, doubtless, was my particular bête noire, the sun-stricken son. I felt a great pity for him—which took away some of my fear—as I thought of one so beautiful being so afflicted.

But my ordeal began at once. After eying me curiously for a moment he sprang from his seat, and, holding out his hand to me, made exactly the same remark as his mother had done, though in a much more hearty tone:

"So you are Mabel?"

Was there any thing so very odd in my being myself that it should cause both such surprise? I began to think that not the son only, but the whole household, must be mad, from the respectable housekeeper upward.

"Yes, I am," I said, not knowing what other reply to make.

"And how did you leave the old lady?" pursued my strange questioner, with a merry look in his eyes. "Not a little grumpy, I expect, at having to let you come?"

I felt very nervous at being left alone with this peculiar individual, Mrs. Dalton having moved off to another part of the room to welcome the fast-coming guests. What cause was there for merriment? I could see none; so answered as grave as a judge,

"She has a bad cold, thank you; and she very much wished me to come."

"Did she, though? What an unaccountable old hypocrite! Keeping you under lock and key all this while, and then, when we wouldn't stand it any longer, pretending that you came by her wish!"

I began to feel dreadfully alarmed. A perfect stranger talking to me like this, and speaking of my much-respected aunt as an "old hypocrite!" Certainly he must be much madder than she had supposed. His next remark was still worse.

"You must call me Harry, mind. I am glad enough to be 'Sir Harry Dalton' to the rest of the world, but I am plain Harry to you. I have set you the example, you see, by calling you Mabel at starting."

"Not plain Harry to any one, I'm sure," said a gayly dressed lady, who came up at that moment.

"Ah, Lady Dacre! I have been languishing for your appearance this half hour. But where is your lord and master?"

"Sir Walter has been down in the country, and out with the hounds again, and has returned to town hors de combat."

"What! another fall?"

"Yes; and a bad one this time."

"Poor fellow, he is unlucky!" said Sir Harry, with more appearance of concern than Sir Walter's wife had shown. "Where was it this time?"

"Oh, he was staying at the Hathertons', near Selby," she replied, carelessly, arousing my interest at once by the mention of my own village home, and of our grand squire.

"Selby?" said Sir Harry. (I call him "Sir Harry," as every one else did, with a desire, as I supposed, to humor him in his fancy.) "I ought to know that name. Ah, I have it! my old tutor at Oxford has the living. He was a fellow of Baliol, and the best man that ever lived. But I fancy, poor fellow, he sacrificed himself on the matrimonial altar, and is now weighed to the earth by a quiverful of children. It passes my understanding why people can't let well alone in this wearisome world."

"You are an incorrigible flirt, Sir Harry; I have no hope of you," said the lady, laughing. "But madam will not leave you in peace much longer, I suspect, now that you've come into the title. I thought I heard that the young heiress was to be had here on trial. It would be well if the money and the title were united again."

"Hush!" said Sir Harry, in a vexed tone. And I thought he glanced anxiously at me as he said it. But what was all their gossip to me? I was but one of that quiverful weighing down my poor father's head, and absurdly out of place among all these grand people.

I supposed, however, that he thought Lady Dacre's frivolity shocked me, which it certainly did; for he left her, and coming to my side, said,

"You must not heed any thing Lady Dacre says, Mabel; she is a regular chatterbox."

"I think she seems very heartless," I replied; "but that is no business of mine."

At this moment our hostess came up to us, and said to her son,

"Harry, you must take in Lady Falkner, remember."

"Excuse me, mother; I mean to take Mabel, instead; it is her right, as the greatest stranger."

"How can you be so absurd?" said his mother, contemptuously. "Mabel is but a child, and will not wish, I am sure, to push herself forward so conspicuously. Besides, as her coming was doubtful, I had made my arrangements without her. You will not object, Mabel, to go down the last with me, will you?"

"Oh no; I had much rather," I answered, eagerly, only longing to be as far as possible from the strange Sir Harry.

"You are exceedingly complimentary, my fair coz," said he; "but I am accustomed to have my own way. So, mother, we will make a compromise; I will take down Mabel and Lady Falkner too."

"I wish I might stay up here while you have dinner; I am not at all hungry," said I, making one more effort to save myself.

"Certainly, if you prefer it," said Mrs. Dalton. "I dare say you are fatigued after your journey."

"Nonsense, mother!" interposed her son; "fatigued with the distance the length of an ell! Ah, here in good time is dinner announced. Lady Falkner, may I have the honor? Come, Mabel."

And before I had time to make farther objection my hand was drawn within his arm, and I was descending the broad staircase, trembling with fear, by the side of this six-foot Apollo, while on his other arm leaned the grand old dowager, sweeping the stairs with her trailing moiré antique.

I had already been so astonished at the splendor of all I had seen that it seemed as if nothing farther could astonish me. But when I entered the dining-saloon, and my eyes rested on the long table, glittering with silver, gorgeous with fruit and flowers of the rarest; when I saw the galaxy of footmen; and when, during the repast, dish after dish was brought me in startling rapidity, all my former bewilderment seemed as nothing, and I could only conclude that Aladdin's genius had been at work, and that this was the veritable feast prepared for the Princess Badroulboudour, of which I had read in my one book of fairy stories at home. Happily for me, my host was pretty well occupied with the dowager, who proved to be a very talkative old lady; so I was left for a time in peace, and had drifted completely away into fairy-land, till suddenly recalled by the melodious tones of the mad Sir Harry.

"A penny for your thoughts, my fair cousin. Apparently you prefer them to your dinner; you absolutely eat nothing."

Determined to try and break through the spell of unreality that surrounded me, I looked up into his face, and said, with a feeling of compunction for contradicting his brain-sick fancies, "I am very sorry, but I am no relation of yours."

"What! you won't own me, then? That is hard, when I am so anxious we should be friends. I suspect somebody has been poisoning your mind against me: the mischievous old aunt, perchance."

Here was a puzzling position. I could not tell a lie; but it might be dangerous to anger him. How clever he was, too, to divine the truth at once! However, I had often heard that crazy people were particularly cunning. He was waiting for my reply, and I felt the tell-tale blush spread over my face. It was no good delaying; I must say something; so, feeling confused, I hung my head, and said, as gently as I could,

"I am very sorry for you—indeed I am. It is your misfortune, not your fault."

"So you believe all the tales that old crone tells you?" he asked, angrily.

I looked up at him for a moment, and noting the angry flash of his dark eyes and the flush on his brow, began to fear that I had unintentionally aroused the violent part of his nature, and that if I were not careful there would be a scene. What could I say to soothe him?

"You must not look like that; you frighten me," I said at last. "I did not mean to offend you."

"Offend me? Pshaw!" he answered, in the same irate tone; "that is not the footing on which we should stand. But you are rather a severe monitor, Miss Mabel, for one so young; and, to tell the truth, I have not been accustomed to either reproof or pity heretofore."

"Haven't you? How sad!" I said. "People like you are more to be pitied than any one else, I think."

"Really," he exclaimed, raising his handsome eyebrows, "that is a new view of my case. I am generally considered rather an object of envy than pity, considering the many unlucky mortals there are in this wearisome world. I suspect my former tutor, Hugh Spencer, for instance, would gladly change places with me."

"Oh no, I'm sure he wouldn't!" I exclaimed, eagerly, thinking of my dear clear-headed father in his cozy though humble vicarage.

"So you think the picture I drew of him just now an enviable one? Matrimony on £300 a year and a house full of children!"

"Yes," said I, transported in thought to my cheerful home; "the happiest in the world."

There was an amused smile on his face as he said,

"I am glad to hear my cousin's views of life so clearly expressed."

What there was to be amused at I could not tell, and was heartily glad that the dowager put in a remark at this juncture, and engrossed the attention of my most inexplicable host for the remainder of the ladies' sojourn at the table.

How relieved I felt when the door closed behind us, and I was once more free from the mingled fear and fascination I felt under the gaze of those handsome dark eyes of Sir Harry's.

I had, however, another ordeal to go through of a different kind. It was my first experience of ladies' after-dinner talk. And when I heard how they pulled their friends to pieces, and when I observed more than one eye-glass fixed for a leisurely stare at poor me, and heard Lady Dacre say in an audible whisper to my hostess, "She is a very ordinary-looking school-miss; not at all what I expected from Sir Harry's description," and Mrs. Dalton's reply, "Yes, indeed; one could not hope for much from the training of such a one as her old aunt, but I certainly did expect something a little more comme il faut"—when, as I was saying, I heard and saw all this, my heart sank within me, and I almost longed for the support of the eccentric Sir Harry.

To think of there being such cruelty and treachery in the world! Here was my aunt's particular friend speaking of her with utter contempt and scorn; and here was the lady who had expressed herself so kindly and warmly in inviting me to her house, treating me not only with supreme indifference, but with uncalled-for rudeness! If these were the manners of high life, I preferred the low life to which I was accustomed. Vexation and indignation were almost getting the better of me, and I longed to go away somewhere by myself, where I could indulge in a good cry.

Chancing to raise my eyes at this juncture, I observed by the handsome clock on the mantelpiece that it was only five minutes to eleven. Hastily I rose, and approaching Mrs. Dalton with all my remaining courage, said,

"If you please, ma'am, may I go now? I ordered my cab at half past ten. And my aunt likes early hours."

"Your aunt!" exclaimed my hostess, in unmistakable amazement. "What! could she not trust you to us without following you up like this? It is a poor compliment, I must confess."

Not knowing what reply to make to this peculiar remark, which made me wonder whether poor Sir Harry's eccentricity might not have been in part inherited, I only urged my former request for leave to depart.

Mrs. Dalton, turning from me with an expression of contempt on her handsome face, said,

"Early hours are doubtless best suited for school-girls—Johnstone" (turning to a footman), "inquire if a cab is in waiting."

The reply was quickly brought. A cab had come half an hour ago, but had been sent away, as it was a mistake, the name of the lady being quite a strange one. The driver had been very obstinate, and would not take no for an answer for a long time, but had at last been got rid of.

This was almost too much for me. The rebellious tears would well into my eyes; and the gentlemen entering at this moment, Mrs. Dalton turned from me with a gesture of impatience, saying to her son,

"I leave Mabel to you, Sir Harry. Perhaps you understand homesick children better than I do."

So saying, she swept away to another part of the room.

Sir Harry, seeing my tears fall fast, with gentle kindness put my hand within his arm, and led me from the room, and across the corridor to the pretty boudoir where I had spent my one peaceful hour that evening. Arrived there, he placed me in the arm-chair aforesaid, and standing with his back to the fire, looking down upon poor woe-begone me, asked,

"What is it that troubles you, Mabel? I fear madam has been disagreeable; but you mustn't mind her. She is very proud, you know, and expected to find you one of her own sort, I fancy, from your aunt's description; so I suppose she is disappointed, and riled besides at the old lady's take-in."

"I can't think how my aunt could be so unkind," I said, "as to make such a joke of me, when she knew how I hated coming, too."

"Then it was against your will you came?" he asked, in a surprised tone.

"Oh yes," I said; "I would never have come if my aunt had not wished it so much. I knew it would be dreadful; but it has been much worse than I expected."

All this time I was trying to wipe away and keep back my tears, and had nearly succeeded; the familiar arm-chair, the sight of the volume of "Jane Eyre" by my side, the gentle tones of Sir Harry, all helping to calm me. Suddenly it struck me that my last remark was a very ungrateful one. So, looking up at my host, and trying to smile through my tears, I said,

"I'm afraid I must appear very rude and thankless; for, indeed, you have been very good to me, and yet it was you I dreaded the most. But really I must be going now. Will you send for a cab for me? They have sent away the one I ordered."

"Going!" he exclaimed, in a tone of still greater surprise than his mother's, when I had made to her the like suggestion: "where are you going, child? Surely we have not so utterly disgusted you that you must actually run away from us!"

"I am going home to my aunt," I said.

"Your aunt! Is she in Britson, then?"

"Yes, of course; how else should I be here?" I said, feeling more sorry than ever for poor Sir Harry. He had been so kind and sensible in his care for me in my trouble that but a minute ago I had been tempted to believe he must be quite right, after all. And now, alas! had come a fresh proof to the contrary.

Eager to get away before his mind should become still farther obscured, I rose, and putting on my cloak, which I had left here, said, "I know you will add to your other kindnesses by doing as I ask."

He seemed quite disturbed and agitated as he said, "This is, indeed, a painful surprise. I had hoped we should have become better acquainted on the morrow. For believe me, Mabel, what seems to have been a disappointment to my mother has been quite the reverse to me. I had rather dreaded your coming, expecting one of the dashing, flashing, young-lady tribe with whom I have been quite bored. You can not think what a refreshment it is to come upon a simple, truth-speaking girl like yourself. May I hope that in time you will grow to dislike us less?"

"I don't dislike you now," I said. "And I sha'n't bear any ill feeling to Mrs. Dalton when once I have quitted her house. Only I trust I may never have to enter it again."

"Mabel, what are you saying?" exclaimed poor Sir Harry, in a state of great excitement. "After all these years of separation, when, at last, my duty and inclination point to the same end, when a nobler and happier life is opening out before me, is my mother's pride, your aunt's prejudice, to mar all this? I declare you will drive me mad if you go on in this way."

His cheeks were flushed, his eyes flashing. I had never seen any one look so handsome before. But dreading that if I staid any longer what he feared might really come to pass, I rushed from the room, down the broad stairs, and into the hall. Here my good genius attended me for once. The door was open, and a fashionably dressed young lady, with bold black eyes and imperious mien, was alighting from a fly which stood at the door. Quick as lightning, I darted by her and into the cab, bidding the driver deposit me as soon as possible at "No. 6 Marlborough Buildings."

"No. 6 Marlborough Buildings," I heard the footman repeat to the driver as he closed the cab door; and oh—joy of joys!—I was safe once more, whirling along the deserted streets, and at liberty to indulge myself at last in a hearty cry.

"You are late, Mabel," was my aunt's first greeting. She had been sitting up for me, and had become somewhat impatient.

"Yes, aunt," was all I said. I had no heart for explanations left; my only desire was to get away by myself.

"Well, good-night, child. I suppose it turned out better than you expected, as you were so loath to come away?"

"Oh no; a great deal worse," was all I said. I felt too indignant with my aunt to stand parleying with her. So, with a cold "good-night," I retired.

How I dreamed that night, to be sure! a succession of confused pictures, of gorgeous feasts, and hair-breadth escapes. At one time I was a miserable, half-starved school-girl, like poor Jane Eyre, pursued by a virago in black velvet personified by Mrs. Dalton, from whose clutches I was delivered by a knight remarkably like Sir Harry, till he, too, turned out to be a monster in disguise, from whom I fled wildly, and awoke all in a tremble.

I came down late to breakfast next morning, and found my aunt warming her feet by the fire, and perusing the Britson Morning Herald.

"There was a really grand dinner-party given in Cumberland Street last night, Mabel," said she. "Your entertainment would have been but a Cinderella's feast in comparison."

"I am sure there could not have been a grander party than the one I was at," said I.

My aunt smiled as she replied, in a patronizing tone,

"It is natural you should think so, Mabel, considering the society you are accustomed to. But just listen to this list of names. My friend Mrs. Dalton does things fairly well, but she could hardly muster names like these among her friends. They are the tip-top élite of Britson."

And my aunt began to read:

"Among the guests were the Dowager Lady Falkner, Lady Dacre, etc."

I heard no more. My knife and fork fell from my hands. The room seemed to be going round with me. My aunt's sharp tones, as she turned and eyed me askance over her spectacles, brought me to my senses. Why, Mabel, what ails you, child? You look as white as a ghost."

"Oh, aunt, wasn't it the right house?"

"Are you dreaming, child? I was not speaking of any house, but merely reading an account of the grand dinner-party given by the Honorable Mrs. Dalton to celebrate her son's coming to the title. He is Sir Harry Dalton now, of Dalton Priors, a fine estate not half an hour from Britson; and his distant cousin, Miss Mabel Dalton, only child of the late baronet and inheritor of all his funded property, who has been jealously guarded by an old aunt from any contact with this branch of the family heretofore, came to Britson for the occasion, and the on dit is that we shall soon have another marriage in high life. There! I declare the Herald is quite entertaining this morning. But, Mabel, what is the matter? I must send for Dr. Venn. I believe my friend's Champagne has affected your head."

For I had staggered toward her, and seizing the paper from her hands, had glanced eagerly at the account of the hateful party, to see if the number of the Honorable Mrs. Dalton's residence could possibly be any other than 28. But no, there was no hope for me. Conspicuously stood out the figures, "No 28 Cumberland Street."

"Oh, aunt," I said, "that was my party! I thought the son was mad, as you told me, when he called me cousin; but I was the idiot, you see, and he was sane. Oh dear! what can I do?" And I wrung my hands in despair.

My aunt did not attempt to comfort me. She worked herself into a towering passion. "If there is one thing I abhor above every thing else, it is to be made a laughing-stock!" she cried. "How could I guess that you were such an utter goose, such a born idiot!" and so forth. My aunt was wont to use forcible language when aroused.

But it was all one to me. She could not make me feel the horror of what I had done more than I did of my own accord. There were so many aggravations of my misery; all I had said to Sir Harry of pitying him, and of the stories I had heard of him; the impossibility there seemed to be of clearing myself from the charge of imposture, now that, on looking back, I saw there had been so many things which should have undeceived me. My only real excuse—that I thought my host mad—would seem but a poor one. I gave a detailed account of the evening to my aunt, which only increased her vexation.

"Can't any thing be done, aunt?" I asked, in despair, as I finished my miserable narration.

"I, at least, shall not move in the affair," said my aunt, "and submit myself to the taunts of the haughty Mrs. Dalton. You may go and eat humble pie if you will."

I had never known my aunt so unfeeling before. The fact was, this affair touched her to the quick, affecting as it did her weak point—her love of popularity and her deference to the opinions of society. What miserable days those were that followed! I can smile at the remembrance now, but it was no smiling matter at the time. I dared not go out lest I might meet any one who had been present on that fatal evening. And yet I dared not sit with my aunt, for every ring made me quake; and, besides, I could not face even any of her friends. So I shut myself up in my room, trying to engross my thoughts with the embroidering of a little frock I was doing for the baby, and longing intensely for the time when I might return to my own dear country home. As days passed away without our hearing any thing farther of the affair I began to grow a little calmer, and was sitting sewing at my bedroom window with some degree of comfort one afternoon about a week after my unlucky début, when it was all dispelled by a resounding knock, which somehow made my heart jump with a presentiment of evil, and which was quickly followed by a message sent me from my aunt, saying Sir Harry Dalton had called and asked for me, and that she desired I would come into the drawing-room.

"Tell her I can't, Jane," I answered.

The servant departed, but returned with a still more urgent message.

"Mrs. Neville particularly wishes you to come in, miss."

"Say I am sorry to disoblige her, but I don't feel equal to it," I answered.

Jane looked astonished at my unwonted resistance to my aunt's authority; but, seeing I was determined, went her way. A long time I listened, in breathless suspense, till at last I heard the hall door shut, and breathed freely once more. My aunt was very angry, as I expected, but I was resolved that no power on earth should induce me to face Sir Harry again. She was full of his praises; he was so handsome, so courteous, so full of sorrow for my distress, and so anxious to assure me that he fully understood the mistake.

"In fact, Mabel, I consider you are most fortunate in having fallen into such good hands. Of course I had to explain matters, and he indulged in a hearty laugh when he heard that you looked upon him as rather wrong in his head, but said that fully explained every thing; and he is now only anxious to assure you how completely he is satisfied with my explanations. It seems, too, that your father is an old college friend of his, and on that account also he is desirous to renew your acquaintance. He will call again to-morrow, and then I really hope you will no longer act like a shy, missish school-girl."

So spoke my aunt. But it was no good; even her stinging taunt failed to move me. I could not face Sir Harry. The more kind and considerate he was, the more hateful my conduct appeared to me. How I wished I had not given my address till safe out of the precincts of Cumberland Street! That officious footman must have remembered and reported my whereabouts to his master.

Sir Harry came again next day, and repeated his visits several times during the ensuing fortnight, and I remained a closer prisoner than ever to my room; till at last the unwonted confinement, and the continual worry from my aunt's scoldings and my own torturing reflections, began to tell upon my health. I had nervous headaches, lost my appetite, and began to look very woe-begone. Then my aunt grew frightened, and sent for Dr. Venn, and he, to my intense delight, ordered me home for rest and change of air.

Oh, how gladly I welcomed the dear old muddy roads and bare hedge-rows as Willie drove me along them from the station in our old-fashioned car! How safe I felt in my father's arms! how cheerful and content sitting with my mother over the fire, with baby on my lap, and four or five other small urchins sitting down on the hearth-rug around us, while Kitty made the tea as gravely as though she were forty instead of fourteen, and the boys fought over the honor of carrying my baggage up stairs! There was no lack of appetite that night; we made the brown loaf and pats of butter disappear with startling rapidity. There were no worrying dreams as I laid my head on my pillow, and fell asleep between the lavender-scented sheets.

Why is it we can not keep content with such simple pleasures? On that first night they seemed all-sufficing; but as days and weeks flew by, and I settled into the routine of the old life—teaching the little ones, mending their clothes, living, in short, the life of the eldest of a quiverful—my thoughts began to turn back to the past. I often caught myself wondering whether the "marriage in high life" had yet taken place, and feeling it rather sad—as I reflected on Sir Harry's kind consideration for me, and especially on the words he had spoken to me in the boudoir—that I had not been born a rich heiress, like my namesake. I tried to recall the glimpse I had of the face of the lady in whose fly I had escaped; doubtless she was the intended bride.

It was a bright morning in February; the crocuses were peeping above the ground, the snowdrops were hanging their modest heads. Winter seemed gone for a while, as it often does in the valentine month, to return again with fiercer blast than ever in blustering March.

My father had been very much absorbed all breakfast-time in a long epistle, which seemed of grave and interesting import, and ever and anon as he read I thought he glanced at me. At last he folded it and put it in his pocket, saying,

"Mamma, I am expecting an old friend of mine here to-day on business, and I shall ask him to dine with us; see there is a tidy dinner. And you, Mabel, dress yourself and the little ones in your Sunday best. I want my old friend to see us at our bravest."

The coming of a visitor was a great event, so very retired was the life we led; so we all were kept busy to obey our father's behest. I sent the little ones to forage for moss, and arranged a pretty centre vase with snow-drops and crocuses. My mother brought out her best china and plate; and with our rosy-cheeked apples and tall pears we made a nice little dessert, to the great delight of the small fry. They were all ready decked in Sunday suits, and the whole thirteen were assembled awaiting the honored guest. Punctually as the clock struck one we heard the swing of the garden gate, and the hearty tones of father's voice, as he said,

"So you like my church and surroundings! Now I am going to introduce you to the quiverful which so excites your pity for your old friend."

The next moment my father entered the room, and who should follow but Sir Harry Dalton, looking more handsome than ever in his négligé shooting dress, and with a beaming smile on his fine face.

"This is my wife, Dalton, and here are my olive-branches," said my father: "a comely set, I think, and not so badly behaved as they might be, but tyrants at bread-and-butter—eh, Freddy?"

Freddy, be it remarked, was the joke of the family; being nearly as broad as he was high, we generally called him "the fat boy."

Sir Harry courteously addressed my mother; and then, turning to me, and pitying, I suppose, my blushing confusion, said,

"It is a shame, Miss Mabel, to steal a march upon you in your own house, is it not? May I hope for forgiveness?"

He held out his hand as he spoke, and I placed my trembling fingers within it, and somehow in the warm grasp he gave them my fears disappeared, and I felt our misunderstanding was at an end.

What a day that was for us all! From baby Bertie up to mischievous Willie, to say nothing of shamefaced Mabel, we were all enraptured with our guest—so full of fun and frolic with the boys, of earnest talk with father, of polite attention to mamma and us girls. Surely there never was so knightly a knight before! He was staying at the Hathertons', he told us; and I could not refrain from glancing at his face as he said so, recalling the former occasion on which I had heard him mention that name; but the bitterness had gone out of the remembrance, and I could now return the merry smile I detected there.

But I must not prose on any longer; I have spun my yarn too long as it is. Suffice it to say that there came a time for serious talk, when Sir Harry told me that the influence I had begun to exercise over him on that lucky evening, when I told him I pitied instead of admired him, had been working ever since; that he hoped he had begun to live a less idle, useless life; and that if I would come and help him he hoped he might one day claim, instead of my pity, my esteem. I need scarcely say what answer I gave, but will sign myself instead,

MABEL DALTON.

Hoops, Hoop-Sticks, Balls, Bats, Skipping-Ropes, etc., Figs. 1–13.

Figs. 1–4.—HOOP OF SPANISH CANE COVERED WITH CORD. This hoop is thirty-nine inches in circumference. It is made of Spanish cane, as seen in Fig. 2, which shows a full-sized section of the hoop, and covered in knot-work with gray twine and red woolen cord. Before beginning the knot-work bore a small hole through the cane with a fine gimlet; through this hole pass a piece of twine from sixty to eighty inches long, and a piece of red woolen cord of the same length, in such a manner that the ends of each cord project from the hole to an even length; and work seven double knots with picots. Continue in this manner until the hoop is covered closely. As soon as the cords are used up in the course of the work sew new pieces of cord and twine to each end. Finally, fasten the ends of the cord carefully, and cut them off. Instead of ornamenting the hoop in the manner just described, it may be covered with red woolen cord only, as shown by Fig. 3. To do this, bore holes through the cane at intervals of an inch and a half each; pass the red cord through one of these holes, so that the ends are even in length; work four double knots; arrange each piece of cord in a flat knot, as shown by the illustration; pass both pieces of cord through the next hole of the hoop crosswise; again work four double knots, and continue in this manner until the hoop is closely covered. Finally, fasten the ends of the cord and cut them off. Fig. 4 shows a crochet trimming for the hoop, which is laced on the latter by means of gray cord or twine, as shown by the illustration. For this trimming work with red zephyr worsted a foundation corresponding to the circumference of the hoop; on this foundation work a round of open-work double crochet, as shown by Fig. 4; and on both sides of this round work one round of chain stitch scallops. Lace this trimming on the hoop with gray cord or twine in the following manner: First draw the cord through a hole in the cane; then pass the two ends of cord up from the under side, through the trimming strip, before the next double crochet (see illustration); cross the ends of the cord over the double crochet there, passing the end marked a to the under side at the place marked ×, and the end marked b in a similar manner at the place marked ●. Then cross both pieces of cord at the under side of the cane, and continue in this manner until the cane hoop is covered by the trimming. The trimming is sewed together at the ends.

Figs. 5 and 6 show two hoop-sticks. Each of these sticks consists of a piece of Spanish cane thirty inches long and an inch and a quarter in circumference. To make the stick shown by Fig. 6 bore a hole through the cane at a distance of an inch and three-quarters from one end, then make a similar hole at a distance of five inches from the first hole, and pass the two ends of a piece of finer cane nine inches and a quarter long through both holes, so that the ends project about three-quarters of an inch from the holes. Cover the handle thus formed as shown by Fig. 2, and fasten the handle on the stick at the same time by means of the cords. Furnish the stick with a knotted bow of red woolen cord and red woolen tassels. For the handle of the stick shown by Fig. 5 wind wadding around one end of the cane to a length of six inches so that the part thus covered is three inches and three-quarters in circumference at the middle, while toward the ends it is slightly pointed. Furnish this end with a cover, which is loosely worked in ribbed crochet with gray twisted thread; then fasten the upper and under end of the crochet cover with twine, and stretch a piece of red woolen cord between every two ribs of the crochet part; the ends of this cord are also tied on the stick. Slide a red woolen ball on the upper and under ends of the handle; fasten them, and ornament the handle with red woolen cord and two red woolen tassels (see illustration).

Figs. 7 and 8.—BALLS OF CARRIAGE LEATHER AND KNOT-WORK. For each of these balls cut eight pieces of red carriage leather from Fig. 38, Supplement, and sew the sides of these pieces together on the under side. Before sewing the last joining seam turn over the ball thus far completed; stuff it closely with curled hair or moss, and overhand the two unconnected edges together on the right side. Sew a round piece of carriage leather an inch in diameter at the centre of the top and bottom of the ball shown by Fig. 7, in order to cover the numerous seams at the ends of the joined pieces of leather. Cover the seam made by sewing on each of these round pieces with a brass ring of the requisite size, which is covered with sixteen double knots of gray cord or twine. These double knots are worked with the assistance of a bodkin in the manner of the double knots shown by Fig. 9. Join both rings, and cover the ball with gray cord or twine at the same time; to do this pass the cord, with the assistance of a bodkin, underneath the horizontal vein of a double knot of one ring, fasten the end of the cord there, then pass the cord up from the under side through the corresponding double knot of the other ring, * and down through the next double knot of the same ring. Now pass the cord through the next double knot of the ring first referred to, and back again, passing it up from the under side through the same double knot of the second ring through which it has previously been passed. Repeat from * until the ball is covered all around, as shown by the illustration. It is to be observed also that one cord bar should alternately come on the joining seam between two pieces of leather, and the other cord bar on the middle of a piece of leather. Wind cord horizontally around the middle of the ball about twenty times, and braid red woolen cord through these horizontal windings, and at the same time through the vertical cord bars that intersect the windings, as shown by the illustration. For the cover of the ball shown by Fig. 8 cover a brass ring an inch and three-quarters in circumference with sixteen double knots of gray cord or twine, so that the ring is covered closely, and the cord is left loose for a loop between every two double knots. The double knots are worked with a bodkin as shown by Fig. 9, which shows a full-sized section of the worked cover. Lay the ring thus completed on the centre of the top of the ball, then work ten rounds as shown by Fig. 9, always going forward. The 10th round completes one-half of the cover. Work the second half on another brass ring in a similar manner, then draw both halves over the ball, and sew the joining threads of each half that meet together with a piece of gray cord; cover this cord with button-hole stitches of the same cord.

Fig. 10.—BAT OF SPANISH CANE AND KNOT-WORK. To make this bat take a piece of Spanish cane thirty-five inches and a quarter long, and a piece of coarse red woolen cord of the same length. Bore holes through the cane, first through the middle and then toward both sides at intervals of an inch and three-quarters each, so that there are five holes at regular intervals at each side of the hole through the middle of the cane. Bore holes also through the cane at a distance of half an inch, three inches and a quarter, and six inches from each end; then bend the cane in the shape given by the illustration, and tie the ends of the cane that lie next each other together with a coarse piece of thread, which is passed through each of the three holes, after which the ends are tied together. Lay the red woolen cord on the cane thus formed in such a manner that it is closely connected with the outer edge of the cane. The cord is fastened on the handle with cord, as shown by Fig. 10, and is sewed on with red silk, which is passed through the holes in the handle. The cord is fastened on the cane at the top by passing a piece of cord forty inches long around the red cord like a loop, so that the ends of the gray cord project to an equal distance; pass these ends down to the under side through the hole at the middle of the cane, and draw them tight. Fasten the red cord in a similar manner at the following five holes to the right and left side of the hole at the middle of the cane. The projecting ends of the cord serve to make the knot-work. Begin the latter with the two ends of cord of the middle hole; lay on a new piece of cord forty inches long, fastening it like a loop around the corresponding gray cord between the cane and the woolen cord. Lay the four ends of cord flat next each other, and with the two outer jecting ends of every two bars together with the ends of the middle bar, and on these ends work five double knots in connection with the five double knots of the middle bar previously worked. When all the bars are thus knotted to the middle bar work twenty double knots with picots on the still free cord ends of the middle bar; tie the under end of the middle bar on the handle, and cut off the projecting ends of cord. Finally, stretch red woolen cord crosswise on the middle bar, and wind such woolen cord several times around the under end of the bar; the ends of this cord are ornamented with tassels of red worsted braid and worsted balls. A larger red worsted ball is passed on the under end of the handle, where also loops of red woolen cord are set on (see illustration).

Fig. 11.—SPANISH CANE AND NETTED BAT. To make this bat take two bars of Spanish cane each eight inches long, and two bars each thirteen inches long; cut out a piece half an inch wide and one quarter of an inch deep in the shorter bars at a distance of an inch from each end; lay the two bars on each other where the pieces are cut out, and tie them together. Cut out a piece at one end of each of the longer bars in a similar manner; then always tie one of these bars together with the free end of one of the shorter bars, so that the bars come on each other where the pieces are cut out. Pierce the free pass the piece of cord at the left over the rope crosswise, so that a loop is formed at the left side of the rope; lay the right cord in a vertical direction over the left cord, which projects at the right side and underneath the rope through the loop at the left side. Draw both cords tight, and repeat from * until the rope, with the exception of a piece of eight inches from the other end, is covered with the cord. Fasten the free ends of the red cord, and cover the stitches made by fastening the cord at both ends of the rope with a large red worsted ball. For the handles of the rope cut two pieces of pasteboard, each four inches and a half wide and six inches long. Roll up each of these strips in the shape of a tube, four inches and a half long, the inside of which is about four-fifths of an inch in diameter; paste down the outer edge of pasteboard, and cover the tube with wadding (the layer of wadding must be thickest at the middle of the tube), and finally with red cashmere. Stretch gray cord at regular intervals lengthwise on the handles, and wind the same cord crosswise around the handles six times, so that the windings lie close to each other; fasten the beginning and end of the cord, and hold these cross windings together with cross stitches of red zephyr worsted. Pass the handles thus completed on the ends of the rope, and fasten a red worsted ball to each end. Finally, untwist each. Now lay these worsted ball ends on the under and upper surface of the double rope, and execute the knot-work in the manner indicated, so that always three double knots come between every two worsted balls.

THE GIANTS' WEDDING.

OUR illustration represents the late marriage at St. Martin's Church, Trafalgar Square, London, of Captain Martin Van Buren Bates, a Kentuckian, who is said to have served in the Confederate army, and who is eight feet high, and weighs four hundred pounds, and Miss Anna Hanen Swann, of Nova Scotia, who is some inches taller than the captain, and of about the same weight. The bride and bridegroom were attended each by their friends, among whom, it may be remarked, were the twin negro girls, Christine and Millie, who are linked together by a freak of nature, like the Siamese twins, and who usually hold their public levées with the giant and giantess. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. W. Rupert Cochrane, of St. George's, Hanover Square. A number of privileged persons witnessed the ceremony, and there was a crowd of people outside. The proceedings were conducted with perfect order and regularity, and the happy couple withdrew, having duly signed their cords work ten double knots with picots, as shown by Fig. 2; the two remaining cords serve as a foundation; a bar of double knots is thus formed. Lay a piece of cord forty inches long in a similar manner on each of the remaining cords passed through the cane, and then with every four ends of cord work a bar of double knots with picots; these bars are graduated in length; the first three bars to the right and left of the middle bar also count ten double knots each, the following bar at both sides counts eight double knots each, and the last bar six double knots each. Divide each four ends of cord into two and two ends, and with two ends of one part and two ends of the part next this part work bars of double knots, but without picots (see Fig. 10). The two bars under the middle bar first worked count seven double knots each. The eight projecting ends of cord of these two bars are held together; the six middle ends are used for a foundation, over which five double knots without picots are worked with the remaining two cords. The bars at the right and left of the middle bar count nine double knots each; the projecting cord ends of these two bars are held together with the cord ends of the middle bar, and with the two outer cords five double knots are worked on all the remaining cord ends of the middle bar. With each four remaining cords work in a similar manner separate bars of double knots graduated in length (see Fig. 10); hold the proends of the longer bars at a distance of half an inch and five inches and a quarter from the ends, and tie these ends together by means of thread, which has previously been passed through the corresponding holes of the bars. On the handle thus formed work double knots (without picots) with cord, as shown by Fig. 2; pass a large red worsted ball on the under end of the handle, and fasten it there. Now work with a double thread of twisted gray thread on a netting mesh four-fifths of an inch in circumference a piece of straight netting thirteen diamonds (net holes) square, and lace it on the cane frame by means of red woolen cord (see Fig. 11). Finally, work the netted piece in the design shown by the illustration with red zephyr worsted in point de reprise, and ornament the bat, as shown by the illustration with loops of red woolen cord and small woolen tassels, and with a red worsted ball at the upper point.

Figs. 12 and 13.—SKIPPING-ROPES COVERED WITH WOOLEN CORD. To make the jumping-rope shown by Fig. 13 take a rope about eighty inches long, which must be covered with red woolen cord in the following manner: At a distance of eight inches from one end of the rope fasten two long pieces of red woolen cord, each of which is wound up in a ball (pay no attention to the end of the rope referred to), and then lay one of the pieces of red cord at the left of the rope and the other piece at the right. * Now the ends of the rope, lay the separate strands in a small loop each, fasten them in this position, and sew on the worsted ball which has previously been passed on there so that the under ends of the loops are covered. In doing this, however, it is to be observed that the handles between the worsted balls must be movable. For the skipping-rope shown by Fig. 13 take two thin pieces of rope, each eighty inches long, which are laid flatly next each other, and furnished with one ball each at their joined ends. For each of these balls cut a round piece of muslin six inches in diameter; gather it all around the outer edge, and stuff it closely with curled hair; then draw the gathering thread tight, and fasten it. Cover the balls thus far completed with red cashmere, or with a crochet cover of red worsted; then cover them in knot-work with cord, as shown by Fig. 9. The joining threads between the double knots of the last round are gathered closely on a piece of cord. When the balls are fastened carefully on the double rope, cover the latter with double knots of red woolen cord, as shown by Fig. 2, but without the picots. Before executing the knot-work, work two ends of small connected red worsted balls, each eighty inches long, with a double thread of gray thread (this forms the knot-thread) and a strand of red zephyr worsted in the usual manner, so that the worsted balls are repeated at intervals of an inch and one-fifth names on the parish register like any other newly married couple of private folks. The ceremony is thus described by an English witness: The hour fixed for the solemnity was eleven A.M.; and the affair having got wind, there was, long before the momentous question was put by the priest, a goodly company of those spectators to whom any kind of wedding is always gratifying, and a monster wedding a joy forever. At a quarter to eleven exactly the bridegroom arrived and walked composedly up to the altar. He did not wear the uniform of that corps of Anakim in which he is understood to hold a captain's commission, but was in ordinary dress, if we except an exceedingly blue tie. At 10.50 loud whispers, succeeded by a dead silence, announced the approach of the bride, who, pale of face, and clad in a few acres of "white samite, mystic, wonderful," and with her veil thrown back, moved as majestically as her peculiar circumstances or circumferences admit of, up the nave, and stood in front of her affianced husband, and looked down upon him from her superior eminence with the ghastly smile proper to the occasion. She had been preceded by the "two-headed nightingale combination," whose misfortune naturally caused a buzz of comment and much hilarity. The service was read amid a reverential scene of whispering, giggling, and climbing over pews; and when it was over, the usual signing of names appeared to occupy much more than the legitimate time. As the reason could not be the length of the names, which by no means corresponds with that of the owners, one is driven to the conclusion that children of Anakim, like some other great folks, find writing a laborious and difficult operation. At last, however, the pair of Titans emerged from the vestry, and strode arm in arm, followed by the sympathizing "combination," and accompanied by the strains of the "Wedding March," to meet the plaudits of the outside crowd. At a quarter past eleven all was over.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. W. H. M.—You will not be able to make a full suit of your five yards of wide goods. We advise instead a postilion-basque and upper skirt of your material, worn over a black or maroon silk skirt.

MRS. L. B.—It is not necessary to put a waist and sleeves beneath the misses' polonaise.

MRS. C. L. S. C.—Black velvet will trim your sample prettily. We do not write special and private directions on the patterns.

L. S.—The pelerine is the cape. If you mean the skirt of the polonaise instead; we advise you not to line it.

FLETA.—As your acquaintance is so "slite," by all means let the gentleman begin the correspondence.

A CONSTANT READER.—Use fine whiting for cleaning a silver watch; then polish with chamois skin.—The middle syllable, rep, is accented in Parepa. Reichstadt is pronounced as if spelled Rish'stat.

N. A. D.—Velvet is still worn around the neck, though not as universally as formerly. Black lace sacques or points are worn over white muslin.

INEZ D.—For calico suits read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 28, Vol. IV.

AGATHE.—Strips of tucked Swiss muslin will look well inserted in an apron-polonaise of Swiss. As you did not send your bust measure, we select a pattern of the average size—thirty-six inches.

SABRA P.—If your grenadine ruffles are straight, pleat them; if bias, gather them. We can not give extra directions on the cut paper patterns, but will gladly do so in this column.

ANNIE W.—Linen overalls are made by the cut paper pattern of the Water-proof Cloak illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV.

M. G.—There is fullness added to each of the back pieces of the marguerite polonaise, but not to the front.

OSHKOSH.—You can remodel your blue silk by the apron-polonaise pattern, trimming with black lace insertion, and using a blue cambric skirt beneath faced with the silk. The postilion-basque suit is the model for your check silk. Trim with narrow black and white fringe. Use your pleasure about lining the silk skirt. It is not so generally done as formerly.

M. W. C.—Make your tarlatan the high box-pleated waist described in Bazar No. 28, Vol. IV., and trim the edge of each pleat with Tom Thumb fringe, or else have a regular postilion-basque over a silk lining. Trim your blue silk with white muslin pleatings, and wear with a Swiss polonaise. The short over-skirt may be in fashion next season. Get a black and white striped silk, and make by Apron-Polonaise Suit pattern in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV. Put bands of brown silk on the dress like sample.

CLARISSA DE B.—The quotation, "The evil that men do lives after them," etc., is from Antony's funeral oration over Julius Cæsar.

TENNESSEE.—The card which you have sent up is sufficient introduction in calling upon strangers.—Let the bill be sent to your room at a hotel.—The second fork at the dinner-table is intended for fish.—An over-skirt may be simulated with trimming. A gray or Frou Frou suit will look well with your white straw gypsy trimmed with green.—Your other questions have been answered in our columns.

INQUISITIVENESS.—You would certainly be taking a great liberty in sending a present to a lady, whether with or without your name, unless you were assured that it would be well received.

E.—We presume that the child who is awaiting our decision as to whether he shall be flogged or not will be grateful for the delay which has prevented our answering sooner. Since your wrath has had time to cool, we advise you to intermit the punishment. All rules have exceptions; and there may be children whom nothing but corporal punishment can awe; but we think that such cases are few, and that, as a rule, the rod excites more angry passions than it subdues.

B. C. D.—The exquisite little Scotch song, "The Land o' the Leal," was written by Lady Nairn.

N. L.—We have already published in the Bazar a fine portrait and sketch of the Empress Eugénie, and can not repeat it.

C. G. E.—You can easily inform your distant friends of your marriage by sending them your card.

N. B.—There are several good French and Spanish journals published in the United States; but we can not recommend one above another.

V. BUELL.—The tragical story of Charlotte Temple belongs to the early part of the present century, and may be found in our public libraries. The house where she lived is still standing.

SUPERSTITION.—We do not think you need hesitate to be married in a dress you have worn before. The only evil that is likely to accrue from it is having one dress less in your wardrobe than if you had purchased a new one for the occasion. Still it is quite natural to wish to begin this new life with a fresh wardrobe; and we would not discourage trousseaux for those who can afford them.

TRIBULATION.—We do not believe that an Episcopal clergyman would consent to change the prescribed ritual of his Church to oblige your stammering friend, who fears she can not fluently repeat her part of the marriage-service. But she must take courage in the thought that the few words spoken by the low-voiced bride are seldom heard; that the most self-possessed often stammer over these portentous words; and that if this is the only impediment to her love its course must run smoother than it is generally reputed to do.

LAKE CHAMPLAIN.—Eidolon is a Greek word from eido, to see. It means an appearance, sometimes an apparition, and generally indicates an illusive phenomenon.

MRS. M. P.—Work the second half of the design precisely like the first one.

M. G.—Address an elderly lady as "Dear Madam."—You should send a written regret in the usual form when unable to attend a wedding.—It is both safe and proper for a middle-aged lady, possessed of ordinary discretion, to travel alone in Europe.

BETTIE G.—We do not furnish samples or make purchases for our readers.

A. A. G.—We would gladly tell you how to earn money enough to educate yourself if we could, but this is beyond our power. The sale of home-made is would be a slow way. Why not continue your study of drawing till you are able to make salable sketches?

NETTIE T. W.—You had better consult a physician. We can not advise in such a case.

NEITHER failing teeth nor the peeping wrinkles of time so forcibly tell of advancing years as your gray hair. AYER'S VIGOR restores its color, and makes your appearance more agreeable to others as well as yourself. With fresh, luxuriant hair, the infirmities of age are far less noticeable.—[Com.]

HALL'S Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer cures gray hair by causing it to return to its youthful color and vigor.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA will cure CONSUMPTION. Try it!—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar

PURIFY THE BLOOD AND BEAUTIFY THE COMPLEXION BY USING

HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and

HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

H. T. HELMBOLD, Practical and Analytical Chemist,
CRYSTAL PALACE PHARMACY, 594 Broadway, New York;
PALACE PHARMACY, Gilsey House, Broadway and 29th St., New York;
TEMPLE OF PHARMACY, Continental Hotel, Philadelphia; and 104 South Tenth St., Philadelphia.

Prescriptions accurately compounded. French, German, and Spanish spoken. Stores open all night.

P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

We Misuse our Bodies.

It would be as rational to endeavor to repair a watch with a chisel and a sledge-hammer as to attempt to remedy the derangements of the delicate organs of digestion and secretion with drastic cathartics. In are combined, in due proportion, all the ingredients required to relieve the bowels from obstructions, invigorate the stomach, regulate the quantity and improve the quality of the gastric juice and the bile, and neutralize any acid matter that may exist in the circulation.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Bazar at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

FACETIÆ.

WHY is the camel the most irascible animal in the world?—Because he always has his back up.

A HELPING HAND WANTED.—As a rule we disapprove of corporal punishment, but at this season of the year we should not be sorry if every poor child could get a good blow in the fresh air.

A debating society is discussing the following question: "When Adam and Eve partook of the tree of knowledge, did they study the higher branches?"

THE FOUR SEASONS—Mustard, salt, pepper, and vinegar.

A man writes to say he only backed one horse in his life, and that was into a shop window.

WEEDS GROW APACE.—If, says a contemporary, Brigham Young wore an additional "weed" on his hat every time he lost a wife or mother-in-law, it is estimated his hat would have to be twenty-seven feet high. "He'd be a weedower with a vengeance," remarks a Scotch friend.

Why are paviors like good hens?—Because they are always laying eggs-actly.

A SOVEREIGN BET—Queen Elizabeth.

A little girl joyfully assured her mother the other day that she had found out where they made horses—she had seen a man in a shop just finishing one of them, for he was nailing on his last foot!

A DOGMA.—A dog weighing only four ounces was sold the other day for $250. These toy dogs are like tax gatherers—the less we see of them the better.

Why are sheep the least moral of the animals?—Because they gambol in their youth, spend much of their time on the turf, many of them are blacklegs, and they all get fleeced at last.

BIRDS v. THORNS.—If a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, it is no less true that a thorn in the bush is worth two in the hand.

"I don't want to die and go to heaven," remarked a little girl, laying down her book; "but if God would let down a rope, I think I should like it."

HAIR-SPLITTING.—Why cut your own heir off with a shilling when you can get a barber to cut your hair off for you and shampoo you into the bargain for that very moderate sum?

The editor of an Eastern paper having received a bank-note detector, returns thanks, and modestly asks for some bank-notes upon which to test its accuracy.

BADLY BEATEN—Carpets just now.

We understand that the following contents of a most valuable museum, belonging to a late well-known member of the Antiquarian Society, will soon be offered for sale:

The pebbles which Demosthenes held in his mouth when he practiced oratory.

One of the flies which was killed by Domitian.

A lock of the hair which strung the bows at the siege of Carthage.

A fragment of Penelope's web.

A piece of the cake which was watched by King Alfred (very much burned).

A bone of the lamprey which killed Henry I.

A bottle of the Malmesbury in which the Duke of Clarence was drowned.

Some of the gunpowder which was to have been used at the Gunpowder Plot.

A piece of the tart with which Sir Thomas Overbury was poisoned (very stale).

Part of the rope which hung Guy Fawkes.

Branch of the tree which came from Birnam Wood to Dunsinane.

A feather from the bed in which Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, was smothered at Calais.

A bit of the iron mask.

A card from the pack with which Charles VI. amused himself in the Bastile.

A cinder from the Great Fire in London.

Part of Sir Walter Raleigh's first cigar.

The spider's web which was watched by Sir Robert Bruce when he decided the fate of Scotland.

The fly liberated by Uncle Toby when he said, "There is room enough in the world for you and me."

The apple which struck Sir Isaac Newton when he discovered the laws of gravity.

UNCLE. "I don't know how you could do that! Where did you see me?" BESSIE. "At the Menagerie."

"NOT LIKE HIS APPEARANCE TO THE SIR ROGER TICHBORNE OF FIFTEEN YEARS AGO! THAT'S NO PROOF AGAINST HIM. WHY, SIR, I HAD NOT SEEN MY OWN DAUGHTER—SAY FOR THE LAST FIVE YEARS—I'M HANGED IF I SHOULD KNOW HER NOW. THERE!"

THE FEMALE DICTIONARY.

In this valuable work the signification of a word is given in feminine sense, as under:

Marriage—The only habit to which women are constant.

Lover—Any young man but a brother-in-law.

Clergyman—One alternative of a lover.

Brother—The other alternative.

Honey-moon—A wife's opportunity.

Horrid, Hideous—Terms of admiration elicited by the sight of a lovely face any where but in the looking-glass.

Nice, Dear—Expressions of delight at any thing, from a baby to a barrel-organ.

Appetite—A monstrous abortion, which is stifled in the kitchen that it may not exist during dinner.

Wrinkle—The first thing one lady sees in another's face.

Husband—A person who writes checks, and dresses as his wife directs.

Duck (in ornithology)—A trussed bridegroom, with his giblets under his arm.

Brute—A domestic endearment for a husband.

BEGINNING LIFE.—The remark of a contemporary, that many of our successful lawyers commenced life as preachers, is gracefully corrected by one of the legal gentlemen referred to, who begs leave to state that he began life as an infant.

The story of a lazy schoolboy, who spelled Andrew Jackson "&dru Jaxon," has been equaled by a student who wished to mark half a dozen new shirts. He marked the first "John Jones," and the rest "do."

LIGHT.

A lady buying a pound of tea, the merchant said he would send it home.

"Oh no," said she; "it is not inconvenient, as it is light."

"Why," said he, "it is as light as I could possibly make it."

A delighted hearer observed of a very brilliant talker that the flash of his wit was followed close by the peal of applause.

The sweetest thing in earrings is an aquarium of rock-crystal filled with water, in which swim small whales, lobsters, and shrimps.

THE LAST THING IN DOMESTICS.

LADY. "Can you wash and iron?"

DOMESTIC. "Oh, yes, 'm; but your place wouldn't suit me unless you knocked off wearing them long holland dresses of a morning."

Can a ship with two owners be called a partnership?

You'd better look out for your hoss's feet above here, mister," said a ragged boy to a Reading traveler.

"Why?" said the gentleman, nervously pulling up.

"Cos there's a fork in the road there," was the candid reply.

THE BEST SEA-WEED—A cigar on the beach.

CONUNDRUMS FOR THE CURIOUS.

What have you to expect at a hotel?—Inn attention.

Why is the sun like a good loaf?—Because it is light when it rises.

What is that which is so brittle that if you named it you are sure to break it?—Silence.

What is it that goes up the hill and down the hill, and yet never moves?—The road.

What does a grocer do with all his things before he sells them?—Gives them a weigh.

What drink should sailors be fond of?—Port.

Why should the Speaker of the House wear spectacles?—Because so many attempts are made to "catch his eye."

Why is Mr. Disraeli always greeted with the sight of his last novel in the House of Commons?—Because he can not take his seat without seeing Lowe there ("Lothair").

What is the difference between an egg-shell and a physician?—One is MT, and the other is M.D.

When is a member of Congress like a dying sinner?—When he dreads approaching dissolution.

What drink is suitable for gardeners?—Shrub.

Which is the most appropriate drink for fops?—Spruce.

When is a theatrical manager like an astronomer?—When he discovers a new "star."

Why are young ladies so partial to sunset and twilight?—Because they are daughters of Eve.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 31.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, AND KNICKERBOCKERS.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pretty suit can be made of any material, and is equally well adapted to all seasons. It is graded in six sizes, from 21 to 26 inches, bust measure, to fit boys from four to nine years old. The size is taken by passing a tape measure tolerably tight straight under the arms entirely around the body.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit consists of three pieces—blouse, knickerbockers, and shirt-waist.

BLOUSE.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, back, sleeve, collar, pocket, and belt. The perforations show where to sew on the pockets and the braid simulating a pocket on the breast, and the shape of the under part of the sleeve. Place the longest seam of the sleeve at the notch in the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Join the collar to the neck with the centre placed at the middle of the back, sew with the seam on the outside, and turn it over on the right side to cover the seam. Close the front with four buttons and button-holes. Fasten the belt with one button. Put three buttons on the outer seam of the sleeve at the wrist, about an inch and a half apart. In making the suit of cloth with a nap, take care that the nap runs downward toward the bottom of the garment. If the sleeves are too long or short, add to or take off an equal quantity at the bottom and top, always keeping the same shape. A quarter of an inch is allowed for seams in this pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for boy four years old, 1¾ yards.

Braid for two rows, 1 piece.

Number of buttons, 11.

KNICKERBOCKERS.—This pattern is in three pieces—front, back, and belt. The waistband is cut on, and a false belt is sewed underneath with six button-holes, to button to the shirt-waist. The pocket is sewed between the notches at the outside seam. The band at the bottom of the legs is cut on, and can be fastened with a button and button-hole on the outer seam, or drawn to the leg with an elastic. Sew the facing on the width of the band, and stitch one row on the entire edge and one the width of the band on the right side. A quarter of an inch is allowed for all seams in this pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for boy four years old, 1¼ yards.

Number of buttons, 7.

SHIRT-WAIST.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, back, plain coat sleeve, and belt. Gather the waist at each side of the fronts and back, sew on the belt, and close the front with small buttons and button-holes.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for boy four years old, seven-eighths of a yard.

Number of buttons, 6.

A quarter of a yard for the whole suit must be added for each year of age.

Ladies' Summer Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—EVENING DRESS OF LIGHT GREEN SILK, trimmed on the bottom with a flounce of English point a quarter of a yard wide, surmounted by moss fringe and two bias folds of the color of the dress. Over-skirt of white silk gauze with satin stripes, looped at the sides by ribbon bows with fringed ends, which are connected with the belt by a ribbon band. The over-skirt is trimmed like the under-skirt, with English point six inches wide, moss fringe, and bias folds. Low white gauze waist, over green silk, trimmed like the skirt. Short puffed sleeves. Sash of wide green ribbon, tied behind in a large bow with fringed ends.

Fig. 2.—MOURNING WRAPPER OF WHITE FOULARD DOTTED WITH BLACK. The trimming forms the tablier, and is continued around the skirt; it consists of a flounce with a heading and a ruche of lavender silk. A similar ruche simulates a square cape, and forms the sleeve trimming. The loose waist is confined by a sash of lavender silk. Straw hat, trimmed with lavender ruche and feather.

Fig. 3.—MOURNING WALKING DRESS.—Under-skirt trimmed with very deep side pleating. Over-skirt of faille, trimmed with guipure. Corsage with flat basque, covering the pouf of the over-skirt. The sleeve trimming is put on so as to form double sleeves; the guipure follows the outline of the sleeve, which forms two deep pleats at the elbow, confined by a faille bow. Black straw bonnet, with feathers and a long crape veil.

Fig. 4.—WALKING DRESS OF ÉCRU SULTANE, trimmed with five gathered flounces each three inches wide, headed with pleatings and folds. Long over-skirt, rounded in front and draped at the sides, and edged with a pleating held by a fold in the middle. Basque-waist, rounded in front, with a slashed postilion behind. Open sleeves. Straw bonnet, covered with puffings and ruches of lilac crape, and a feather of the same color.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Talking without Speaking.

MY DEAR GERALD,—On one of these warm afternoons I was dining at Delmonico's with Claude, and as we sat chatting at the window afterward, looking upon the ceaseless crowd that poured along the Avenue, and remarking to each other that every body was out of town, Claude said, suddenly, "Every body but old Buzzard—and there he goes!" Mr. Buzzard, indeed, was there, and he was sauntering slowly along the shady side of the street, a text, as it were, presenting itself in every aspect, and soliciting improvement. Our eyes followed him, and it was certainly not surprising that Claude presently remarked that in his opinion Mr. Buzzard, taking him all in all, was a very disagreeable man. He watched him silently for a moment, and laughed quietly to himself.

"I never see Buzzard," he continued, "without remembering the little story of him and his old school-fellow and perhaps college-mate, Batt." And Claude smiled again, as if in confidence with himself.

"The story is this," he resumed: "I was one day sitting with Chitty in his law office when Buzzard came in, and after talking some time he went out, and met Batt coming in. They exchanged a few cheerful commonplaces and parted. Batt was evidently full of desire to say something besides the special business upon which he came, and when he had disposed of that he remarked that he had met Buzzard going out. 'He is a very talented man,' said Batt, 'and we were old school-fellows, but he is certainly the most intolerable human being I ever encountered.' He seemed to be really relieved by this discharge of opinion, and presently departed, quite pacified. But when, a few days afterward, Buzzard dropped in again, and remarked to Chitty that as he was going out upon his previous visit he had met Batt coming in, and then added, with great warmth, that Batt was a good fellow, but that he was unquestionably the most intolerable of men, Chitty smiled politely, and, of course, did not dare to catch my eye. The truth is," said Claude, "the two gentlemen had very accurately described each other."

By this time Mr. Buzzard was out of sight; and as Claude had been speaking I had been thinking of an incident of the same general character, of which Dodo was the hero. How accomplished he is we all know; and, indeed, he is, upon many important subjects, an authority; but he is often criticised in the same manner that Messieurs Buzzard and Batt criticised each other. One day four friends of mine agreed to dine together, and the condition of the feast was that each one should bring, as his contribution to the general entertainment, the most disagreeable man he knew in town. The day arrived, and the guests. Indeed, the scene of the feast was the same Delmonico's at which I was sitting with Claude. The first guest entered alone. The second came alone, and the two, explaining to each other, remarked that the most disagreeable man they knew in town had a previous engagement. Then came the third, and said to Numbers One and Two that the most disagreeable man he knew had promised to dine with somebody else. None of them had mentioned the name of the gentleman whom they had hoped to bring. But when the door opened and Number Four entered with Dodo, Numbers One, Two, and Three simultaneously whispered to each other, "He's brought my man!"

When one of them told me this absurd story I said to myself, "How much does Dodo suspect from their manner toward him that they think him the most disagreeable man in town? Would he have consented to dine with Number Four if he had known what Number Four thought of him? And if he did not know, was Four's manner truthful?" I do not remember that I answered the question satisfactorily to myself; but it occurred to me as I sat at the window with Claude, and to my surprise I suddenly saw Mr. Buzzard coming into the room. Claude rose to meet him as he advanced. The words which Claude had just spoken were still in my mind as I observed the greeting, and I said to myself, "If my young friend Claude receives one of the most disagreeable of men in this courteous and cordial way, how would he receive one of the most agreeable?" Mr. Buzzard sat for some time, talking and laughing; and when he had taken his coffee and had withdrawn I asked Claude whether he supposed that Mr. Buzzard knew what he thought of him.

"I have certainly never told him," he replied, laughing; "and I don't believe that he would wish me to tell him."

"But haven't you told him that you think him a very pleasant fellow?" asked I.

"Most emphatically, never!" answered Claude. "The truth is, that I never spoke to him upon the subject."

"Doesn't manner speak as loud as words, my boy? And could a man whom you treat as I have just seen you treat Mr. Buzzard suppose that you thought him very disagreeable?" I said.

"But surely, dear Mr. Bachelor," rejoined Claude, "you don't think it desirable that we should all mutually express an opinion of each other? Human society would come to an end. If I should say to Jack when he comes to see me that I wish him, first of all, to understand that I think him a dreadful bore, and to Edgar that I consider him very superficial, and to Hugh that my mature opinion of him is that he is a fool, to Karl that he is the most conceited of men, and to Harry that he is a time-server and treacherous, and if every body else should do the same, we should be at war, and human intercourse would become intolerable."

"Then, in your opinion, our manners must lie?" I said to him.

"Certainly not," he answered, "because nobody supposes that my bowing to him or speaking politely to him implies approval of all that he is or does."

This little passage led me to reflect upon the general subject of manners. We speak of fine manners; we praise courtesy and elegance and refinement of manner. We say that a man's manners are good or bad; that a woman's manners are captivating; and the more curious students of the subject declare that the perfection of manner is to persuade the person addressed that he absorbs all the interest and the attention of the speaker. Then there are the other questions: Are manners independent of character? May a scoundrel be a person of truly fine manners? Is manner only a form of external address; and is it, therefore, just as fine when it is wholly false? May a bad man have good manners? And may the sincerest and most benevolent manners be bad manners?

I suppose, dear Gerald, that we must answer all these last questions in the affirmative. Fra Diavolo's manners may be very good, and Dr. Johnson's were undeniably bad. Good men may be rude and coarse and contemptuous in their intercourse with others, and it is of the very essence of superior scoundrelism to be sleek and smooth and feline. You know, I suppose, Mew, the great statesman. Now his objects are wholly selfish, and his parts are really contemptible; but his manners are so gentle and gracious and persuasive that he may be said to slip along upon the oil that he exudes. Yet his manners, if fine, are undeniably false—that is to say, they imply and intend to imply what is not true. When you go to him to ask for an office for your friend Scritch, who has been always so faithful, and has done such hard work in the great political campaign, Mr. Mew receives you as if you were the one person for whom his soul had been pining, and listens to you as if now at last wisdom had descended incarnate. And when you come to Scritch and Scritch's claim, and Scritch's services to the party, Mr. Mew's manner gives you distinctly to understand that nothing would so fully express his views of Scritch and his services and claims as the toast, with the name changed, offered by a professor at the young University of Virginia to Lafayette upon his last visit to this country: "The apple of our heart's eye—Scritch."

Mr. Mew's manner says to you, in the plainest way, that of all men Scritch is the man. Words could not express it more distinctly; and when he says, softly pressing your hand in parting, that he will do all that he can do for Scritch, not for his own claims and services only, great as they are, but for the respect which he, Mew, entertains for you, you go off flattered and pleased, you foolish fellow, and write Scritch that he is about as sure of the place as he can be of any thing, while Mr. Mew slips around to the proper authority and insists that the appointment shall be instantly made out, not for Scritch but for Scratch, who has been Mew's man all the time.

Mr. Mew's manner produces upon you, my dear Gerald, precisely the kind of impression that Claude's did upon Mr. Buzzard, although in a different degree. Mew persuades you that he thinks very highly of you, and would, therefore, gladly do what you wish; and Claude's certainly persuades Mr. Buzzard that Claude has a very kindly feeling for him. I know people who say to others that they think me a great bore; and it is, I know, often the misfortune of age to become so. But the manner of the same persons says to me that I am quite an agreeable old fellow. Can there be no discrimination in manner? Must we say equally to all persons that we love and respect them without end? No, my boy, that is not at all necessary; but neither need we attempt to express exactly the shade of regard that we entertain. Manner can not be a meter sensitive as the thermometer to every change, every fluctuation of temperature.

And even were this practicable, it is not desirable. For how superficial our knowledge of each other is! If my manner shows, as inevitably it will, to a man whom I wholly distrust that I do not confide in him, yet its very cold courtesy also says that he is human, and that my judgment is very fallible. I am not false if, while I am not ardent, I show that I acknowledge our common humanity. Then a man may be very disagreeable to me who is not dishonorable, and for whom I have no moral antipathy. Certainly I ought not to persuade him that it is pleasant for me to see him, and therefore if I feel as strongly as Claude expressed himself of Mr. Buzzard, I should not greet him as I would greet you. But universal courtesy of manner is but the recognition of a common humanity. Forçat, whom I believe to be a rascal, came smiling up to me at Mrs. Fringe's raspberry party the other day and put out his hand; I nodded politely, but I did not take his hand. His object was to compel me to tell a lie by my manner, and I declined. I hope that I always shall decline, and that all of my young friends, dear Gerald, will do likewise.

Your old friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

SERVICEABLE CLUBBING.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

HE setteth the solitary in families. Sometimes. And sometimes he does not. Why, then, do not the solitary set themselves in families? There are so few women who ever think of keeping house and making a home for themselves and a centre of social life for their circle unless they are married. Of course it is a great deal easier to set up and keep up an establishment with a man at the fore—if he is the right sort of man. The right sort of man is one who knows instinctively when to be an active partner and when to be a silent partner; who goes to the front when there is money to be earned for the home, and to the rear when it is to be spent; who provides and enjoys a bountiful table, but is sweet-tempered, cheerful, and consoling in an emergency; who is main-stay and head centre of the family, but who shows it only in constant providence and tender watchfulness—a man of whose comfort and taste every one else thinks first, but who thinks of it himself least and last. Such a man is a real help in housekeeping. But suppose a man is ignorant or incapable, has small knack in getting on, never is suited with his situation, but leaves a good one in search of a better, and finds none; refuses a salary of a thousand a year because his "family can't live on a thousand dollars," and so they live on nothing; does not know what to do with money when he gets it, but fritters it away in trifling expenditures and foolish investments, while his family lack comfort in the present and security for the future; or suppose he is thrifty but fretful, exacting, imperious, capricious, selfish—is he a help over the hard places in housekeeping? If a man can, in case of distress, put on a door-knob, mend a broken pane of glass, hang a picture, tack down a carpet, entertain a guest, eat stale bread and like it when the stove won't draw and the biscuit won't bake, he is pleasant to have about, and far better than nobody; but the chances are large that he can not mend the knob, and will forget to call a carpenter, and may lower over the "slim breakfast;" so that his failure to put in an appearance need not be fatal to an establishment. But if a girl is left, the one ungathered rose upon the family tree, she goes to live with her married sister or brother, and, ten to one, becomes merged in the family, and presently loses all distinct individuality of position or influence.

So the teachers in a city, and the clerks and the shop-girls, and all unmarried and self-supporting or independent women, live in boarding-houses or in families, often finding it difficult to secure an agreeable home, and often dwelling in a place and a manner that preclude every idea of home, and really deprive them of a large part of the social power to which their character and ability entitle them.

Suppose, now, four young gentlewomen who have been left each with a slender income, quite insufficient for gentle housekeeping, but sufficient for a respectable maintenance in the proffered home of a brother or brother-in-law, without further help from him than such proffer affords. Suppose that, instead of accepting these offers and becoming superfluous members of other families—assistants possibly, but not indispensable, and always subordinate—these four should unite their forces. Four insufficient incomes may combine into one sufficient not only for comfort but for elegance. The cost of housekeeping for four women is very far from being four times the cost of housekeeping for one. In many respects it would not be perceptibly increased. One woman, for instance, would need one servant; and by distributing the light and agreeable but time-and-care-needing parts of the house-work among themselves, four women could do perfectly well with one servant. Even their association can be so guarded that there shall be no necessity for undue or undesired intimacy, and liking shall be its only measure. Each one's share of superintendence and service can be rigidly prescribed and observed. The dining-room and parlor are the only common ground. In their own rooms they are as secluded and supreme as if their souls were like stars, and dwelt apart. In the drawing-room they are harmonious and hospitable. To the outside world they are householders, a family, a unit. They may receive and entertain; they have standing, a local habitation, and a name. To themselves they are themseves—free, self-possessed, self-acting. It needs only a certain power of adaptation—a certain similarity, or rather harmony, of taste and purpose—to begin with, and then a moderate amount of Christian forbearance, of intelligent allowance, and, above all, scrupulous and invariable good-breeding. But there is no situation in life in which good-breeding is not indispensable to happiness and character; while in point of forbearance and adaptation they would not need to exercise half as much as if they were married. The strain upon patience and temper would be far less than in marriage; and though, justly enough, the happiness arising from the alliance might be less intense and perfect, it would be far greater than from a tame and spiritless life of perpetual subordination or perpetual self-denial.

Or suppose the four gentlewomen supplement or supply their income by teaching or by some other form of remunerative work. Each earns five hundred dollars a year. Five hundred dollars a year would keep no house, but four five hundreds would keep one respectably and comfortably. By systematic arrangement four friends, one would think, might live together in a coziness and even a luxury unattainable at any boarding-house which their means could command, with a pride of self-direction and independence which would be impossible for them in any other family, and at a cost really less than their united expenses in a separate life. They would purchase comfort and supervision at a less price than discomfort and subordination. They would spend their money for exactly what they wanted, and of whatever economy they chose to exercise themselves would reap the fruits.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BOY'S BLOUSE, SHIRT-WAIST, AND KNICKERBOCKERS.

THE suit of blouse, shirt-waist, and knickerbocker trowsers shown on our first page is the négligé every-day suit worn at all seasons of the year by boys from four to nine years of age. The blouse is of the simplest construction, having merely seams under the arms and on the shoulders. All blouses are made quite short at present, those for a boy of seven years extending only about a finger-length and a half below the natural taper of the waist. The belt is a separate piece of the material bound on each edge with braid, and attached to the blouse by a strap of the binding sewed on each seam under the arms, and buttoned in front. It is the fancy to wear the belt very low, giving a long-waisted and easy appearance to the costume. The pockets are on the inside, with a flap showing just below the belt. The breast pocket is usually a sham. In the illustration given a large sailor collar is added, with a white star embroidered in the corners; the collar is used on all materials, but the nautical ornaments only with blue and white suits that are worn in the summer.

The knickerbockers are not the baggy-looking garments that were once worn in imitation of Zouave trowsers. All fullness at the top and the wide Zouave belt are dispensed with. The trowsers are shaped to fit the figure, and are supplied with an inner waistband having button-holes to fasten it to a white shirt-waist. The legs are made two inches longer than knee-breeches, and are not so much sloped about the knee. An elastic band is placed in the hem, and worn just above the calf of the leg, allowing the trowsers to droop merely enough to hide the hem. These are far more trim and graceful than the knickerbockers formerly worn. Plain white and striped linens or cambric are used for the shirt-waists, of which a pattern is given.

For summer wear blue twilled flannel is the fabric most used for these suits, especially when gotten up in sailor fashion, like that in our illustration. This flannel, three-quarters of a yard wide, is now sold for 75 cents a yard, and some very good qualities are marked as low as 50 cents a yard. These suits have bindings, and straight lines of black and white braid. Much trimming is incongruous with their négligé design. Dressy suits of white duck, trimmed with blue or with white braid, are also seen. Serviceable suits for school are of heavy gray and brown linens, with or without bindings or any trimming. Fall and winter suits are now being made by this pattern at the furnishing stores. The materials are gray Cheviots and heavier cassimere, warmly lined throughout.

The low shoe called both the Oxford and the Newport tie is in favor for small boys. Long stockings are most worn with knickerbockers, though it is not unusual to see short socks, just reaching above the buttoned gaiters, leaving the plump limbs bare below the calf.

CHINTZ SILKS AND PERCALES.

Lyons silks, gauzes, and percales of the latest manufacture revive the chintz designs worn by our grandmothers. The grounds are gray, dove-color, or light buff, sprinkled with bouquets of flowers in their natural tints, bluets, and field poppies, mixed with wheat ears. The French percales are the cretonnes that we have already described. Chintz silks are made up in antique fashion, with flounced over-skirts draped above kilt-pleated skirts of solid-colored silk matching the ground of the over-skirt. Worn with this is a fichu of folds of clear white lawn or of tulle, or else a chemisette of folds is disclosed by the pointed or square opening now seen with vest fronts.

An elegant Chambery gauze dress, just sent out from a Parisian house, is white with a chintz stripe at intervals. The corsage has a postilion-basque, with a novelty in the shape of a vest front that has the neck cut low and square, showing a chemisette of folds of white tulle arranged in shawl fashion. The sleeves are half-flowing, with an inner pleating of tulle and lace. There is no over-skirt, but a demi-train with seven narrow pleated flounces. Cunning little bows of chintz ribbon are set at intervals down the two front seams on each side. This is intended for a dinner dress at Newport. Accompanying it is an elegant morning dress to be worn by a brunette. It is of palest écru foulard, made open in front, a Watteau fold behind, a slight train, half-flowing sleeves, and bordered all around by a Swiss muslin pleating edged with Valenciennes, and headed by a band of black velvet.

A third dress offers a suggestion to correspondents who ask for a new way to trim white alpaca. This was not the pearl-tinged, poor-looking white, but a soft, creamy tint, and the trimming was bindings of palest Nile green gros grain on flounces of the alpaca deeply scalloped. A single wide flounce was on the lower skirt, a narrow ruffle on the short upper skirt, while the basque and sleeves were merely scalloped.

RIDING HABITS.

The most stylish habit for the country at this season is of poussière, or dust-colored cloth. The fabric is that light quality of ladies' cloth, scarcely heavier than opera flannel. The habit is made with a postilion-basque, square behind, with pointed front, and the trimming often outlines a vest. A bias band of heavily repped silk of a darker shade is the trimming, with a curled line of soutache braid above it. The skirt has four widths, all sloped near the top, except the back width, which is straight and full, and is attached to a belt by deep French gathers. A jockey cap is made at the hatters' of scraps of cloth left from the habit.

Black and invisible green continue to be the favorite colors for habits worn in the city. High-crowned hats of gray or brown straw, trimmed with gauze of the same color, are worn during the warm months. English beaver hats, for equestriennes, have long scarf-veils of white gauze twisted around the crown and hanging over the left shoulder. Soft white Panama hats, like those worn by gentlemen, are also shown for ladies. They are trimmed with a velvet band and a white ostrich plume.

APPLIQUÉ EMBROIDERY, ETC.

Medallions of the finest French needle-work are sold for ornamenting linen and Valenciennes lace garments. This appliqué, or transferred embroidery, is greatly in vogue also for marking handkerchiefs, the initials of the name being sewed in one corner of the broad hem now seen on all pocket-handkerchiefs. The letters are large Roman capitals, and each one costs 35 cents. Exquisitely wrought letters of point lace—the finest round point—are also shown for marking fans of satin or silk, or for inserting in the corner of a linen cambric handkerchief bordered with point lace. These are leaning Italic capitals with a vine entwined around them.

Square-meshed guipure net, in frames, for making tidies, and the materials for making the point lace work taught in our columns, are now to be found in many fancy stores.

Fanciful collars and wristbands are just introduced of the guipure embroidery in vogue for trimming white goods. They are usually edged with Valenciennes. Duchesse lace is the fashionable lace for trimming evening dresses of white muslin; but it looks coarse after washing, and can never render Valenciennes unpopular.

CASHMERE WRAPS.

Garments of braided cashmere will be a feature in fall attire, and ladies are devoting their summer leisure to ornamenting them. Polonaises and the Watteau mantle, with either one cape or two, are the first choice in shape, though many ladies adhere to the négligé paletot, making it closer fitting, however, than those of last winter. The garment is cut by a modiste, and the pattern for braiding is stamped upon each piece separately, that it may be braided before it is made up into a large, unwieldy garment. Narrowest soutache of finest silk is used for braiding, and the design is so close that when finished it looks like very rich embroidery. Fern leaves and a Greek border are the favorite designs. Gray cashmere is braided with darker gray, light brown with nut brown, black with black, except for house jackets, when the jardinière braids of many colors are used.

VARIETIES.

Black lace mittens are said to be coming into fashion again, and are already seen on the promenade. They display a fair hand to advantage, and are certainly far more comfortable than kid gloves for midsummer wear. They can be bought very reasonably at present, but will be far more expensive next season.

Another revival, pleasant at this writing, is the close, high way of arranging the hair that has been adopted by many ladies of fashion. Instead of chatelaine braids drooping low on the neck, hair-dressers make the old-fashioned French twist high on the back of the head, and coil braids of three-plaited tresses around it. A braided coronet passes over the front. This gives the head a classic shape, and is cooler and more cleanly than the chatelaine.

A new hat, called the Roland, is masculine-looking, but stylish. It is of English straw, with a high, square crown shaped like the beavers worn with riding habits. The rolling brim curves slightly in front and back. Black velvet and an ostrich feather are the trimmings.

PERSONAL.

KATE FIELD is good enough to inform the public of a good thing said by one of the merchant princes of Chicago: An Eastern man was commending the services of a young Philadelphian to the Chicago tradesman. "He comes of a very good family. His grandfather was a very distinguished man," said the man of the East. "Was he?" replied the man of Chicago. "That's of no account with us. There's less daddyism here than in any part of the United States. What's he himself?" "Daddyism" is good, and should forthwith be incorporated in Webster and Walker.

—Mr. ODO RUSSELL has been appointed British embassador to Berlin. He is a successful diplomat, wary and wily, firm while appearing to yield, and has already matched heads with BISMARCK during the residence of B. at Versailles.

—JAMES SAVAGE is the oldest man living who has been a Fourth of July orator in Boston. He spoke his piece in 1811.

—It is said that the Empress EUGÉNIE is negotiating for the sale of her diamonds, which are valued at $1,600,000.

—The HOWE family are to have a general jubilation at South Framingham, Massachusetts, on the 21st of August. Hon. JOSEPH HOWE, Secretary of State for the Dominion of Canada, will deliver the oration. There will be doings, also, by Mrs. JULIA WARD HOWE, Judge HOWE, of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, Senator HOWE, of Wisconsin, Dr. S. G. HOWE, of Boston, Colonel F. E. HOWE, of New York, and much other HOWE. Poems, speeches, dinner, and frequent quotations of "Howe is this for," etc., etc.; "Howe doth the little busy bee," etc.; "Howe sharper than a serpent's thanks it is to have a toothless child," will be the order of the day.

—Mr. TENNYSON is said to have given the final painstaking and polish to the poem which he is known to have taken so much time to compose, and it is soon to be published in London by Mr. STRAHAN. It will be promptly republished here by HARPER & BROTHERS.

—Baron WOLFGANG VON GOETHE, the poet's younger grandson, is about to print privately a work giving the result of his continued research as to the ecclesiastical history of Italy in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

—It is talked of in Washington, in circles that are likely to be quite well informed, that the Marquis of Lorne and Princess LOUISE will come to the United States this autumn. They will spend some time in Canada, then visit New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and arrive in Washington about the time of the visit of the Russian prince, ALEXIS.

—ROBERT HOUDIN, the celebrated French conjuror, died recently in France. He invented many ingenious machines, for which he received prize medals. In 1845 he began his public career as a conjuror, and for seven years amused the Parisians at his hall in the Palais Royal. The government sent him in 1856 to Algiers, in order that he might enlighten the Arabs on the pretended miracles of their marabouts. He wrote several interesting books.

—General MAGRUDER is buried in the Masonic portion of the cemetery at Houston, Texas, the only thing to indicate the spot being a simple board at the head of the grave, on which are two lines written with a pencil, "J. B. MAGRUDER, Lieutenant-General C. S. Army." When "I' the North," in the olden time, General M. was an especial favorite in society. Where are now the old friends who have so often partaken of his bountiful hospitality?

—The Washington Capital speaks of CALEB CUSHING as one of the most remarkable men of the day, who, without official position, is yet a power. It states that for the last three years no important state paper has been written, or move made, or diplomatic agent selected, without calling in the aid or advice of this remarkable man. He reminds one more of a European statesman, one of that sort who accumulates years and information without age, and up to the last moment of a long career is as valuable to his country as in the prime of manhood.

—Formerly the players were termed "Her Majesty's Servants." Now, as we hear by the last steamer, her Majesty's children have taken to the "sock and buskin," by taking part in a dramatic entertainment to raise funds to build a monument to Sir WALTER SCOTT. They played, we learn, parts from the Waverley Novels, and "the house" netted twenty-five hundred dollars. The players were the Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince and Princess CHRISTIAN, Marquis of Lorne and Mrs. Lorne, Prince TECK, and Prince ARTHUR. The performance is supposed to have been beyond criticism, as no mention of it is made in the British journals.

—Mr. JOHN W. GARRETT, who, with Commodore VANDERBILT and THOMAS A. SCOTT, may be classed among the railroad monarchs of this country, is described by a Washington interviewer as a short, plump individual, of Pickwickian amplitude at the waistband, with an overplus of neck, topping a modest black tie, a bulbous forehead, bald head fringed with white hair and tufts of white side whiskers, and a round face, to which a peculiarly child-like innocence is given by a colorless Greeleyan complexion and mild blue eyes. Not a face likely to belong to a hard, resolute, railroad potentate, if there is any truth in physiognomy. Mr. GARRETT is fifty-one years old, looks seventy at the roof of his head and thirty in the face. Like GREELEY, whom he resembles in face, he does not smoke, chew, or drink. He has the reputation of being affable and singularly even-tempered under all the fret and strain of his varied and wide-spread business operations.

—It was recently stated in Parliament, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that Mr. WILLIAM STUART, as the heir of WILLIAM PENN, received from the government an annuity of $20,000. The pension was granted in 1790, when it was discovered that he had lost property valued at $2,500,000 by adhering to the British interests during the war of independence. Mr. PITT and Mr. FOX both agreed upon this, though many members at that time considered that the annuity should be $25,000.

—Mr. GEORGE W. M'CULLOM, of this city, impelled thereto by a fine sense of the fitness of things, has given $12,000 to the Appleton Academy in Mount Vernon, New Hampshire, and contemplates increasing the gift to $50,000. The name of the academy has been changed to the "M'Cullom Institute." The trustees can at that rate afford to keep changing the name.

—Notwithstanding that Mr. GROTE, the historian, was born with the traditional spoon of silver in his mouth, he had, in spite, to work his way to fame against as many hinderances as most of those who have no advantages of wealth and position. The future historian of Greece had not even the ordinary advantages of the classical education of that time, but was perched at a high desk in the family counting-house. He taught himself Greek in the intervals of business, but, like a wise man, he accepted his fate, worked hard at what was set before him, made himself an excellent man of business, and waited quietly until he became his own master and had made his own fortune. He bore the reputation, half a century ago, of being a first-rate financier, but it is as a historian that he will be remembered. His great work has been reproduced in this country in twelve volumes by HARPER & BROTHERS.

—Miss CORDELIA JANE HODGESON, the last English connection of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, died the other day at Preston, England, at the age of seventy-eight.

—Mr. BRADFORD, the American painter, seems to have captured the nobility and gentry and the art connoisseurs of England. He has suddenly become the fashion, and his rooms at the Langham Hotel are daily visited by distinguished people, who greatly admire his paintings of arctic scenery. So much interested by them was Sir RODERICK MURCHISON that he called attention to them in his annual address before the Royal Geographical Society. Mr. BRADFORD'S large painting, "Summer in the Arctic Regions," has been purchased by Mr. ASHBURY, of the Royal Yacht Club, and placed in a conspicuous place for exhibition.

—Senator GRIMES, of Iowa, gives an annual prize to that member of the Senior class of Dartmouth College who makes the most general improvement during his college course. This year it has been awarded to WALTER M. PARKER, of Manchester, New Hampshire. Mr. GRIMES has also provided for two perpetual scholarships in Dartmouth, one in the name of his wife and one in his own, to be given to such worthy poor young men as the faculty may select.

—The French Duc DE POLIGNAC, who did a little rough rebel raiding in Texas during the war, and who at the suggestion of Mr. J. DAVIS invested $82,000 in Virginia State bonds of rebel issue, can't get his money, and proposes to sue. It is to be feared that that duc will never get that money.

—Dr. T. M. COAN, whose contributions to Harper's Magazine and various other periodicals, as well as to the leading daily papers of New York, have been received with favor, is announced by the Independent as having been installed in charge of the literary department of that paper. Dr. COAN has a special aptitude for the duties of his new position, and will prove a valuable accession to the staff of our contemporary.

—The late Mr. HALL, father of the Rev. NEWMAN HALL, is the author of a little work entitled "The Sinner's Friend," of which 1,850,000 copies have been printed. It has been republished in this country, and translated into twenty-nine foreign languages.

—There was good Mr. and Mrs. CALLENDER, of Delaware; they were quite sure the end of the world was at hand. What did they do but sew themselves up in white garments and mount the wood-shed to await the trump-blowing of GABRIEL. Before the ascension took place, however, Mrs. C. began a rapid descent, and "slode" from the shed to the ground, followed by the husband. As soon as they get over the contusions they will, like Mrs. Chick, make another effort.

—In the Louisville Courier-Journal we find the following pleasant notice of a Southern lady, who may fairly be called a heroine: "General GORDON, of Georgia, and his wife are at the Galt House. General GORDON rose rapidly and high in Confederate confidence, but his wife is as remarkable in military annals as many a heroine of olden story. She, with her two boys, in a barouche, followed the army of her husband, and she was never a hinderance or an embarrassment to his movements. At Winchester, in the valley of Virginia, when, for the first time, his troops fell back before vastly superior numbers, she, who was supposed by her husband to be many miles in the rear, happened to be in the town, and saw the critical condition of the Confederate cause. She descended from the carriage, and amidst the rush of the retreating men, the bursting of shells, and the whiz of bullets, seized hold of the very person of soldiers and turned them back to the fight. Her resolution, coolness, and heroic spirit rallied hundreds and returned them to her husband in the front. The incident was known all over Virginia at the time and in the army."

—The life of the ex-Emperor of France at Chiselhurst is thus described by one who has the privilege of knowing the social doings there: "During the forenoon all is silent in the mansion. The Empress, after prayers, breakfasts with the Prince Imperial, who then walks out in the park for a short time, the rule of resuming his studies in the morning being broken through during the indisposition of the Emperor, to whom the society of his son is the chief solace of his exile. The Prince remains with his father during the whole process of the toilette, then assists at his late breakfast, which, contrary to the custom of the Tuileries, is taken alone. The boy has cheered and soothed the bodily pain and mental agony of the Emperor, who is sometimes seen to smile as the former recounts his experiences of England and the English, and offers judgment according to his lights concerning the habits of French boys as compared with those of England. When the Emperor leaves his own apartment the Prince Imperial repairs to his studies. But his Majesty declares that already the glory of the day is over, although he feels the necessity of the separation for a while. The morning's report of the state of Paris is still furnished by Pietri, but is never once alluded to. What has struck the friends of the imperial family most of all is the comparative solitude in which each of its members seeks to live. There is something touching in the solitary walk taken by the Emperor up and down the avenue, leaning on his cane, and stopping every now and then to remove the pebbles from his path, according to the habit of all men engaged in deep thought. His Majesty has grown much fatter since his arrival at Chiselhurst. But he walks with far more ease than on his first arrival in England, and now only requires the arm of a friend to help him up the steps of the hall door of the mansion."

—The sentiment that inspired the excellent Dr. ISAAC WATTS to write that beautiful hymn commencing,

"Life is a shad-oh! how it flies!"

has also animated the excellent SETH GREEN (or SHADRACH GREEN) to devote himself to transwatering little shads to an unaccountable extent. In fact, he has done nothing but water the stock of the Shad Co. these four years. In 1867 he put a few millions of juvenile shad into the Connecticut River at Holyoke, and last year the catch was larger than at any season for twenty years past. Mr. GREEN has just gone to California to stock the Sacramento River with young shad, having recently done the same thing for the waters of Virginia. Well may he exclaim,

"What shadroes we are, and what shadroes we pursue!"

—The degree of indigency to which some of the prelates of the Established Church of England and Ireland have been reduced should excite the deepest sympathy. There is poor Dr. TRENCH, for instance, who was made Archbishop of Dublin in 1864; he declares that the annual income of his bishopric has been a paltry $55,000, and claims from the Church Commissioners, as his commutation-money, $550,000.

Ironing Bag.

THIS bag is intended to hold the various utensils used in ironing, such as wax, starch, fluting-irons, etc. It is made of gray carriage leather, bound with brown carriage leather, and ornamented with brown scalloped braid. For the back of the bag cut a four-cornered piece of pasteboard twelve inches and a half wide and thirteen inches and three-quarters high, and round off the upper edge of this piece as shown by the illustration. Cover both sides of the pasteboard smoothly with carriage leather, and join this piece with a pocket by means of a soufflet. The pocket is made of card-board and carriage leather, eight inches high, and corresponding in width to the back of the bag. Two bands of carriage leather of the requisite length, and an inch and one-quarter wide, and furnished with a binding, are sewed on the front side of this pocket; these bands are intended to hold fluting-irons (see illustration). Join the upper edge of this pocket by means of a binding with a piece of carriage leather ten inches and a half long and twelve inches and a half wide, which is rounded off at the bottom as shown by the illustration, and furnished with two small pockets; then fasten the flap, which is cut out in two scallops at the under edge and furnished with a binding, to the back of the bag as shown by the illustration. In order to cover the stitches of the bindings, sew on brown serpentine braid along the inner edge of the binding, as shown by the illustration. Fasten this braid by means of cross stitches with brown zephyr worsted, at the same time surrounding the stitches that fasten the binding. To hang up the bag, make a circular hole at the middle of the top, and sew in a brass ring with brown worsted.

CROCHET COVER FOR BOILED EGGS, POTATOES, ETC.

Crochet Cover for Boiled Eggs, Potatoes, etc.

THIS cover, which is designed to keep eggs and vegetables warm when served, is worked in single crochet with fine white knitting cotton, ornamented with embroidery in twisted stitch and diagonal half-polka stitch, and edged with lace and small tassels. The under side of the cover is furnished with a crochet lining of white cotton, corresponding to the shape of the cover. Begin the cover at the middle with a foundation of 6 st. (stitch), close these in a ring with one slip stitch, and then work the 1st round.—2 sc. (single crochet) on each foundation st. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the first st., 2 sc. on the following st. of the preceding round; in working the sc. always pass the needle through the two upper veins of each st. 3d round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round; always 2 st., however, on the second of every 2 st. worked on 1 st. Work the 4th–64th rounds like the 3d round. 65th round.—Always alternately 2 sc. on the next 2 st., one scallop of five picots (each picot consists of five chain stitches and 1 sc. on the first of the five chain stitches), passing over 6 st. of the preceding round with the picot scallop; at the corners formed by the widening work always 3 sc. instead of each 2 sc. Sew a small white cotton tassel to the middle picot of each picot scallop (see illustration). The cover is now ornamented in twisted stitch and diagonal half-polka stitch with white knitting cotton, as shown by the illustration. The lining for the cover is worked in a similar manner in single crochet, always going forward, also widening six times by 1 st. in each round, just as in working the cover; in working the single crochet, however, the needle is passed through one upper vein only of each st. of the preceding round instead of through the two upper veins. When the lining is as large as the cover, sew it on the under side of the latter.

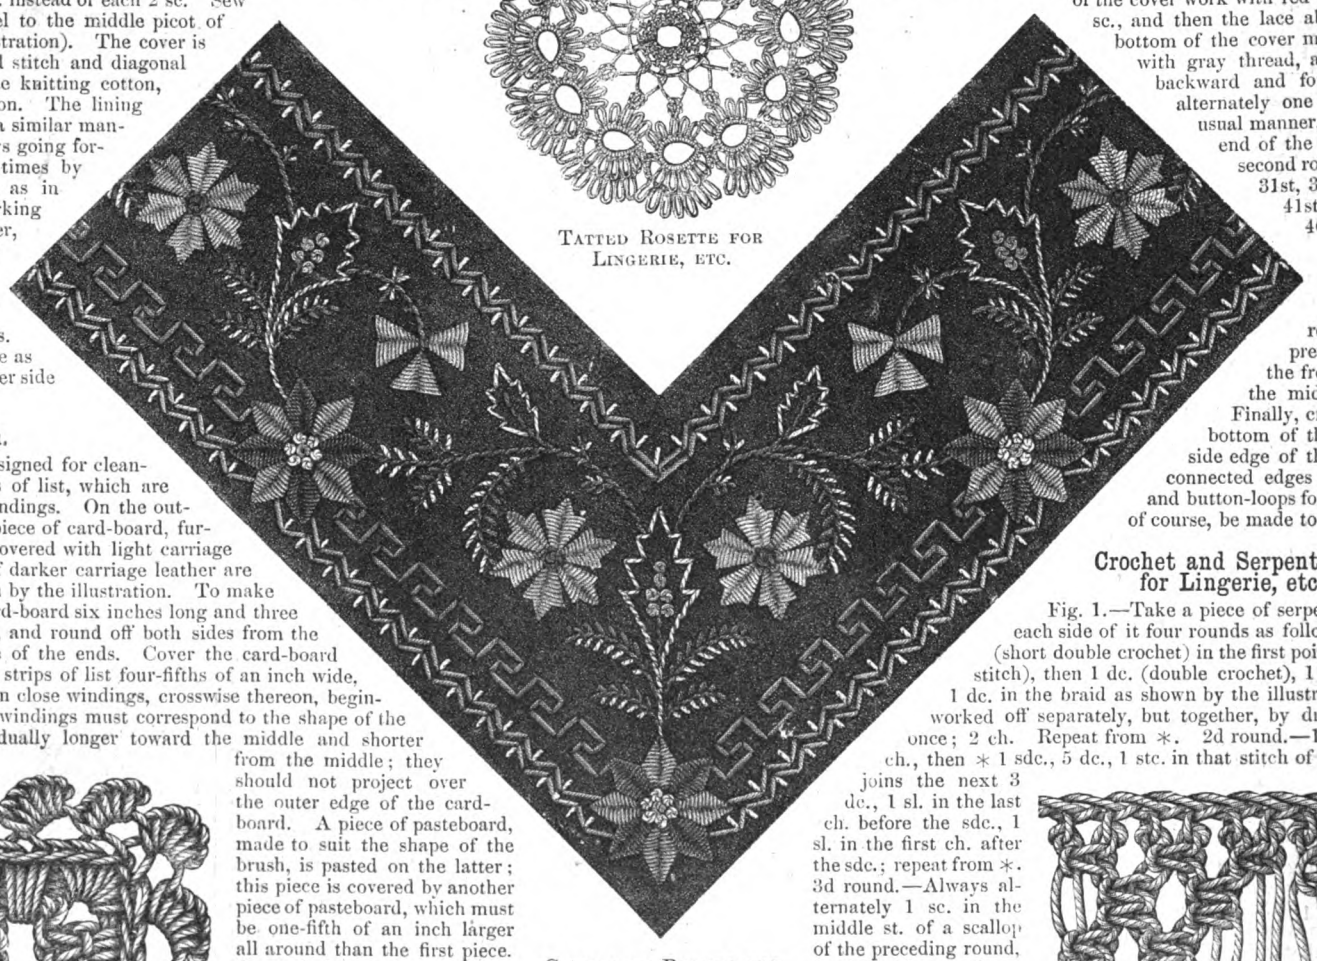
Silk Brush.

THIS brush, which is designed for cleaning silk, is made of strips of list, which are sewed together in close windings. On the outside of the brush is set a piece of card-board, furnished with an edge and covered with light carriage leather, on which pieces of darker carriage leather are pasted in the design shown by the illustration. To make the brush, cut a piece of card-board six inches long and three inches and a quarter wide, and round off both sides from the middle toward the middle of the ends. Cover the card-board with gray muslin, and sew strips of list four-fifths of an inch wide, which are folded together in close windings, crosswise thereon, beginning at one point. These windings must correspond to the shape of the card-board, becoming gradually longer toward the middle and shorter from the middle; they should not project over the outer edge of the card-board. A piece of pasteboard, made to suit the shape of the brush, is pasted on the latter; this piece is covered by another piece of pasteboard, which must be one-fifth of an inch larger all around than the first piece. Cover the larger piece with gray muslin, then paste a piece of light brown carriage leather on the upper surface of the larger piece of pasteboard, and button-hole stitch the two together around the edge with brown silk. Join the outer edge of this part with a pasteboard edge two-fifths of an inch high, covered with light carriage leather, and edge it all around with brown silk cord. On the edge and on the upper surface of the brush paste separate figures, made of dark brown carriage leather in the design shown by the illustration, and cover the joining seam between the top and the edge with brown silk cord.



CORNER OF BORDER FOR CUSHIONS, COVERS, ETC. COLORED EMBROIDERY.

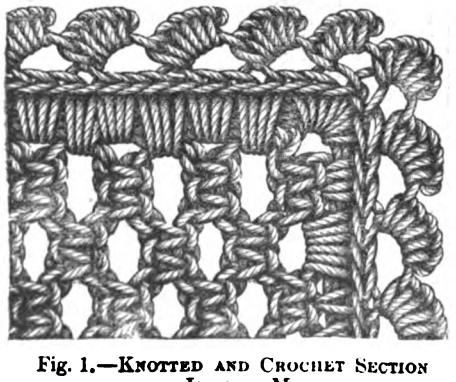


Fig. 1.—KNOTTED AND CROCHET SECTION OF IRONING MAT.

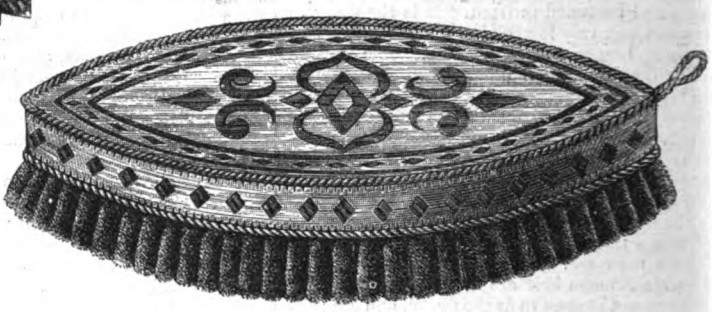
Crochet Cover for Flat-Iron.

THIS cover is worked with gray twisted thread and red (Turkish) cotton of the same size, in single crochet in ribbed crochet stitch. Work the top, bottom, and back piece each separately, and crochet or sew them together. For the top, which is begun at the front point, work with gray thread a foundation of 31 st. (stitches), and on this work, going backward and forward, two rounds in ribbed crochet, widening 2 st., however, in the middle of the second round, working 3 st. on the middle st. of the preceding round. At the end of the second round work 1 ch. (chain stitch), lay on the red thread, and with this work two rounds in ribbed crochet; widen 2 st. at the middle of the second red round. Work a gray rib, then thirteen times more alternately one red, one gray rib; widen 2 st. as before in the second round of each rib. Now work on the first, then also on the last 39 st. of the last round, one red rib each and five times alternately one gray, one red rib, not changing the number of stitches. Lay on the gray thread and work first on the 39 st. of the last rib one round in the usual manner, then, going forward, 7 ch. and one round on the 39 st. of the last rib of the part previously crocheted, so that both parts are now joined by the ch. On this whole row of stitches work one more gray round, then four times alternately one red, one gray rib. Work the back part of the cover on the st. of the last round, always passing the needle through the back vein of the two upper veins of each st., as follows: Work with red cotton first one round on the thirteen middle st. of the round referred to, 1 ch., turn the work and work 1 sc. on each sc. of the preceding round, 3 sc. on the following 3 st. Then lay on the gray thread, work 1 ch., and, going backward on the row of stitches, 1 sc. on each sc. of the preceding round, 3 sc. on the following 3 st. Now follows 1 ch., turn the work, 1 sc. on each sc. of the preceding round, 3 sc. on the following 3 st. In this manner work six times more alternately one red, one gray rib; then follows one more red rib and one round of gray thread. At the end of the fifth round (the first round of the second gray rib) work 3 st. on the next 3 st. as usual; at the end of the 6th and 7th rounds, 2 st. each; of the 8th and 9th rounds, 3 st. each; of the 10th and 11th rounds, 2 st. each; of the 12th and 13th rounds, 3 st. each; of the 14th and 15th rounds, 2 st. each; of the 16th and 17th rounds, 3 st. each; of the 18th–31st rounds, 2 st. each. On the front vein of the st. of the last round of the upper part of the cover work the following edging with red cotton: 1st round of lace.—Always alternately 2 dc. (double crochet) divided by 3 ch. on the next st. of the round referred to, 1 ch.; with this pass over 2 st. 2d round.—* 5 dc. on the 3 ch. between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 1 sc. on the next 1 ch. between 2 dc. Repeat from *. On the opening at the top of the cover work with red cotton, first, one round of sc., and then the lace above referred to. For the bottom of the cover make a foundation of 40 st. with gray thread, and on this crochet, going backward and forward, twenty-three times alternately one gray, one red rib in the usual manner, but widen 1 st. each at the end of the first and at the end of the second rounds of the 7th, 10th, 25th, 31st, 34th, 37th, 38th, 39th, 40th, 41st, 42d, 43d, 44th, 45th, and 46th ribs. Now crochet around the bottom, excepting the foundation st., also along the under edge of the top, one round of sc. with gray thread; previous to this, however, fold the front point of the top through the middle, and sew it together. Finally, crochet one side edge of the bottom of the cover together with one side edge of the top, and furnish the unconnected edges of the cover with buttons and button-loops for closing. The cover must, of course, be made to suit the shape of the iron.



SILK BRUSH.

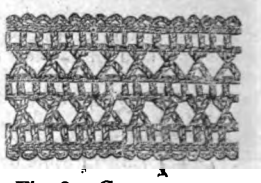


Fig. 2.—CROCHET AND SERPENTINE BRAID INSERTION.

Crochet and Serpentine Braid Insertion for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—Take a piece of serpentine braid and crochet on each side of it four rounds as follows: 1st round.—* 1 sdc. (short double crochet) in the first point of the braid, 2 ch. (chain stitch), then 1 dc. (double crochet), 1 stc. (short treble crochet), 1 dc. in the braid as shown by the illustration; these 3 dc. are not worked off separately, but together, by drawing the thread through once; 2 ch. Repeat from *. 2d round.—1 sl. (slip stitch) in the first ch., then * 1 sdc., 5 dc., 1 stc. in that stitch of the preceding round which joins the next 3 dc., 1 sl. in the last ch. before the sdc., 1 sl. in the first ch. after the sdc.; repeat from *. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. in the middle st. of a scallop of the preceding round, 5 ch. 4th round.—1 sc. on every st.

Fig. 2.—Make a foundation of ch.; on this work one round of open-work dc., on each side of this work six rounds in the manner shown by the illustration. The veins of each cdc. (cross double crochet) are divided by 2 ch. and 2 st. After each round of dc. work a round of sl.

Tatted Rosette.

See illustration on page 484.

WORK with tatting cotton, No. 80, beginning at the outer edge of the rosette, which is worked with two threads (shuttles). Tie both threads together, and work with one thread only * one ring of 3 ds. (double stitch; that is, one stitch right, one stitch left), 1 p. (picot), four times alternately 2 ds., 1 p.; 3 ds., 1 short p., 3 ds., four times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then again 1 p., 3 ds. Close the row of stitches in a ring. In close connection with this ring work on the foundation thread one scallop of 4 ds., 1 p., six times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 4 ds.; fasten the thread to the short p. of the ring first worked, and repeat from * eleven times more. In working the last ring, instead of forming the short p., fasten to the first ring, where its row of stitches is closed. After finishing the last scallop, fasten the threads and cut them off. Now work the rings in between the rosette with one thread as follows: * 3 ds., fasten to the middle p. of the half which is turned to the inside of the next ring, 3 ds.; after a thread interval of three-fifths of an inch, repeat from *, always going forward. The beginning and end of the thread are fastened and cut off. Twist the joining threads of the small rings as shown by the illustration, and pass thread through them. Finally, work the lace stitches at the middle of the rosette, as shown by the illustration.

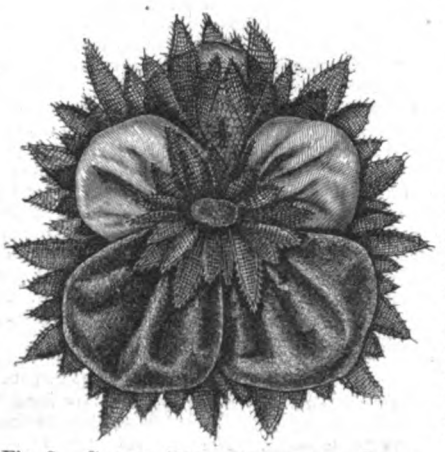

Fig. 3.—CRAVAT BOW SIMULATING A PANSY.

Corner of Border for Cushions, Covers, etc.

See illustration on page 484.

THIS border is not only suitable for the above-named purposes, but also for ornamenting articles of dress, such as jackets, talmas, etc. For the foundation take cloth, satin, silk, or velvet, and embroider with saddler's silk in colors which correspond or contrast with the colors of the foundation.

Cravats and Bows for the Hair, Figs. 1-13.

Fig. 1.—SWISS MUSLIN AND VALENCIENNES CRAVAT BOW. This bow is made of Swiss muslin, trimmed with Valenciennes lace two inches and a half wide, a half rosette of narrower Valenciennes lace, and an embroidery figure. Arrange the bow as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 11.—GROS GRAIN RIBBON BOW FOR THE HAIR IN TWO SHADES.

Fig. 2.—SWISS MUSLIN AND SATIN CRAVAT BOW. This bow is made of Swiss muslin, violet satin, and violet velvet ribbon; it is trimmed with white lace three-quarters of an inch wide. The Swiss muslin ends are made of two side-pleated Swiss muslin strips edged with lace, each three inches wide and nine inches and three-quarters long. The satin strips are nine inches and one-quarter long and two inches and three-quarters wide each; they are sloped off at one end to a width of an inch and a quarter, and are edged with lace on the other end and laid in fan pleats. The seam made by sewing these pieces, as well as the velvet ribbon loops, on the stiff lace foundation, is covered by a knot of Swiss muslin and lace.

Fig. 3.—CRAVAT BOW SIMULATING A PANSY. This cravat bow is made of violet velvet, violet satin, and black lace. The darker leaves are of violet velvet; they are each three inches long and three inches and three-quarters wide, and are laid in a fold at the upper edge, and pleated closely at the bottom. The lighter (satin) leaves are made in a similar manner; they must, however, be somewhat smaller than the velvet leaves. To the middle of the bow fasten a button covered with violet velvet and surrounded with lace. A row of wider lace is set all around the bow on the under side.

Fig. 4.—CRÊPE DE CHINE CRAVAT BOW. This cravat bow is made of pink crêpe de Chine, and is trimmed with white lace an inch wide.

Fig. 5.—SILK RIBBON CRAVAT BOW. This bow of pink silk ribbon an inch and a half wide is trimmed with white lace an inch and three-quarters wide and embroidery figures. For the bow cut two straight pieces of stiff lace each four inches and a quarter long and two inches and a quarter wide. These pieces are rounded off from the middle at the bottom toward the upper edge, so that they are only an inch and three-quarters wide at the latter; the outer edge, excepting the top, is bordered with lace. On these pieces sew the side-pleated silk ribbon, loops and ends, and embroidery figures, as shown by the illustration.

Ironing Mat, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 484.

THIS mat, which is designed for rubbing flat-irons, is made in knot-work with gray twisted twine. The original is six inches wide and twelve inches long; the mat may, however, be worked larger or smaller, according to the size of the iron. Crochet with gray twine a foundation as long as the width of the cover is desired, pin this foundation to a sewing-weight, and tie a piece of twine 80 inches long on each foundation stitch, so that the ends project equally from the stitch (see Fig. 2, which shows how to make the knot-work). Knot each four ends of twine together as shown by the illustration. This is most readily done by laying the ends flatly side by side, lay the left outer end to the right, so that it rests on the two middle ends (the latter form the foundation), and forms a loop at the left side. Pass the right outer end in a vertical direction over the left end of twine, which projects at the right of the foundation, then below the foundation through the loop at the left side; now draw both ends of the cord tight, and then work a similar knot, but now lay the right outer piece of twine to the left over the foundation, then finish the knot in the manner already described. Two such knots form a double knot. After working this double knot, work a second double knot in a similar manner. Then divide each four ends into twos, and then again work two double knots with each two ends of one knot strand and each two ends of the next strand; the ends previously used for the foundation are now used in working the knots, and the other two ends serve for a foundation. In this manner work alternate double knots, observing illustration, Fig. 2, until the mat is of the requisite length. Then work with twine one round of single crochet all around the mat, at the same time finishing off the projecting ends of twine. Finally, work a row of picots with twine at the outer edge of the mat. Each picot consists of a larger button-hole stitch on which five small button-hole stitches are worked in close succession (see illustration).

bows are made of blue crêpe de Chine, and Valenciennes lace an inch and a quarter wide. For the larger leaf of the cravat bow, which rests on the lace, cut a bias strip of crêpe de Chine five inches and a quarter wide and eleven inches and a quarter long; double it through the middle, slope the open side toward the ends to a width of an inch and a quarter, and lay it in fan pleats, letting the pleats face each other at the middle. The upper leaves are arranged similarly, as shown by the illustration. These leaves are set on a stiff lace foundation, on which the ends, made as shown by the illustration, and a piece of tulle edged with lace an inch and a quarter wide, have first been sewn. The hair bow is arranged in a similar manner, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 8.—GROS GRAIN RIBBON AND LACE CRAVAT BOW. This cravat bow, of maroon gros grain ribbon and white Valenciennes lace two inches wide, is arranged on a stiff lace foundation as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 9.—CRAVAT BOW SIMULATING A ROSE. This rose is made of pink organdy in two shades; the leaves and stems are worked in button-hole and half-polka stitch with fine embroidery cotton on a double layer of tulle lined with Swiss muslin. Set the rose on a stiff lace foundation an inch and three-quarters in diameter. The leaves in the middle are of the darker material.

Figs. 10 and 11.—CRAVAT AND HAIR BOWS OF GROS GRAIN RIBBON IN TWO SHADES. These bows are made of gros grain ribbon in two shades of brown. The illustrations plainly show the shades and the arrangement of the bows. The lighter colored loops are all pleated fan-shape.

Fig. 12.—CRÊPE DE CHINE AND VALENCIENNES CRAVAT BOW. This bow is made of purple crêpe de Chine trimmed with Valenciennes lace two inches and a half wide. For the bow cut a bias piece of crêpe de Chine eight inches wide and twelve inches long, cut out a piece four inches deep at the under end, so that two points are formed, edge the sides and the under pointed end with lace, and finally gather the sides and the middle closely, so that two puffs are formed, as shown by the illustration. Sew these puffs on a stiff lace foundation.

Fig. 13.—SATIN RIBBON AND SILK CRAVAT BOW. This bow is made of pink satin ribbon and silk of the same color. To make the bow cut two bias strips of pink silk each four inches wide and seventeen inches and three-quarters long. Double each of these strips through the middle, and arrange them in fan-shaped pleats, as shown by the illustration, so that the box-pleat formed at the middle of each piece is the shortest, and the remaining pleats are graduated in length. Finally, fasten the pieces thus pleated, as well as the loops and ends of satin ribbon, on a stiff lace foundation, and cover the seam with a knot of satin ribbon.

PEARLS OF THE OCEAN.

PEARLS of the ocean, the dark or the fair,
Choose as you wish, they are each of them there:
With tresses of jet, or with tresses of gold;
With shyest of eyes, or with saucy and bold.

Pearls of the ocean, fresh from the sea,
Brilliant with merriment, sparkling with glee;
Ah! who is the jeweler fated to fit
Such pearls in a mounting—gold ring to wit?

Pearl of the ocean, soft, fair, and bright;
Pearl of the ocean, dark as the night:
You each have admirers, either is prized,
The fair fondly loved, the dark idolized.

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER XII.

As we walk along, staggering under some heavy burden, or bleeding with some unseen wound, how often do the small perplexities of life catch at us unawares, like briers, and vex us sore. Hannah, as she felt herself borne fast away from Easterham, conscious of a sense half of relief and half of bitter loss, was conscious, too, of a ridiculously small thing which had not occurred to her till now, and which she would never have cared for on her own account, but she did on Bernard's. This was, How would Lady Dunsmore manage to receive back in her household, as an equal and familiar friend, her ci-devant governess? Not that Miss Thelluson had ever been treated in the way governesses are said to be treated, though it is usually their own fault; but she had, of course, taken her position, both with guests and servants, simply as the governess, and never sought to alter it. But this position Rosie's aunt and Mr. Rivers's sister-in-law could no longer suitably hold. As the cab drove up to the old family mansion in Mayfair which she knew so well, Hannah felt a sense of uncomfortableness for which she was almost angry with herself.

But it was needless. Lady Dunsmore had that true nobility which, discovering the same in others, recognizes it at once, and acts accordingly. The slight difficulty which an inferior woman might have bungled over, she, with her gracious, graceful frankness, solved at once.

"You will establish Miss Thelluson and her niece in the blue rooms," said she to the housekeeper, who, seeing who the arrival was, came forward with a pleased but patronizing air. "And see that every thing is made comfortable for the child and nurse, and that my friend here shall feel as much at home as if she were in her own house."

"Certainly, my lady." And the wise old woman slipped quietly behind her back the hand she was extending to Miss Thelluson, till Miss Thelluson took and shook it cordially, then, courtesying, Mrs. Rhodes followed her respectfully to the blue rooms, which, as every body knew, being in communication with the countess's, were never assigned but to her favorite guests.

Thus, domestically, the critical point was settled at once. Socially, too, with equal decision.

"My friend, Miss Thelluson," said Lady Dunsmore, introducing her at once to two ladies, aunts of Lord Dunsmore, who were in the drawing-room, and whom Hannah knew well enough, as they her, by sight. "We are so glad to have her back among us, with her little niece. She will be such a welcome visitor, and my little girls will perfectly spoil the child, if only for her sake: they were so fond of Miss Thelluson."

And when, to prove this, Lady Blanche and Lady Mary came in leading little Rosie between them, and clung lovingly round their old governess's neck, Hannah felt perfectly happy—ay, even though Bernard was far away; and the remembrance of him striding forlornly to his deserted home, came across her like a painful, reproachful vision. And yet it was not unnatural. The transition from perplexity to peace, from suspicion to tender respect, from indifference or coldness to warm, welcoming love, was very sweet. Not until the strain was taken off her did Hannah feel how terrible it had been.

When Lady Dunsmore, as if to prove decisively the future relation in which they were to stand, came into her room before dinner, and sitting down in her white dressing-gown before the hearth—where aunt and niece were arranging together a beautiful Noah's ark—put her hand on Miss Thelluson's shoulder, saying, "My dear, I hope you will make yourself quite happy with us," Hannah very nearly broke down.

The countess stooped and began caressing the child, making solemn inquiries of her as to Noah and Mrs. Noah, their sons and sons' wives, and arranging them in a dignified procession across the rug.

"What a happy-looking little woman she is—this Rosie! And I hope her auntie is happy too? As happy as she expected to be?"

Hannah's self-control was sorely tested. This year past she had lived in an atmosphere of mingled bliss and torment, of passionate love and equally passionate coldness; been exposed to alternations of calm civility and rudeness almost approaching unkindness; but it was long since any one—any woman—had spoken to her in that frank, affectionate tone. She felt that Lady Dunsmore understood her; and when two good women once do this they have a key to one another's hearts such as no man, be he ever so dear, can quite get hold of.

As Hannah laid her cheek against the pretty soft hand—none the less soft that its grasp was firm, and none the less pretty that it sparkled with diamonds—the tears came stealing down, and with them was near stealing out that secret which all the taunts in the world would never have forced from her.

But it must not be. It would compromise not herself alone. She knew well—she had long made up her mind to the fact—that unless Bernard and she could be legally married, the relations between them must be kept strictly between their two selves. The world might guess as it chose, accuse as it chose, but not one confirmatory word must it get out of either of them. Out of her, certainly, it never should.

Therefore she looked steadily up into her friend's face. "Yes; my little girl makes me very happy. You were right in once saying that a woman is only half a woman till she has a child. Of her own, you meant; but it is true even if not her own. I have found it to be so. I have almost forgotten I am not Rosie's mother."

And then, aware of a keen inquisitiveness in Lady Dunsmore's look, Hannah blushed violently.

The countess dropped down again beside Noah's ark, and occupied herself, to Rosie's intense delight, in making a bridge over which all the animals could pass out, till the child and her new playfellow became the best of friends.

"Rosie is not much like her father, I think; and yet she has a look of him—his bright, merry look, such as he had before his trouble came. Is he getting over it at all? It is now a good while since your poor sister died."

"Rosie's age tells it—nearly three years."

"That is a long time for a man to mourn nowadays. But"—checking herself—"I always thought Mr. Rivers very faithful-hearted, constant in his friendships, and, therefore, in his loves; and knowing how forlorn a man is who has once been married, I, for one, should never blame him if he made a second choice."

Hannah was silent; then seeing Lady Dunsmore paused for some acquiescence, she gave it in one or two meaningless words.

"And meantime, I conclude, you remain at Easterham. Your brother-in-law evidently appreciates your society, and the blessing you are to his little girl. He said as much to me. He told me he did not know what Rosie would have done without you, and that you and she are never to be parted. Is it so?"

"He has promised me that I shall have her always."

"Even in case of his second marriage? But I beg your pardon; I really have no right to be curious about Mr. Rivers's domestic arrangements—I know him too slightly; but yet I can not help taking an interest in him, for his own sake as well as for yours."

She pressed the hand she held, but asked no further questions—made no attempt whatever to find out what Hannah did not choose to tell. That noble confidence which exists among women oftener than they are given credit for—when each knows quite well the other's secret, but never betrays either to her friend or a stranger the silent, mutual trust—was henceforward established between the two. The moment Lady Dunsmore had closed the door, after talking a good while of Dunsmore topics, of her daughters, her husband, and a journey she wanted to take, only was hindered by Lord Dunsmore's determination to wait and vote for a bill that he greatly desired to see pass the House of Lords—"the Bill concerning deceased wives' sisters, in which you know he was always so interested"—Hannah felt certain that this sharp-witted little lady guessed her whole position as well as if she had told it. Also that she would keep the discovery herself, and aid in defending it from the outside world, as sacredly as if she had been pledged to inviolable secrecy, and bound by the honor of all the Dacres and Dunsmores.

With a sense of self-respect and self-contentedness greater than she had known for some time, Hannah dressed for dinner. Carefully, too; for Bernard's sake; since if the Countess guessed any thing, she would have liked her to feel that it was not so unnatural, Bernard's loving her. On his account she was glad to be held an honored guest—glad to be met cordially, and talked to with courteous attention at dinner-time by a man like the Earl of Dunsmore, who, though rumor said his wife had made him all that he was—had roused him from the dolce far niente life of an idle young nobleman into a hard-working man—was a person who in any rank of life would have been useful and esteemed. And he spoke of Bernard, whom he said he had met several times when in London, with warm regard.

This was sweet to her; and equally sweet was the unconscious contrast of coming back to her old haunts under new conditions and circumstances. Often, during some pause of silence, she secretly counted up her blessings—how rich she was, who had once been so poor. And when, at dessert, there stole in, hand-in-hand with little Lady Isabel, who had grown from a baby into a big girl since Miss Thelluson left, a certain white fairy in blue ribbons, who, looking round the dazzling room with a pretty bewilderedness, caught sight of one known face, and ran and hid her own lovingly in Tannie's lap, Tannie's heart leaped with joy. The child—her own child!—nothing and nobody could take that treasure from her. She and Bernard might never be married; weary of long waiting, he might give up loving her, and marry some one else; but he was a man of honor—he would always leave her the child.

"Rosie does you the greatest credit," said Lord Dunsmore, smiling at the little woman, and trying to win her—but vainly—from Tannie's arms. "She is a charming child."

Hannah laughed. "Then you will indorse the proverb about old maids' children?" said she.

Was it because he looked at her, or because of her own conscious heart, that one of those horrible sudden blushes came, and with it the sense of hypocrisy—of always bearing about with her a secret, which, sinless as she felt it was, every body might not consider so? For even this night, though the dinner-circle was small, Lord Dunsmore's known advocacy of the Bill caused it to be discussed on all sides, argued pro and con by friends and enemies, in a way that neither host nor hostess could repress without attracting attention. At length, perhaps out of wise kindness, they ceased trying to repress it; and Hannah heard the whole question of whether a man might or might not marry his deceased wife's sister argued out logically and theologically as she had never heard it before, together with all the legal chances for and against the Bill. She could not shut her ears—she dared not: for what to all these others was a mere question of social or political opinion, was to her a matter of life and death. So she sat quiet, keeping, by a strong effort, her countenance as still as a stone, and her voice, when she had to speak, just like that of any other dinner-table guest, who joined placidly, or carelessly, or combatively in the conversation that was going on. It was best so; best to buckle on at once the armor that, in all probability, she would have to wear through life.

Lord Dunsmore seemed hopeful of his cause. He had entered into it, unlike many others, from purely impersonal motives—from a simple sense of right and justice; and he had a strong faith, he said, that the right would conquer at last.

"Not," he added, laughing, "that I want to compel every man to marry his deceased wife's sister, as some people seem to think I do; I am sure I have not the slightest wish ever to marry mine! But I consider all restrictions upon marriage made by neither God nor nature a mistake and a wrong. And any law which creates a false and unnatural position between man and woman is an equal wrong. Let there be no shams. Let a man have his natural mother, sister, wife, but no anomalous relationships, which, pretending to all, are in reality none of the three."

"And," said Lady Dunsmore, mischievously, "such is the nature of man, that when all these pretty pretenses were broken down, and a man must either marry a lady or have nothing to say to her, I believe he would choose the latter course. You are such contradictory creatures, you men, that I suspect as soon as all of you might marry your wives' sisters you would none of you desire to do it! But, come, we ladies have had enough of the Marriages Bill, though every body must put up with it in this house; for when my husband gets a hobby he rides it to death. I ride with him, too, on this one," she added, as, stepping aside to let her matron guests pass into the drawing-room, she quietly, and without any apparent intention, took hold of Miss Thelluson's hand. There was something in the warm, firm clasp so sympathetic that, for very gratitude, Hannah could have wept.

The subject ended with the closing of the dining-room door; no one suspected for a moment that one guest present had a vital interest therein. The ladies gathered round the fire, and the countess, who was as popular and agreeable with her own sex as she was with gentlemen, began talking gayly of other things. And so Hannah's ordeal, from which no one could save her, from which it would have been dangerous to attempt to save her, passed by for the time being.

It was a very happy evening; not exactly a family evening—the public life the Dunsmores led precluded that—but with a great deal of familiness about it; more than Hannah had ever imagined could be, in the days when she sat aloof in her attic parlor, and spent her lonely evenings, empty of love, and feeling that love would never revisit her more. Now when she saw Lord Dunsmore speak caressingly to his wife, and watched one young couple slip away into the inner parlor—Lady Dunsmore had a proverbial faculty of allowing young people to fall in love at her house; not make a marriage, but really fall in love—Hannah remembered, with a strange leap of the heart, that her love-days, too, were to come—not past.

Yes, she had been loved—she was loved—even like these. She had felt once—just once—Bernard's arms close around her, and his kiss upon her mouth; and when, solemnly and tenderly rather than passionately, she thought of this—in the very house and among the very people where she had once been so lonely, yet not unblest or discontented in her loneliness—it seemed as if she could never be lonely any more.

When she quitted the drawing-room—coming out of the glitter and the show, yet not unreal or painful show, for there was heart-warmth beneath it all—and went back into her own room, Hannah was happy too.

For there, from a crib in the corner, came the soft breathing of "auntie's darling," who always slept beside her now. She had taken her during some slight illness of Grace's, and could not again relinquish the fond charge. It gave her such a sense of rest and peace and content—the mere consciousness of little Rosie asleep beside her—it seemed to drive away all the evil angels that sometimes haunted her, the regrets and despondencies over a lot that such a little more would have made quite perfect, and yet that little could not be—regrets all the sharper that they were not altogether for herself. For she had Rosie; and she was secretly, almost contritely, aware that Rosie was almost enough to make her happy. Not so with Bernard. As she sat over her pleasant fire she could have blamed herself for that peace of heart in which he could not share.

He had begged her to write to him regularly, and she had agreed; for she saw no reason why both should not take every comfort that fate allowed them. Yet when she sat down she knew not what to say. How was she to write to him—as her brother, her friend, her betrothed? He was all three, and yet neither; and he might never be any thing else.

She dropped her pen, and fell into deep thought. Putting herself entirely aside, was it right to allow Bernard, a young man in the prime of his days, to bind himself by an uncertain bond, which debarred him from the natural joys of life, and exposed him to the continual torment of hope deferred, which to a woman would be hard enough, but to a man was all but unendurable?

Now that she was away from Easterham—escaped from the nightmare-like influence of the life, half bliss, half torture, which she had led there—she tried to feel in this new place like a new person, and to judge her own position calmly, as if it had been that of some one else. She thought over, deliberately, every word she had heard from Lord Dunsmore and others that night, and tried to count what reasonable chances there were of the only thing which would ever make her Bernard's wife—the passing of the Bill they had talked about. Vain speculation, as hundreds in this land know only too well. The result was, that instead of the letter she had meant to write, she sat down and wrote another: such a one as many a woman has written, too, with bleeding heart and streaming eyes, though the words may have been calm and cold. She implored him for his own sake to consider whether he could not conquer his ill-fated love for herself, and find among the many charming girls he was always meeting some one whom he could love and marry, and be happy.

"I only want you to be happy," she wrote. "I shall never blame you—never tell any human being you once cared for me. And you will think of me tenderly still—as you do of my sister Rosa. And you will leave me Rosa's child?"

Then she planned, in her clear, common-sense way, how this was to be managed; how he was to pay her a yearly sum—she would refuse nothing—for the maintenance of her niece, whom she would herself educate, perhaps abroad, which would make an ostensible reason for the separation.

"She will comfort me for all I lose, more than you think. She will be a bit of her mother and of you always beside me; and your letting me take care of her will be almost equivalent to your taking care of me, as you wanted to do, but my hard fate would not allow it."

And then all she was resigning rushed back upon Hannah's mind—the sweetness of being loved, the tenfold sweetness of loving.

"Oh, my Bernard, my Bernard!" she sobbed, and thought if she could once again, for only one minute, have her arms round his neck, and her head on his shoulder, the giving him up would be less hard. And she wondered how she could have been so thoughtlessly happy an hour ago, when things were in exactly the same position as now, only she saw them in a different light. Hers was one of those bitter destinies, in which the aspect of circumstances, often even of duties, changed every hour.

Still re-reading her letter, she felt it must go, just as it was. It was right he should know her exact mind, and be set free to act as was best for himself. She finished and sealed it; but she wept over it very much—so much that her child heard her.

A little white ghost with rosy cheeks peeped over the crib side, and stared, half-frightened, round the unfamiliar room.

"Rosie wake up! Tannie tying! Then Rosie ty too." Then came a little wail—"Tannie take her, in Tannie own arms!"

No resisting that. All love-anguish, love-yearning, fled far away; and Hannah half forgot Bernard in her innocent passion for Bernard's child.

The letter went, but it brought no answer back. At first Hannah scarcely expected one. He would naturally take time to consider his decision, and she had put it to him as an absolute decision, proposing that, after this event, neither she nor Rosie should go back to Easterham. If he was to be free, the sooner he was free the better. Suspense was sore, as she knew.

A letter of his had crossed hers, written at the very hour she wrote, but in oh! such a different tone—a real love-letter, out of the deepest heart of an impulsive man, to whom nothing seems impossible. How hard, how cruel must hers have seemed! Still, she was glad she had written it. More and more the misery of a woman who feels that her love is not a blessing but a misfortune to her lover forced itself upon Hannah's mind. Through all the present pleasantness of her life—her long idle mornings with her darling, her afternoons with Lady Dunsmore, shopping, visiting, or enjoying that charming companionship which was fast growing into the deliberate friendship of middle age, often firmer than that of youth—through all this came the remembrance of Bernard, not as a joy, as at first, but an actual pain.

For his silence continued: nay, seemed to be intentionally maintained. He forwarded her letters in blank envelopes, without a single word. Was he offended? Had she, in her very love, struck him so hard that he could not forgive the blow?

"I hope your brother-in-law is well," Lady Dunsmore would say, courteously looking away while Hannah opened the daily letter, at first with a trembling anxiety, afterward with a stolid patience that expected nothing. "We shall be delighted to see him here. And tell him he ought to come soon, or his little girl will forget him. Three weeks is a long trial of memory at her age."

"Oh, Rosie will not forget papa. And he is busy—very busy in his parish." For Hannah could not bear he should be thought to neglect his child.

Yet how explain that she could not deliver the message, could not write to him or ask him to come? His possible coming was the greatest dread she had. Apart from him she could be stern and prudent; but she knew if he stood before her, with his winning looks and ways—his sisters sometimes declared that from babyhood nobody ever could say no to Bernard—all her wisdom would melt away in utter tenderness.

By-and-by the fear or the hope—it seemed a strange mixture of both—came true. One day, returning from a drive, leaving Lady Dunsmore behind somewhere, she was told there was a gentleman waiting for her.

"Papa! papa! Dat papa's stick!" shrieked Rosie, in an ecstasy, as her sharp young eyes caught sight of it in the hall.

Hannah's heart stood still; but she must go on; the child dragged her. And Rosie, springing into papa's arms, was a shield to her aunt greater than she knew.

Mr. Rivers kissed his little girl fondly. Then, wasting no time in sentiment, the butterfly creature struggled down from him, and offered him a dilapidated toy.

"Rosie's horse broken—papa mend it."

"Papa wishes he could mend it, with a few other broken things!" said Mr. Rivers, bitterly, till, seeing Rosie's pitiful face, he added, "Never mind, my little woman; papa will try. Go with Grace, and I will come and see Rosie presently."

And so he shut the door upon nurse and child, in a way that made Hannah see clearly he was determined to speak with her alone. But his first words were haughty and cold.

"I suppose it is scarcely necessary for me to apologize for coming to see my daughter? I had likewise another errand in London—Adeline is here, consulting a doctor. She has been worse of late."

"I am very sorry."

Then he burst out: "You seem to be sorry for every body in the world—except me! How could you write me that letter? As if my fate were not hard enough before, but you must go and make it harder."

"I wished to lighten it."

"How? By telling me to go and marry some one else? What sort of creature do you think a man must be—more, what sort of creature is he likely to grow to—who loves one woman and marries another? For I love you. You may not be young, or beautiful, or clever. I sometimes wonder what there is about you that makes me love you. I fight against my love with every argument in my power. But there it is, and it will not be beaten down. I will marry you, Hannah, if I can. If not, I will have as much of you—your help, your companionship—as ever I can. When are you coming home?"

"Home?"

"I say it is home: it must be. Where else should you go to? I can not be parted from my daughter. Rosie can not be parted from you. For Rosie's sake, my house must be your home."

"What shall I do?" said Hannah, wringing her hands. "What shall I do?"

She thought she had made her meaning plain enough; but here was the work all to do over again. If she had ever doubted Bernard's loving her, she had no doubt of it now. It was one of those mysterious attractions, quite independent of external charms, and deepened by every influence that daily intimacy can exercise. She fully believed him when he said, as he kept saying over and over again, that if he did not marry her he would never marry any other woman. And was she to bid him go away, and never see her more? This, when their love was no unholy love, when it trenched upon no natural rights, when no living soul could be harmed by it, and many benefited, as well as they themselves?

Hannah could not do it. All her resolutions melted into air, and she let him see that it was so. Anyhow, he saw his power, and used it. With a hungry heart he clasped and kissed her.

"Now we are friends again. I have been hating you for days, but I'll forgive you now. You will not write me any more such letters? We will try not to quarrel again."

"Quarrel! oh, Bernard!" and then she made him let her go, insisting that they must be friends, and only friends, just now.

"Perhaps you are right. I beg your pardon. Only let me hold your hand."

And so they sat together, silent, for ever so long, till both had recovered from their agitation. Hannah made him tell her about Adeline, who was fast declining, nobody quite saw why; but they thought some London doctor might find it out. And Adeline herself was eager to come.

"Chiefly, I think, because you are here. She wants you, she says. She will not have any of her own sisters to nurse her; to Bertha especially she has taken a violent dislike, only we don't mind the fancies of an invalid. I brought Adeline up to town myself. Her husband had some business to attend to; but he comes up with Bertha to-morrow."

"He should have come with his wife to-day;" and then Hannah stopped herself. Of what use was it to open the family eyes to an impossible and therefore imaginary wrong? What good would it do? probably much harm. Yet her heart ached for unfortunate Adeline.

She suggested going at once to see her, for Bernard had left her close at hand, in one of those dreary lodgings which seem chiefly occupied by invalids, the most of London fashionable physicians living in streets hard by. Their patients come to be near them, settling down for a few weeks in these sad rooms to recover or to die, as fate might choose.

"Yes, do let me go," repeated Hannah. "Shall I fetch Rosie to play with papa while I leave a message for Lady Dunsmore?"

When she came back with the child in her arms Bernard told her she looked quite her old self again. So did he. And she was glad to throw the shield of their former peaceful, simple life over the strong passion that she perceived in him, and felt more and more in herself—the smothered, silent tragedy which might imbitter all their coming days.

And yet when she found herself walking with him in the safe loneliness of Regent Street crowds, Hannah was not unhappy. Her long want of him had made him terribly dear. He, too, appeared to snatch at the present moment with a wild avidity.

"Only to be together—together," said he, as he drew her arm through his and kept it there. And the love thus cruelly suppressed seemed to both a thing compared to which all young people's love—young people who can woo and marry like the rest of the world—was pale and colorless. Theirs resistance had but strengthened, because it was only a struggle against circumstance: unmingled with any conscience stings, like as of those who fight against some sinful passion. But their passion, though legally forbidden, was morally pure and free from blame.

So they walked on together; content, accepting the joy of the hour, making gay remarks, and peeping into shop windows, in a childish sort of way, till they reached the gloomy house where Bernard's sister lay. Then they forgot themselves and thought only of her.

Adeline was greatly changed. Never very pretty, now she was actually plain. There was a sickly ghastliness about her, a nervous, fretful look, which might be either mental or physical—probably was a combination of both. Not a pleasant wife for a man to come home to; and young Mr. Melville, who was a mere ordinary country squire, without any tastes beyond hunting, shooting, and fishing, was a little to be pitied too. Still men must take their wives, as women their husbands, for better for worse.

"I am very ill, you see, Miss Thelluson," said the invalid, stretching out a weary hand. "It was very kind of Bernard to take all this trouble to bring me up to a London doctor, but I don't think it will do any good."

Hannah uttered some meaningless hope, but faintly, for she saw death in the girl's face. She was only a girl still, and yet in some ways it was the face of an old woman. The smothered pangs of half a lifetime seemed written there.

"I bring good news," said Bernard, cheerfully. "I found a letter in the hall saying that Herbert will be here to-morrow, possibly even to-night."

Adeline looked up eagerly.

"To-night! And any body with him?"

"Bertha, I believe. Her mother insisted she should come."

A miserable fire flashed in the poor sunken eyes.

"She shall not come! I will not have her! I want no sisters; my maid is nurse enough. Besides, it is all a sham, a wretched sham. Bertha has no notion of nursing any body!"

"I think you are mistaken, dear," said Bernard, soothingly. "Hannah, what do you say? Ought not her sister to be with her?"

Hannah dropped her eyes; and yet she felt the miserable girl was watching her with an eagerness actually painful, as if trying to find out how much she guessed of her dreary secret; which, weak and silly as she was in most things, poor Adeline had evidently kept with a bravery worthy of a better cause.

"I see no use in Bertha's coming," said she again, with a great effort at self-control. "I know her better than Hannah does. She is no companion to an invalid; she hates sickness. She will be always with Herbert, not with me. I heard them planning Rotten Row in the morning and theatres every night. They are strong and healthy and lively, while I—"

The poor young wife burst into tears.

"I will stay beside her," whispered Hannah to Bernard. "Go you away."

After he was gone Adeline burst out hysterically: "Keep her away from me! the sight of her will drive me wild. Keep them all away from me, or I shall betray myself—I know I shall. And then they will all laugh at me, and say it is ridiculous nonsense; as perhaps it is. You see" —clutching Hannah's hand—"she is by law his sister too. He couldn't marry her, not if I were dead twenty times over. Sometimes I wish he could, and then they dared not go on as they do. I could turn her out of the house, like any other strange woman who was stealing my husband's heart from me."

Hannah made no answer; tried to seem as if she did not hear. Incurable griefs are sometimes best let alone; but this of Adeline's, having once burst its bonds, would not be let alone.

"Tell me," she said, grasping Hannah's hand —"you are a good woman; you will tell me true—is it all nonsense my feeling this as I do? How would you feel if you were in my place? And if you were Bertha, would you do as she does? Would you try to make your sister's husband fond of you, as he ought not to be of any woman except his wife, and then say, 'Oh, it's all right, we're brother and sister?' But is it right? Hannah Thelluson, is it right? Suppose your sister had been living, how would it have been between you and Bernard?"

A startling way of putting the question, far more so than the questioner dreamed of. For a moment Hannah winced, and then her strong, clear common-sense, as well as her sense of justice, came to the rescue and righted her at once.

"You might as well ask how would it have been between me and any other woman's husband in whose house I happened to stay. Of course he would have been nothing to me—nothing whatever. I am not married," she added, smiling, "and I can not quite judge of married people's feelings. But I think if I ever loved a man well enough to be his wife, I should not be a jealous wife at all. Sister or friend might come about the house as much as he chose. I could trust him, for I could trust myself. I would be so much to him that he would never care for any body but me. That is, while living. When I was dead"—there Hannah paused, and tried solemnly to put herself in the place of a dead wife —of Bernard's dead wife viewing him tenderly from the celestial sphere—"if the same love for my sister or my friend, which would be his degradation in my lifetime, could be his blessing afterward, let him take it, and be blessed!"

Adeline looked astounded. But the hidden sore had been opened, the cleansing healing touch had been applied. There was a reasonableness in her expression as she replied:

"That is altogether a new notion of love. You might not feel so if you were married, or if you were really fond of any body. Now I was very fond of Herbert, even when I knew he liked Bertha. But when he liked me, and married me—seeing that it made him safe never to marry my sister—I thought I could not possibly be jealous again. No more I am, in one sense. They will never do any thing wrong. But there's a great deal short of doing wrong that breaks a wife's heart; and they have broken mine—they have broken mine."

Again rose up the feeble wail of the weak, affectionate soul, who yet had not the power to win or command affection. From sheer pity Hannah forbore to blame.

"Why not speak to them plainly?" suggested she at last. "Why not tell them they are making you unhappy?"

"And be laughed at for my pains, as a sickly, jealous-minded fool! Because he can't ever marry her—the law forbids that, you know. After I am dead he must choose somebody else, and she too, and nobody will blame them for any thing; and yet they have killed me."

"Hush—hush!" said Hannah; "that is not true, not right. You yourself allowed they meant no harm, and will never do any thing wrong."

"What is wrong?" cried poor Adeline, piteously. "I want my husband—his company, his care, his love; and I don't get him. He turns to somebody else. And I hate that somebody, even if she is my own sister. And I wish I could drive her out of the house—that I do! or shame her openly, as if she were any strange girl who dared come flirting with my husband. They're wicked women all of them, and they break the hearts of us poor wives."

There was a certain bitter truth under Adeline's frenzied fancies; but Hannah had no time to reply to either; for, while they were talking, there was a bustle outside. Gay, blooming, excited with her journey, Bertha Rivers burst in, Mr. Melville following her.

"So I am come, Addy dear, though you did'nt want me. But you'll be glad of me, I know. Why you're looking quite rosy again, isn't she Herbert?"

Rosy she was; for her cheeks burned like coals. But the husband, as he carelessly kissed her, never found it out; and Bertha, in her redundant health and exuberant spirits, never noticed the dead silence of her sister's welcome—the sullen way in which she turned her face to the wall, and left them to their chatter and their mirth.

It was the same all the evening; for Hannah, at Adeline's earnest request, had staid. Mrs. Melville scarcely spoke a word. Their plans were discussed, sometimes including her, sometimes not; but all were talked of freely before her. It never seemed to occur to any one—not even to Bernard—that Adeline was dying. And with that wonderful self-command which perhaps only the conscious approach of death could have given to so weak a nature, Adeline never betrayed, by look or word, the secret jealousy that, at any rate, had helped to sap her frail life away.

"Come and see me every day," she whispered when Miss Thelluson wished her good-by. "I'll try and remember what you said; but please forget every thing I said. Let nobody guess at it. I shall not trouble any of them very long."

Hannah walked home, strangely silent and sad, even though she was beside Bernard; and feeling, as one often is forced to feel, that other people's miseries would perhaps be worse to bear than one's own.

DREAMS.

AS a rule, dreams may be said to be in some sort of way or another the reproductions, caricatured, distorted, jumbled up, of our daily existence, and they may generally be traced to something, however unimportant or much forgotten, of what has been—in fact, that they are merely to our lives what the shadow on the wall is to the candle that burns on the table, and that they have no life or separate existence of their own. But there are dreams in which this is not the case—dreams that take the initiative, and after which the real life follows—dreams that distinctly, as the image in a mirror throws back the thing before it, show to the dreamer things that have not taken place, but are yet to come; and what can equal the surprise of that dreamer when, days or weeks or months afterward, suddenly, as such an event takes place, or such a remark is made, he remembers that he has once before in his life said and done, or seen and heard, all that is now going on—and it was in a dream?

But, naturally, as our dreams are not ticketed "This is a prophecy," or "This is merely a nightmare," we can not be expected to heed them, as in that case we should spend our time, like people who are afraid of beginning any work on Friday, or of sitting down thirteen to dinner, in an agony of fear, displacing all our plans and arrangements according to the bugbears of the night, and trembling for those who, refusing to do likewise, seem to be running into some hideous danger, against which they themselves, or we for them, had been "warned in a dream." Of course, just like presentiments, for one that comes true a thousand do not; so it is with dreams. Of the same nature as the dream prophetic are the dreams that lead to the discovery of lost things, dreamed, not by the person who either lost or placed them where they are found, as that would belong to dreams of memory, but by some third person, who seems in sleep suddenly to have been gifted with second-sight. It is this (almost a miracle, worked for no apparently greater object than the finding of an old shawl or a worthless umbrella, for these inspirations seldom or ever come about things of consequence) which is so unaccountable, and which seems to us poor mortals so objectless; and we ask peevishly why, at some great crisis in our lives, we were not given the power that, wasted on our old clothes, was so valueless, but which, had it been bestowed on us then, would have been so priceless.

USEFUL RECIPES.

BUTTERMILK GRIDDLE CAKES.—These are best made in the spring, when cows have fresh grass, and the buttermilk loses the bitter taste it gets in winter. To have the cakes light and in perfection, the buttermilk must not be strained, but should have the little particles of butter floating in it; but, if bought strained, it is best to cut a small piece of butter, about the size of a walnut, into very small bits, and put it to the milk. To a pint of buttermilk allow a scant half pint of clabbered milk; mix and put into the basin, stirring in flour enough to make a stiff batter; beat well, and until the lumps are all out; then add a tea-spoonful of salt, and a tea-spoonful of soda finely powdered and stirred into a scant gill of flour (the soda must be thoroughly mixed in); beat well into the batter; add enough buttermilk to make it of the consistency of buckwheat cakes. Have the griddle hot, and bake as other griddle cakes.

BUTTER that is made in early spring often has a disagreeable taste of garlic. To remedy this stir in a little vinegar to the cream before churning—about half a tea-cupful to a gallon of cream. This will remove all taste.

MUTTON.—In winter a leg of mutton should be frozen, slices cut off about a quarter of an inch in thickness, and cooked in a chafing-dish with a little butter; they must be turned frequently while cooking. Currant jelly is a great improvement.

ICED PASTRY.—Allow the white of one egg to each pie; beat to a very stiff froth; then, with a feather, spread a little of it over the pie, after baking and cooling; then a very little pulverized sugar; with a broad-bladed knife, dipped in water, spread over it the rest of the egg, and sprinkle thickly over all more sugar, and a little cold water to dissolve it, and place in the oven a few minutes to dry and crust over. Take out and cool.

DESSERT.—Take six or eight nice pippin apples, pare, core, and cut them in pieces; add a small quantity of water, and stew them until soft, watching them to see if more water is needed; but do not stir until done; when entirely soft, remove from the fire, strain through a colander, add a very small piece of butter, and let them get cold. In a glass dish arrange slices of sponge cake or lady-fingers, covering the bottom and sides; pour in enough wine to soak the cake at the bottom, and, a little at a time, enough to moisten that on the sides; if any is left that has not been absorbed, take it out with a spoon. Have ready small glasses of raspberry and quince jelly, put these on the cake in layers, so as to make the two colors appear to advantage. To the apples add sugar to taste, and stir lightly in the well-beaten whites of five eggs; pour this over the cake, etc., in the bowl. Cream can be eaten with it if wished; or a custard may be made with the yolks of the five eggs and three pints of milk.

THE RUSTIC MIRROR.

LEGENDS OF THE CROSS.

WHEN Adam was far advanced in years, and at the point of death, he sent his son to the angel Michael, who kept the gate of Paradise, to pray for the oil of mercy, so that he could be healed. The angel answered that it could not be until fifty-five hundred years, but he gave Seth a branch of the tree of which Adam had eaten, bidding him plant it on Mount Lebanon, and that when it bore the fruit, his father should be healed. Seth planted the branch on his father's grave: it took root and grew, and from it were made Aaron's rod, and Moses's staff, with which he struck the rock and sweetened the waters of Marah. It also formed the pole on which the brazen serpent was lifted up, and the ark of the testimony. At last it came into the hands of Solomon, who used it in building his palace; but it continually resisted the efforts of the builders to adjust it. Now it was too long, and then again too short. The builders, being angry, then threw it into a marsh, so that it might serve as a bridge. The Queen of Sheba would not walk upon it, but adored it, and told Solomon that upon it should be suspended the man through whose death the kingdom should be destroyed. Solomon then had it buried deep in the ground, where afterward the Pool of Bethesda was dug, and from the virtues of this tree healing properties were imparted to the waters. Some say it was placed in the Temple by Solomon, and buried later. After it had been buried three hundred years it rose to the surface of the water, and the Jews took it and made of it the cross of our Saviour.

It is a widely spread tradition that the tree of the Fall was an apple-tree; so, of course, then, according to the legend, the cross would be of the same wood. One legend has it that the angel gave to Seth three pips like unto apple seeds, which would seem to favor this idea. In another legend, these three seeds grew into a cedar, a cypress, and a pine; but after a while their branches touched, and their several natures were united in a single tree. Again, in another legend, the cross of the Saviour was made of four kinds of wood—the stem being of cedar, the cross-beam of cypress, the piece on which the feet rested was of palm, and the piece which bore the superscription was of olive.

Another beautiful tradition is that the cross was made of the wood of the aspen, and ever since that time the leaves have not ceased to quiver, as if mute Nature were more in sympathy with her Maker than the cruel hands which nailed Him to the cross.

Another reason, however, is assigned for the tremulous motion of the aspen. Once when our Saviour went through a wood all the trees bowed down and adored him, but the proud aspen would not acknowledge him as her Lord and Master; and so ever from that time she has trembled, and must continue to do so.

HOLIDAY FACES.

TRULY a pleasant theme. For weary mind and for jaded brain, for eyes oppressed with the persistently monotonous scenes of the dull annual round, for those who would fain turn for a while, however brief, from the prosaic to the poetic side of nature, can portrait gallery be more welcome than that which is implied to the visual sense in this brief phrase—yet phrase most eloquent notwithstanding—holiday faces? When young Brown, clerk in the great city house of Brown, Bullion, & Minto, ventures, one fine morning in June, to suggest to his stern old uncle in the severe sanctum of the back parlor that he would like to know when it would quite suit the convenience of the house for him, young Brown, to take his usual annual outing, old Brown is heard to observe, in a tone of sulkiness genuine or assumed, "Yes, I thought so! I knew the rascal had a holiday face on him!" The holiday face at once betrays itself. It is as certainly conspicuous as the holiday dress.

But revenons à nos moutons; in other words, to the special business of this particular paper on holiday faces. If you wish to know who is the owner of that pair of laughing eyes, whose head it is that is surmounted with that most piquant cap and feather, and over whose firmly set shoulders that torrent of golden hair falls down, you had better ask the Dowager Lady Doncaster. Or, on second thoughts, perhaps you had better not, for the question would not open up a particularly welcome set of reminiscences; and now that the teterrima causa mali has been in some degree toned down, it may be as well not to waken an ancient sorrow. That young lady happens to be the present Lady Doncaster, wife of the now Sir Henry, fifth baronet. True, she no longer wears the same somewhat rapid head-dress, and the merry face shows a little more trace than it does in the picture, which the intelligent reader may consult, of the cares of the world and the deceitfulness of riches. How did it all come about? Well, young Harry Doncaster was in company with his friend Jack Shepperton yachting about "the Wight," and the pair naturally enough made their head-quarters at Ryde. Ryde was full, very full, as indeed it always is during the regatta week. But when the regatta week was over Mr. Henry Doncaster still exhibited a hankering after the place. Mr. Shepperton was anxious to be off. They had arranged to do the western isles of Scotland, and they were to pick up some friends on the 20th of August at Glasgow. "Hang it all!" Mr. Shepperton would remark, "what on earth is the good of staying here any longer? Every body's off, and we look about as absurd as the last rose in summer or the last man in Rotten Row." But Mr. Doncaster still declared his intention of "waiting a bit," and vowed it was no good being in "a hurry." Mr. Doncaster was not much given to the luxury of reverie; and when Jack Shepperton caught his friend abstracted and meditative, he at once shrewdly concluded that there must be, as he expressively phrased it, "something up." One fine morning Mr. Shepperton was called up to London on business; he had long been anxious to exchange from the 254th into the 255th regiment, and now the opportunity had arrived unexpectedly and much sooner than he had hoped. "Shall be back again very soon, old man," said the son of Mars to the heir of the Doncaster baronetcy. "Keep yourself up, and don't give way to the blues." Mr. Shepperton was back very soon indeed; so soon, as a matter of fact, that he took Mr. Doncaster quite unawares, and stepped on the Ryde pier from the Portsea boat only two mornings after his departure. Mr. Doncaster was there, but not alone; he was seated under the awning which was spread at the extremity of that marine promenade unequaled in England, and close beside him was sitting a certain young lady, Miss Clara Ripples. Mr. Shepperton saw his friend, but, for reasons of his own, discovering that he himself was altogether unseen, determined not to precipitate a recognition. When the future baronet who had been basking in Miss Clara Ripples's very sunny smiles walked into the club that day for lunch, the first person that he saw was Jack Shepperton. This gentleman was determined to have it out with Mr. Doncaster, and as they smoked their first afternoon pipe he told his partner in the possession of the Sea Fan—that was the name of their yacht—that he knew now all about it.

"Ah, Harry, you're a sly old dog, but I've spotted you regularly. That's the way you employ the shining hours, and that's the reason why you think the Hebrides can wait, eh?"

Upon which Mr. Doncaster told, in the disjointed and incoherent manner common to young Englishmen when they are discussing what is very near to them, the old story. A very old one indeed. Miss Clara Ripples, the second daughter of Captain Ripples, R.N., had fairly ensnared the heart and captivated the affections of the stalwart ex-Guardsman.

"By George!" ejaculated Mr. Shepperton, "you don't mean to say that you are in earnest, Harry, and that you positively are going to go and do it?"

"Upon my soul I am!" was the emphatic and concise reply.

Whereat Mr. Shepperton gave a curious and prolonged whistle.

"Then," he said, "I can't say I envy you the breaking the intelligence to your respected parents."

Truth to tell, Mr. Doncaster scarcely envied himself; but his mind was made up; the daughter of the half-pay naval captain had won the day, and Harry Doncaster was booked. 'Tis a long story. The yachting tour to the Hebrides did not come off. A few days after the domestic atmosphere of Doncaster Grange was considerably ruffled by a certain letter from the heir-apparent to state that he had taken to himself a wife. The storm, however, was so violent that it could not last long. "That was one comfort," remarked Harry Doncaster, pulling his mustache. Nor did it last. Clara was decidedly liked when her illustrious parents-in-law—who, by-the-bye, had vowed never to admit her to their society—saw her; and shortly before he died Sir Henry Doncaster sent for her to bestow on her his benediction and his forgiveness. Our friend Harry is the present baronet, and little Clara Ripples is Lady Doncaster. And as good a wife she makes him as he ever had any right to expect to get. Some of Harry's friends say even better. As for the Dowager and her daughter-in-law, they understand each other, and have agreed to differ.

HOLIDAY FACES.

Holiday face No. 2, vis-à-vis to Lady Doncaster, née Miss Clara Ripples. When Mr. Verner died in—well, never mind the exact date—nobody for a moment supposed that his family were left otherwise than very handsomely off. Indeed, Mrs. Verner herself had not the least idea that her husband had at any time deviated from the safe and certain road of strict commercial prudence in any of his speculations. But when Mr. Verner's affairs came to be looked into it was discovered that, had his life been prolonged by a month, inevitable insolvency would have ensued. His death was indeed so very sudden, and the circumstances attending his death so exceptionally peculiar—"most peculiar, you know, my dear," some of Mrs. Verner's especially sympathetic friends remarked to each other—that rumors were not wanting to the effect that it would have been just possible to impugn the verdict of the jury, which was, as every one knows, "Death from natural causes." However this may be, within a week after her husband's death Mrs. Verner awoke to a full sense of the fact that she was utterly and irretrievably ruined. The villa at Sydenham had to be given up immediately. The widow's two sons at once accepted their position, and, after they had seen their mother placed beyond the reach of absolute want, sold their commissions and did the best thing that two plucky and able-bodied young Englishmen could—emigrated. Miss Verner remained with her mother. The pair had taken a little cottage in a very tranquil little angle of Cornwall; and there is more than one pedestrian who remembers that, of all the holiday faces which he saw on the occasion of his western walking tour some two or three years ago, none fixed itself so firmly in his memory as that which belonged to the daughter of the widow lady who lived in the little cottage a mile out of the fishing hamlet of Gissamevey. But the day which had robbed Mr. Verner of breath had limited the time which remained for his wife. Mrs. Verner never rallied from the blow; and less than a year from the time when Edith Verner found herself without a father she knew that she had no mother. Determined to choose any lot other than that of dependence on the bounty of friends or the charity of relations, Miss Verner embraced a position which is, in truth, the most dependent of all, and became a governess. Mrs. Flintville Ironstone, wife of the opulent head of the great Manchester firm of Ironstone, Cash, & Co., required a few finishing strokes to be put upon the education of her only daughter, Ada—you may see her there exactly opposite Miss Verner. Would Miss Verner undertake the responsibilities of the post? Miss Verner did undertake them, and very gladly too. Mr. Ironstone had known her father, and Mrs. Ironstone was at one time a devoted friend of her mother's. Mrs. Ironstone had no fault of any kind to find with her daughter's governess—a trifle too fond of admiration, the good lady would remark: which meant that visitors to the Ironstone establishment occasionally concentrated their attention upon the governess, to the most unreasonable exclusion of the opulent manufacturer's heiress. But Ada Ironstone was a good-hearted little creature, and devoted to Edith.

Llandudno was a watering-place which the Ironstones, in common with other of their order, greatly affected; and to Llandudno Miss Verner proceeded with the Ironstone establishment only one year after she had left the little Cornish cottage in which she had seen so much of quiet happiness and borne so much of tranquil sorrow with her mother. What could it have been that brought a certain Mr. Glanville—Percy Glanville—that year to Llandudno? Twelve months since he had seen Edith Verner's sweet face when making a tour of the West of England, and he had never forgotten it. What could it have been that made him procure with such anxiety an introduction to the Ironstone ménage, and when procured make use of it so assiduously? "I'll lay you two to one," said one of Mr. Ironstone's junior business acquaintances, "that when Glanville leaves Llandudno there's an engagement in your establishment." But Mr. Ironstone did not trouble himself to book the bet, and merely ordered a second bottle of claret. He did, however, mention the remark of his guest to his wife, who determined that for the future she would make her observations. She was faithful to her word. There was no doubt about it. Mr. Glanville was at the house very frequently; and he used to meet Miss Ironstone, accompanied by Miss Verner, much more frequently in her daily rambles in the direction of the Great Orme's head than seemed absolutely necessary. One fine day Mrs. Ironstone intimated to her husband that something ought to be done. Mrs. Ironstone even gave her opinion to her lord and master—Mrs. Ironstone was not a lady possessed of much tact or even perception—that he should point-blank interrogate Mr. Glanville on the subject of his intentions. Now Mr. Ironstone, in his own parlance, "did not care about that sort of thing." However, he consented, and that same evening the wealthy manufacturer did put the fatal question to Percy Glanville.

"My intentions, Sir?" repeated that young gentleman. "Upon my soul, I don't know that they make much difference to you."

"Eh?" said Mr. Ironstone: "I assure you Ada's happiness is a great—"

"My dear Sir," replied Mr. Glanville, "I have a great esteem for your daughter, but I think there is some mistake. It is Miss Verner who has done me the honor to say that she will become my wife."

"The devil!" said Mr. Ironstone.

Percy declares that he shall never forget the expression of the Manchester magnate's face. "However," says Percy, when he tells, as he sometimes does, to a few of his most intimate friends the anecdote, "the old boy proved a brick of the first water; and as for Ada Ironstone, she was Edith's bride-maid, and is now my wife's best friend."

That, if you please—left-hand side, top—is a genuine holiday face in more senses than one: a face that has brought sunshine into many a dreary home, and gladness to many an aching heart. We rather think that it was at a pleasant little watering-place on the east coast of England that the Rev. Edward Oriel met Agnes Vanstone. He was emphatically the reverse of a marrying man, was the Rev. Edward. Plenty of caps had been set at him in Slocumb Pogis and its immediate vicinity, but without the slightest effect. The Slocumb Pogis gossips began to say that he had vowed perpetual celibacy. Yet Mr. Oriel was no fanatical ritualist. His allegiance to his Church was firm, because it was based not on emotion, but on principle; therefore it was not extravagant. The man worked like a horse. Maiden ladies prescribed him a course of early hours, heavy teas, and calves'-foot jelly. The squire of Slocumb Pogis told him he should stick to port; the doctor recommended cod-liver oil and change of air. The latter he certainly wanted, and he took it—after much delay and with considerable reluctance. The east coast watering-place already alluded to happened to be nearest his clerical charge, and thither, for that simple reason of proximity, he accordingly went. Very much, indeed, like a fish out of water did Mr. Oriel feel among the flâneurs, idlers, and fashionables of his holiday haunt. An old college chum, whom he casually met, introduced him to Mrs. Vanstone and her daughter, and the Rev. Edward's fate was as good as sealed. That simple holiday trip has made his—so the good man says—a holiday life. When Mr. Oriel returned to his duties at Slocumb Pogis it became generally rumored that the spinsters of the neighborhood might as well desist from their profitless enterprise of cap-setting. In other words, it was affirmed upon indisputable authority that Mr. Oriel was engaged. The rector of Slocumb, who had been a systematic absentee for the last ten years, probably commenced about this time to experience certain quailing of his ecclesiastical conscience for receiving an income of eight hundred per annum, in consideration of which he paid his curate one hundred, and himself did nothing nor ever came near his parish. It was, perhaps, also fortunate for his conscience that by the death of an aged aunt he came into possession of some twenty thousand pounds. Accordingly the rector of Slocumb Pogis decided on resigning his living, and strongly recommended to its patron Mr. Oriel as his successor. The same week that the Rev. Edward "read himself in" he married Agnes Vanstone. A good man took to himself a good wife, so say the poor of Slocumb Pogis parish; and we are more than disposed to think that the poor of Slocumb Pogis are right in their estimate.

Bonny Grace Anerly! that fair young face of yours has known more of sorrow than is often crowded into the life of a century. We will not lift the curtain upon all your griefs. In that seclusion which you have chosen you are troubled by no worldly anxieties. Yet, lost though you are to the eyes of all who knew and prized you, we will picture to ourselves your face as it was in the glad times that are gone—bright with merriment and smiles. We will dwell on it rather as it was than as it is. For us and to our fancy you shall still be not the life-saddened religieuse who shuns the world, and to whom the world is as if it was not, but the glad, sunny maiden who brought with her joy wherever she went. Who shall say that your choice is wrong? Earth ceased to have any charms for you when the terrible news of that accident upon that awful Alpine pass arrived. A father, a brother, and a lover—all whelmed in a sudden destruction. It was as a holiday face that he had first known yours—even as it shines forth in its patient and hopeful beauty upon us, to whom all that remains is your portrait and your memory.

"Holiday faces on Alpine passes,
Holiday faces on cockney Rhine;
And ever so many in flow'ring grasses
Which round the Devonshire lanes entwine.

"Holiday faces to Scarborough scramble,
And many are dreaming on Windermere;
But double as many in Jersey ramble,
And more than all are on Margate pier."

So sings an agreeable versifier, whose stanzas we may conveniently invoke to relieve us of such detailed descriptions as might be suitable in each one of these instances. But even thus there remains two more holiday faces at which we must glance. To us mentally revolving divers holiday pastimes from croquet to cricket, from dinners to dancing, there rises a delightful vision of a level sward covered with a company of nineteenth century Robin Hoods of both sexes, and some half dozen sets of targets ranged in order due. It is, in truth, the Midland Archery Ground of an eminent toxopholite club. An attractive spot, but dangerously seductive. Insensibly your admiration becomes attracted from the skill which the fair markswomen display to the fair markswomen themselves, till at last the admiration acquires a more particular character than ever, and centres itself in some special one of that picturesquely clad group. Kate Armstrong, we promise you, has fatally transfixed something else beside yonder target. She is as dead a shot at a heart as at the painted canvas, and there is more than one hopelessly sighing swain in the Midlands who bears painful evidence to the profound cunning with which she plies her art. Impressible young curates have gone down before her like nine-pins; she has turned away the affections of more than one elderly gentleman who boasts that at one past period of his existence he himself was no despicable shot; and, truth to tell, she is as proud of her powers with the bow and arrow which his mischievous mamma presented to Cupid as those with which she is duly supplied from Mr. Buchanan's. It is a great field-day with the Downshire toxopholites; it is pre-eminently a great field-day for Miss Kate Armstrong—something more than a field-day—of flirtation. Kate Armstrong wins the first prize of the meeting, and the prize for the best gold. But it is a report generally current among the toxopholites of Downshire that she wins something else. However this may be, in six weeks from the day which we have in mind Miss Kate Armstrong became Mrs. Lancewood. She lives now in a pretty little country house somewhere out Norwood way. Her drawing-room is mainly furnished with her archery prizes, and she frequently contrives to get an afternoon's shooting in the grounds of the Crystal Palace.

There is one face remaining—that in the very centre of this holiday constellation. We will not say much about it, except that its owner is as good as her features bespeak her—a fact which we ourselves happen to have the best possible opportunity of knowing better than most other people. Mr. Martin Tupper has informed us that he who rebuketh a wife rebuketh himself. Probably the same remark that is applicable to censure is applicable also to description.

CLARA BARTON IN STRASBURG AND PARIS.

MANY of our readers will remember Miss Clara Barton, who exerted herself so efficiently during the late war to identify the graves of the Union dead. Congress appropriated fifteen thousand dollars to aid her in the search, to which she contributed largely from her own resources; and her thoughtful care enabled many to pay the last honors to those whose fate would otherwise have remained forever unknown. We are permitted to copy from a private letter, addressed by her to a friend in this city, the graphic story of an equally useful work which she is doing in the wake of the war that has devastated Europe. Miss Barton writes:

For the first eight months I spent in Europe I can not say a satisfactory word. I was ill, and ill at ease, could find no good place, and had nothing pleasant to write to any one, and sent every letter under protest, feeling that I had no right to annoy my friends with my bundle of complaints, and that, on the whole, they would be more favored by my silence than my speech. From Geneva I went to the Mediterranean; from there back to Geneva; from there to Berne, and made me a pleasant little home enough, only that I was weak and nervous and restless and good for nothing; tried baths, etc., etc. Just then Prussia sounded the long roll, that Napoleon was attacking her camp, and although it was none of "my funeral," I could not remain quietly away. And the first I knew I was on my way to the field, even before there was a field. I was on my way to the Rhine before a gun was fired. I did not think I would take any part, but I would simply go and stand on the edge of the field, and see how the day went when Europe made wars. Haguenau was fought, and I stood on the edge of the field; and something more: I saw the helmets piled upon the ground as thickly as the potatoes which were trodden out by the warring feet; and for six weeks I staid between the lines and did my best, which, I fear, was never too well. Then I passed out one night among the sentries and made my way back to Switzerland. But there I found that the Grand Duchess of Baden had been telegraphing for me to come to her. And I turned back once more, and followed down the Rhine Valley to Carlsruhe, and passed my first evening with the Grand Duchess, who was establishing her hospitals, and wanted my opinions as an American. If I were to attempt to describe to you the noble, lovely woman she is, I should only fail; but you must imagine the sweetest and best person you have ever known. I remained here some six weeks, the guest of the ladies of the court, and visited most of the Badish hospitals, either in company with her Royal Highness or by her escort, and usually passed my evenings, after eight o'clock, with her alone. What treats of intellectual goodness they were! All this time the bombardment of Strasburg was going on, and I waited day by day for its fall. At length it came, and I turned my steps thither, while the black, orange, and red flags of Germany were pushing out in songs of triumph from every window and house-top from Carlsruhe to the Rhine. I need not tell you what it was to make my way through Prussian sentries, and enter the city with a victorious army on foot, over the fallen trees for miles—not an animal could pass—crossing the Rhine in a little row-boat with a trebly paid ferry-man. It is the same old story of moving in the wake of marching armies. But at length the close of a day of untold fatigue brought me into the desolated and ruined city. It was not so badly demolished as Atlanta when I first saw that; but it was bad enough. There were 20,000 persons that moment without shelter, living under boards leaned against the walls, and on the banks of the rivers, with neither food, fire, nor clothing, save the few rags in which they escaped from the flames of their burning buildings. They had lived in cellars half filled with stagnant water for almost three months, and consumption sat triumphant on countless brows and cheeks—mothers and children all the same. My first visit was to the civil hospital; and here was a sight truly strange even to me in the line of hospitals and wounds. Between two and three hundred wounded women, wounded with shell, worse than the same number of wounds I have ever seen in men; little boys and girls and babies, with feet and hands off, lying there as patiently, bravely, and uncomplainingly as I have ever seen brave, soldierly men. These were as well nursed and provided as one could expect under the circumstances; but how desolate! Nearly all had some of their family killed, some all; and the homes always destroyed, all lost, and left either to die, or go out when it was possible, friendless and bereft, to make a crippled way in a hard world. One feeble woman, brave, smiling, and cheerful, with both arms off at the shoulder, I remember. I passed the day among them, took every name and condition, and turned back to Carlsruhe and the Grand Duchess, and laid my sad list in her lap. Through the tears she asked me many things, and quietly we decided some; and the next morning I returned with a large delegation of ladies and gentlemen from the court, with a car load of clothing and food and money, and passed a day of general relief. Then I decided to return myself and see what I could do by remaining a little with these unhappy people; and taking from Carlsruhe a young and most delightful girl as an assistant, I did return, and commenced to go among and find the wants and clothe the poor shivering wretches about me.

Germany and Switzerland sent old clothes, and I purchased new, and had always something to bestow upon the hundreds who thronged my door every day. This was well for the first days, but directly I saw that this state of things must not continue; these people had not been beggars before, but self-sustaining. Now there was no hour of work for one of them; but if they begged through the winter, all pride would be crushed out, the children would have learned the habit, and beggars they would remain for evermore. Something must be done to find work for these women; their husbands had either been killed or were lying in German prisons, and many of them had from four to eight children. It seemed a hopeless task, and almost an insult to humanity to ask such a woman, living in the open street, with no fire in October, if she could sew for a living; but I did ask them, and got for reply that some could and others could not; but I determined to try them, and purchased some materials for dresses and other warm garments; and after eleven o'clock one chilly night, when the hard day's work was completed, I put the scissors into my cloth, and cut some dress skirts of good dark wool. The next day I gave one to make to a woman who thought she could do it. The next day she returned it badly done; and I kept her, had her take it all out, and make it over in my presence. Then I paid her, and kept the skirt for a sample for the others, and gave six more, which were better done. I paid these for the work, and gave the garments to others more wretched and ignorant than they, who could not sew. From this I cut sacques, petticoats, gave yarn to knit, and directly it came to be known among the women that they could earn money, and that I would pay them. This was a new idea, and they caught it. It was like a rope to a drowning man. And their demands for work became more pressing, and their appeals to me to save them and their children from beggary were stronger than ever had been their prayers for bread. I employed a young dress-maker, who cut continually, and gave to make the garments as soon as cut. I accepted between forty and fifty women. This was as much as I thought I could undertake without help. And I had sometimes small gifts of material from Germany. Always the number became more a question of possibility, the demands more pressing. I was alone with my young assistant. No American here, no one to aid or counsel me, but my conscience would not permit me to lay down such a work. I saw that the families of forty women, which comprised more than two hundred persons, were entirely held up from want, suffering, and beggary by my single thought and act. And always I hoped that some one would come and find me, and lay my work before our people. How often I took up my pen to do it myself, and laid it down again in disgust at telling my own story! I knew my work was good and true and practical, but how could I say so to all the world! This was before America had taken a step in aid of the sufferers of the war; but I knew well she would do so, and I felt the great necessity of having some plan in readiness for the wise and proper distribution of the charities which I knew she would eventually bestow.

I left my work, and traveled in the rain to Switzerland, clear to the coast of France, and back to the North Sea, attempting to rouse the American diplomatics here to form an American organization in aid of America at home, which would receive the supplies and means, and go personally over the fields of France, and use their means in a practical and American manner, as their own work, and do some credit to the nation. But they were all lazy or timid, and feared that some of the work would come upon themselves; and I could not accomplish my plan, but came down from Brussels to Metz the day of its surrender, and passed a few days there, and back to my work at Strasburg, discouraged with all but my own hands, which I knew would be faithful to me. I went on and on, until at Christmas the "Comité de Secours" of Strasburg, which had raised large sums of money, which they distributed in direct charity, began to observe the effect of my work, but not knowing me at all, supposed I had a large society of ladies, but decided to make an acquaintance if possible. This comité was composed of thirty or forty of the leading and most wealthy men of the city. They sent a deputation to visit my rooms, where they found myself and young assistant, with workers, materials, etc. They seemed astonished at the size of the affair, and asked me who was president of our society. I said we had none. Who was secretary? Again I said we kept our own accounts; and I passed the books over for inspection. They complimented them and the manner in which they were kept. I said they were accurate. But, puzzled by my replies, they waited a little, and asked who was our treasurer. I replied that, as we had no funds, we had no need of a treasurer. They were stupefied, but desired to call again next day; but this time with the urgent request that I would help them to organize something like my work in connection with theirs. They deplored the fact that they only made beggars of their own people, while a strange woman, unknown to all, should have come to hold them above it, and help them up to a moral elevation from which their system was daily casting them down, and that they had never seen this. They were humble, and acted like noble men, as they were, and not above receiving instruction—if one might call it so—from a woman and a stranger. I said I would help them, and directly enlarged my work to act in connection with them. They no longer permitted me to pay my bills for stuffs and work, and sent me such women as they found most needy. I enlarged my number of cutters to some eight or ten dress-makers and tailors; and from that time the number of working-women has increased to two hundred and seventy-five, who make about two thousand garments per week, of all sizes and kinds, for men, women, boys, girls, and babies, of the best and most serviceable material I can purchase for the wear of poor and working people. The work of a week is all received on Thursday afternoon. Each article is examined, and if not well done, returned to be better made, and the often ignorant woman taught how to do it. The work is well and handsomely done. They are all paid the ordinary price, and the amount given out is as nearly equal as possible. These women have large families: over nineteen hundred persons are sustained by the money paid from my table every week. All these would eat the bread of charity or go without were I to stop this work. Now they are industrious and self-supporting, and the garments which they make (nineteen hundred a week) are distributed among the poor who have lost all. They are each estimated at the real cost, and given as a part of the "secours" due the sufferers. More than ten thousand persons have been clothed by the work of my women since last October, not in old, worn-out, ill-fitting rags, which, while they covered, degraded; but new, strong, well-made, serviceable, and handsome garments, which one may wear and not feel like a beggar.

But in all this time my early fears have been realized, and my prophecies proved true. I have seen my country raise its funds for charity, with no one prepared to execute the charity.

The sails have whitened the winter waves of the Atlantic; the ships have come and gone, some sold at a sacrifice to speculators before reaching their destination, because there was no one to receive them; and the gifts have been distributed without system, and, so far as one could clearly see, without especial result. Nothing has been done in a way to hold up or elevate the people of a sinking nation. And America, although she has given her thousands (and that through honest hands), has made no mark for herself, and done no one work in her own practical way. Nothing which will pass into history, nothing which makes her influence and character felt among other nations.

My proud heart has often wearied over this, often been sore, and often the nights have been long and restless. How I have longed for my countrymen and women to do something in this matter which others besides themselves could quote! If no more, I have longed for them to come.....and find this American work made ready to their hands, and take it up as their own, and spread its benefits out over wretched France. I would have given it to them with its months of buried toil, and its organization almost as perfect as the planets, and rejoiced to lose my own name in it for that of America. And how often within the last four months, when I have seen princes, princesses, and sovereigns, who have come far to see my work-rooms and copy from them—after standing for hours among my women as they brought and took their work—turn away with a shake of the head, exclaiming, "Only an American could have organized something like this," my heart has beat for a moment with pride for my nation, and fell again like lead when I remembered my poor self all alone in it, with not only no American near me, but not one American on the face of the earth knew that such a thing existed—that in it was not a dollar of American money but my own, not the weight of an American finger but mine. How small, isolated, and alone I felt!

June 9.—My work in Strasburg is finished, faithfully finished, I believe; and about ten days ago I filled eight enormous boxes and sent them on to Paris. Dorr took them as he left for home, and I followed next day, and have located myself in one of the most badly destroyed portions, and am clothing people as fast as possible. I think it a significant fact that the poor, mutilated, homeless, widowed women of Strasburg should have enabled me to take forward from the work of their hands 4000 garments, a gift to their suffering sisters in Paris; there is a deeper sentiment than mere matter of fact in that. That is as I would have had it all over France; and I would have had America to be the mainspring and conveyer of these good gifts to a struggling sister republic.

I must not attempt to tell you of this wretchedly destroyed city, or I shall let this poor letter lie another month upon my table. The fires are scarcely out in the vaults of the Tuileries; only the day before yesterday as I passed I saw the smoke curling slowly up from the piles of rubbish heaped within the blackened walls. I have now seen all the most important and heavily bombarded cities of this terrible war, and seen them all fresh in their misery, and done my little portion for each one. If I were a writer I should have something to write; if I were a speaker I should have something to tell; but alas! I can do neither well; so many do both so much, so much, better, that I dare not attempt to enter the lists with them. I can only wait afar and remember what I have lived through and witnessed, and leave to the gifted to describe to admiring readers and auditors what they themselves have only read and imagined. Many an audience will be held breathless by descriptions drawn from careful reading of the very scenes which I have witnessed and lived among: so goes the world.

WORTH WHILE FOR WOMEN TO KNOW.

"EVERY wise woman," says Solomon, "buildeth her house." But there are many wise or, at least, not foolish women nowadays who not only don't build or help to build their homes, but don't know how they should be done. If they understood some practical details of house-building there would be fewer slightly made, uncomfortable, inconvenient houses. Especially the finishing ought to be looked after by the mistress of a house. She knows what color of paint is going to wear well for nursery and dining-room, and how the pantry should be arranged. It is singular that women are so indifferent to occupations which touch their peculiar surroundings. We never hear of a woman architect, or indoor painter, or upholsterer. The consequence is that we have warped doors and furniture; blistering walnut paint; unhandy arrangements of stairs leading into bath-rooms (actually I have known a practical carpenter build his own house with the bath-room for a side passage); kitchens in the middle of the house, or in the next yard, either too close or too far off; narrow stairs; and sinks with the drain in the elevated end—blunders which vex a woman's soul from year's end to year's end, but which she never thinks of remedying by prevention, by applying herself to the correction of such details while her house is building. She ought to know as much about plaster and paint as she does about wall-paper and curtains; for it is much more important that the walls should be warm and dry, and the paint durable, than that her parlor should have French satin paper, and the bedrooms be finished off in Pompadour chintzes.

When the first rough coat of plaster is on the walls of a house, and the doors and window-casings up, a woman's province is ready for her oversight. If it suits her to have the work completed in the most economical manner possible, let the walls be washed with this sizing: Two pounds of glue in hot water, which is reduced with eight gallons of cold, and thickened with twelve pounds of whiting. This gives a smooth finish, which can be washed in cold water, instead of needing to be whitened every year. It is applied with a whitewash-brush, and forms a smooth coat to receive paper; or it may remain, for kitchens and servants' rooms, tinting it pale gray with a little cobalt. Where there is a suspicion of damp walls neither paper nor wash will last, and no application will be tolerable but a water-proof paint. For painting, a woman who is ambitious enough to attempt the work herself needs a low chair, supported by boards laid on trestle-work or benches, which may be changed for lower ones as she reaches the base of the wall. A paint-pot must be provided, which may be made of a white-lead can, with thick wire bail put in, and a hook attached to hang it on any convenient projection. A number 5 brush, partly worn, is best for inside work, as new brushes are too soft. When laying aside work, cover the paint in the can with cold water to keep the dust off, and hang the brushes in it so that the heads will be covered. In laying on paint dip the brush only an inch into the paint, and tap it once or twice against the sides to let surplus flakes fall off, then make straight strokes of the brush with the grain of the wood, not against it, drawing downward on vertical and from left to right on horizontal surfaces. Carry the brush off, not lift, at the end of each stroke. Make the first coat the lightest and thinnest one, stopping all cracks and holes with putty after it is dry. Paint all crevices, bevels, and beadings, before you do the flat surfaces next them, with a full brush. Work the paint well into the wood by passing the brush vigorously back and forth when each coat is on. For sashes and fine work use a number 4 brush, and carry it only one way, not back and forth. Protect glass in sashes, and walls at the side of mouldings, by tacking a strip of pasteboard several inches wide against the surface next the work to catch dashes of paint.

If spots of mildew or blisters appear on wall-paper in a room where steam does not penetrate, do not try to save the paper, but strip it off, and apply a delicate tint mixed with boiled linseed-oil, to every gallon of which a quarter of a pound of glue has been added, first softened by heat, with a very little water to prevent it from burning. Another more effectual coating is made of five pounds of rubber melted in a gallon of boiled linseed-oil. The mixture should be heated in a tin kettle suspended in boiling water, so that it will not take fire. Coat the wall with this, reducing, if necessary, by more oil, and paint or paper above it. One gallon of the preparation should coat fifty yards of surface, and never be penetrated by moisture. One gallon of the oil and glue requires twenty pounds of dry paint ground in it to give two coats to forty square yards of surface. Use nothing but boiled oil for inside work; the raw requires nearly a season to dry. A good drying oil is made by boiling one ounce of sugar of lead, and the same of sulphate of zinc, with two ounces each of litharge, red-lead, and umber, in a gallon of linseed-oil, till it will scorch a feather. White-lead gives the most body to paint, and is most durable, but turns yellow, and is apt to be mixed with inferior pigment. Zinc-white is the purest color. Three coats are desirable on inside work for lasting finish. The first is called the priming, and is the only coat in which oil should be used, for in the upper coats it is apt to turn yellow by exposure to the air. The cheapest priming is given by a coat of oil on which whiting is rubbed, filling all the pores of the wood with a thin putty, which preserves it well, and leaves a smooth surface for paint. A good common finish is given by mixing a second coat of zinc-white with enough oil to moisten it, and reducing with naphtha; then a third coat of zinc in naphtha, with one-third Dammar varnish. This gives the glossy white so dear to neat housewives. The most expensive and durable white finish is thus given: One coat of shellac varnish; four coats of pure zinc ground in oil and mixed with turpentine, each coat well dried, and the whole rubbed down with pumice; and finally two coats of French zinc in varnish. This is hard, shining, and fine as enamel.

THE SCHOOL-MASTER.

THE peculiarities of the school-master are generic. Knowing nothing of the world or the cares of business, the anxieties caused by the fluctuation of markets, or of professional rivalry, having but few associations as a rule among their equals, and their experience being very much confined to the little sphere which acknowledges them the undisputed monarch, how should they be other than consequential and dogmatic? We would also account for some of the idiosyncrasies of the teacher, inasmuch as, while the generation of children he has accompanied passibus æquis through their elementary curriculum go out into the world, free from the restraint which inthralled them while under tutors and governors, they pass under new conditions, and thenceforth have, in a measure, to take charge of themselves and acquire a new experience, he remains a child with their successors. "Hardly any thing," says a thoughtful writer, "is so fatal to continuous mental growth as constant contact with immature minds. It is the intellectual equivalent of keeping low company. A person whose life is passed among children or boys can hardly be expected to avoid the blunder of supposing that the superiority of which he is continually made conscious is absolute, and not relative. The feeling that he has to be constantly setting them an example is almost certain to delude him into the belief that he has an example to set, whereas, in fact, his knowledge of life is often little wider, while his conjectures about it are less lively, than those of his pupils. There is no one thing which it is more important for persons connected with education to remember than the truth that education is only a preparation for life, and that the life that lies beyond it is utterly unlike it, is very partially known to any one, and is in general particularly little known to themselves."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IN these hot August days we look about for cool topics with which to refresh our readers. They are very scarce, to be sure—few to be had at any price within the boundaries of New York city. And the minds of most people lead them to a perpetual consultation of the thermometer on the hottest days, an incessant fanning, and a continual thinking, "Oh, how hot it is!"—all which tend to make one more uncomfortable, if not actually to increase the heat of the body. One of the most refreshing items we have read lately is an account of the intense cold experienced by the scientific party who spent last winter on Mount Washington. The details are given in the official report of their experiences and observations, which has just been issued. One of the company made the following record on a certain cool day:

"Find that I froze my fingers while sawing off a piece of pork for our 'Sunday baked beans;' was out only five minutes. It was like cutting into a block of gypsum to saw off that piece of pork....Our butter-tube stand in the outer room. This morning we cut a piece of butter for breakfast, using a chisel and hammer. It was like cutting into a stone."

Again he writes:

"The valleys are full of stratus clouds; charged with frost as they are, occasionally sweeping over the summit, they completely cover one in a moment—hair, beard, and clothing; when the face is exposed it feels like the touch of a hot iron. To breathe this frosty air is very unpleasant. A full inhalation causes a severe coughing fit."

We have doubts about the breath of "frosty air" being specially "unpleasant" this August day. What is unpleasant is the allusion to a "hot iron." When there is not a particle of air stirring it is rather invigorating to think of wind "howling, screeching, and roaring through the building," of its suddenly lulling away, and then as suddenly gathering strength to "blow as if it would hurl the house from the summit of the mount." We would be glad to explain fully to our readers how the scientific party managed to keep warm; but to do this it would be necessary to make sundry allusions to "red-hot stoves," and we think the effect might be injurious while midsummer is upon us.

The proposal made by one of the faculty of Williams College, Massachusetts, that women should be admitted as students into that institution, has excited general attention throughout the country. Amherst has also taken progressive steps. At a recent meeting of the trustees, after a protracted discussion, the question of the admission of women into the college was referred to a committee consisting of President Stearns, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and Rev. Dr. Paine, of Holden, who will thoroughly investigate the subject, and report in October.

During the dreadful days through which Paris has passed a little girl scarcely eight years old was arrested as she was in the act of throwing petroleum into a cellar. There is something very sad in the reply she made to some interrogatives, showing as it does to what extent the hands of little children wrought ruin in their own city. "Ah," said the child, "you will have enough to do if you want to take us all up, for there are 8000 of us, and some smaller than I am."

"The Beleaguered Cook" is the name of a curious specimen of literature which made its appearance during the siege of Paris. It treats of the culinary art under the limits imposed upon it by the siege.

The reconstruction of the house of M. Thiers, with the veranda, the hot-houses, and the gardens, will cost more than 850,000 francs; and lost furniture and the works of art destroyed come to about 300,000 francs. Total, 1,150,000 francs.

A delicate task it was to select from two thousand young ladies of Berlin one who should have the honor of presenting the golden laurel wreath and delivering the ode of welcome to the Emperor William upon his entrance into his capital. More than that number, however, made application for the position; and the one finally intrusted with the task was selected not only because of her great beauty, but also because she had distinguished herself during the war as a hospital nurse. The Emperor will hereafter take care of the lady, and in case of her marriage give her a dower of $5000.

Chignons, plaits, and curls may now be made of a most unobjectionable material—namely, spun glass. This is the very latest substitute for hair.

A "Boston party" visited the Nevada silver mines not many months ago. On coming out of the tunnel one of the gentlemen offered the guide—who chanced to be one of the principal owners of the mine—half a dollar for his trouble. The miner looked at the money a moment, and then, turning to the donor, said, "May I ask you how much you are estimated at home to be worth?"

"About twenty-five thousand dollars," replied the Bostonian.

"Well," said the miner, "I guess I won't take your half dollar; I made a quarter of a million here last month."

Kaulbach's famous cartoon of "The Great Reformation," for which its present owner paid $25,000, enjoys the honor of being rolled up and stowed away in one of the cotton mills at Fall River. The owner has been offered a larger sum than he gave for the cartoon, but refuses to sell at any price.

America may lose the honor so long claimed that maize, or Indian corn, is indigenous to its soil. It has lately been contested, and recent investigations of certain Chinese records are cited to prove that it was cultivated in China prior to the discovery of America. Chinese authors maintain that it came originally from countries west of China, and that it was introduced into that country long before the first arrival of the Portuguese in 1517.

It must be a peculiar aggravation to fall heir to $150,000 when in prison. Such, however, is the fate of an inmate of Auburn prison. The criminal's term there will soon expire; but then he will be tried on an indictment for robbery at Syracuse. So it is doubtful if he derives much pleasure from his wealth at present.

Writers on health must be careful how they recommend innovations which disturb domestic peace. A country editor, who carries concealed weapons, is searching for the writer who sent his wife a circular recommending that carpets should be taken up and beaten every month.

An exchange asserts that "forty women of all sexes" are enrolled in the Texas Female Suffrage Society.

A Portland man, by having his wits about him, and a plentiful supply of eggs, saved the life of his wife a week or two ago. She had swallowed a dose of corrosive sublimate by mistake, and the frightened neighbors had given her over for as good as dead, when her husband, fortunately returning home, promptly administered the whites of fifteen eggs, which completely neutralized the poison.

Samovar is the name given to a large sort of urn which adorns the Russian tea-table. In the centre of this urn is a tube, into which hot coal is introduced, which keeps the water constantly boiling. A strong infusion, nearly essence of tea, is made in a small tea-pot, a small quantity of which is poured into tumblers, and each guest adds water and sugar to his taste. The Russians say that tea which makes only a land voyage is much superior to that which passes over the sea.

Holland ladies, remarks a recent writer, do a great deal of house-work in the early morning, and throughout the day; they disdain to have done for them what they can do for themselves. Until "coffee-drinking," at twelve o'clock, a visitor must expect to see little of the ladies. The pickling and preserving, the preparation of fruit for the table, those mighty dishes of beans and pease, the side-dishes and other delicacies for the day, all bear signs of a delicate touch and a cultivated intelligence.

The following specimen of Chicago "personals" may afford a useful hint to editors of newspapers: "T. J. Falls was his name, And I shall not deny, With regard to the same, That he came from Shanghai, And he put up last night at the Sherman, Considerably close to the sky." And while touching upon poetical topics, we may as well show what a Western journalist succeeded in producing when he drew upon his memory for quotations about woman. It was this: "Oh, woman, in our hours of ease, Uncertain, coy, and hard to please; But seen too oft, familiar with her face, We first endure, then pity, then embrace." Shades of Scott and Pope, defend us!

Some parents have a theory that children should not cry, and this theory they endeavor to carry out by striving to suppress in their young children the natural expression of pain by inculcating fortitude. Doubtless this is useful to a certain extent, and a definite distinction should be made between the crying that comes from pain and that which is the mere outburst of angry feeling. A French physician has published a lengthy essay on the advantages of groaning and crying in general. He contends that these are two grand operations by which nature allays anguish; that patients who give way to their natural feelings more speedily recover from accidents and surgical operations than those who suppose it unworthy a man to betray such symptoms of cowardice as either to groan or cry. He tells of a man who reduced his pulse from one hundred and twenty-six to sixty in the course of a few hours by giving full vent to his emotions. If this is true parents may well show indulgence to their children in this respect, and allow nature to relieve from physical and mental pain.

What cures one person of some disease or difficulty will not always cure another who is apparently affected in the same way. Yet it is worth while to know remedies which have been successfully used, particularly in such a troublesome and fickle disturbance as neuralgia. A relieved New England gentleman says: "Take two large table-spoonfuls of Cologne, and two tea-spoonfuls of fine salt; mix them together in a small bottle. Every time you have any acute affection of the facial nerves, or neuralgia, simply breathe the fumes from the bottle through your nose, and you will be immediately relieved."

"The chest of a well-proportioned man has been known to expand three inches, by actual measurement, in as many weeks after arriving in Colorado." Such is the statement, though we did not measure the man. The air of Colorado Territory is pure and rare, partly owing to its great elevation above the level of the sea. One breathes faster and fuller in consequence, and the breathing apparatus is strengthened by exercise. That climate is considered excellent for bronchial and pulmonary diseases, though an invalid who seeks permanent restoration must abide there permanently.

Young writers for the public journals would do well to practice curtailing the beginning and end of each article they prepare after it is finished. No matter how necessary your introduction seems, or how beautiful your exordium, cut them off. This will leave the substance of what you have really got to say, which, after all, is what people want to read, and therefore what editors want to publish. An experienced editor says that almost every article presented by unpracticed writers to magazines, no matter how admirable the subject, drifts to leeward for one or two pages before the writer gets steerage-way on his thoughts, and the reader learns to what point the writer wants to sail.

A STROLL ON SHINGLETON BEACH,

AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

IT was easy enough to see that the post-bag which had been just deposited upon the breakfast-table at Poynings had not brought any particularly welcome news. The intelligent domestic who came up within a few minutes of the arrival of the letters to ask at what hour the carriage should come round opined at once, and opined rightly, that something was wrong. The Rev. Mr. Poynings—the master of Poynings was a clergyman who considered that he had rendered sufficient service to his Church, and had now retired upon his laurels and his private means, which were more than considerable—found fault with the coffee. It was not drinkable, he said; and life without coffee was not, in the opinion of this reverend critic, worth having. Mrs. Poynings exhibited her general dissatisfaction with censuring the atmosphere. Such a June, she declared, she had never known. Mr. Poynings's footman—a shrewd observer—felt quite satisfied with himself that when his master condemned the mocha, and his mistress the climate, the true and real ground of grievance was something different from either. An open letter lay before Mr. Poynings, and an uncracked egg was on Mrs. Poynings's plate. Directly John, the footman, reached the servants' hall he put a leading question to the butler. "Arris, did ye see who the letter was from? Master's in a regular taking with something this morning; and I s'pect it's that post-bag." But the sagacious Harris could not explain why it should be the post-bag, for the only letters which it contained were, he declared, tradesmen's circulars, with one exception, and that was an envelope directed in a lady's hand, and was, he thought, from Miss Minna.

Nevertheless John was right and Harris was wrong. It was, as the penetrative footman had so shrewdly suspected, the post-bag which was the cause of the discomfiture in the breakfast-room. The coffee was, as usual, excellent, and as for the weather—well, it was not worse than in England June weather very often is. That envelope, directed in the feminine MS., from whom did it come?

Both Mr. and Mrs. Poynings, if they were favored with a very abundant share of the good things of this world, knew also not a little of this world's sorrows. Two sons, and two only, they had. Each had gone wrong, and each was now removed beyond the possibility of repairing his error on this side of the grave. Dick Poynings, whom his father hoped to see at least on the episcopal bench, achieved when he was at Oxford the reputation of being the best steeple-chase rider that the under-graduate world had ever known. But here the academical distinction of the young man ended. When he took his degree the only substantial evidence of university education that he took with him was a very pretty number of debts. They were all paid by Mr. Poynings, who went up to Oxford with his solicitor for the occasion, and whose outspoken opinions on the iniquity of encouraging mere boys to run into debt are still remembered by more than one tradesman on the Isis. Eventually Dick Poynings went to the Cape. His fate was not an unusual one. The hero of a hundred fights is run over and killed by a hansom cab; and the man who has returned home alive and unscathed by the most trying climate in the world by degrees succumbs to the slow poison of his friends' Champagne. Dick Poynings, who had braved the perils of endless steeple-chases on the most incurable of Oxford screws, was riding over some land which he had bought for farming purposes, when a dense fog came on: his horse stumbled and fell; the rider was precipitated against a stone, and was killed almost instantaneously. The end of Charles Poynings, the other son, was more tragic. The lad had always exhibited a penchant for play. One fine morning about ten years ago the body of a young Englishman was found in the Black Forest, near Baden, quite dead, with a bullet through his head. The young Englishman happened to be Mr. Charles Poynings. It was known that he had played heavily and lost seriously on the previous night. There would probably have been a scandal, but the pres... authorities hushed the matter up, and nobody ever knew any more about it, except, indeed, his father and mother. Now the effect of sorrow is to sour: the effect, that is, on every other temperament than the purely angelic; and sorrows are souring—it may seem strange, but it is very true—in exact proportion to the worldly prosperity of their victims. The death of their two sons had quite caused the gladness and joy of their parents' lives to be utterly extinguished.

No doubt there was wild blood in the Poynings' veins; but that was no consolation to the bereaved father and mother. It was a strange and perhaps unfortunate coincidence which gave them when their sorrow was darkest and most hopeless a new object for care and thought. Mr. Poynings's sister, Mrs. Temple, died, and, dying, left her only son, Harry Temple, to her brother's care. The charge was accepted with a certain sense of relief, and the boy became a kind of son to his uncle and aunt. But his subsequent career was far from satisfactory. He, too, showed himself to have inherited a dash of the Poynings blood. But there had been as yet nothing disastrous. He was in debt already, but that was a matter of course. He had left Oxford with a character that may not have been beyond reproach, but a character which was still the reverse of discreditable. But the worst of Harry Temple was that he would not settle down. Professionally a barrister, he was in reality a lounger, and he was nothing more. He betted a little and he played a little; he was popular and he was extravagant. But he was only five-and-twenty. Perhaps Mr. and Mrs. Poynings expected of their nephew, toward whom their hearts yearned, more than they ought. They certainly expected more than the result justified.

"I can't understand it—upon my word of honor I can not," said Mr. Poynings, on the morning to which we have already alluded, taking up the letter contained in the envelope directed in the feminine MS.

"It is very bad indeed, very!" repeated Mrs. Poynings; "and yet it might have been worse. Do you not think, Richard, yourself that it might have been worse?"

"Worse!" echoed the old man, "can any thing be worse than black ingratitude such as this?"

We will just look at the letter which had given rise to these observations. Directed though the envelope was by a writer who was not Henry Temple, the communication which it contained was from that gentleman for all that. The writer prefaced his epistle by a statement to the effect that he was well aware that the news which he had to convey would surprise, and possibly pain, his uncle; that he (the writer) admitted fully and unreservedly that he had acted hastily, perhaps wrongly. Still he hoped for pardon. In a word, he had married. He had known the young lady for some little time, and he hoped that his uncle and aunt would accept her as niece.

"Astounding impudence," Mr. Poynings had murmured, when he came to this portion of the letter. "'Perfect lady,' of course. When a young scamp marries in haste the first girl he sees, of course she is a 'perfect lady,'" sneered Mr. Poynings.

But the sneer was misplaced. For Ethel Temple, who was last week Ethel Noblitt, was a lady in every sense of that word, though her mother had been an actress—she had gone to her rest when Ethel was scarcely three years old—and her father was a half-pay captain, the independence of whose life was only tempered by his impecuniosity.

By mutual and tacit consent scarcely another word was said that morning by Mr. or Mrs. Poynings on the subject of their nephew's letter.

"I suppose this is her writing," said the reverend master of Poynings, reading the envelope, which, as has been said, was not addressed by Mr. Henry Temple.

II.

Change of air, that was the necessity Mr. Poynings's medical man impressed upon his patient.

"My dear Sir, there must be complete and entire change of air. The sea would do you a world of good. Take my advice, Mr. Poynings, and go to Shingleton. It's just the climate to add twenty years to your life."

It was an odd thing that the letter which Mr. Henry Temple had addressed to his uncle, and which was still unanswered, was dated Shingleton. The medical recommendation was accepted and acted on; and in less than a week Mr. and Mrs. Poynings were installed at Shingleton.

A pretty spot, and one which has, as all the world knows, acquired a marvelous amount of popularity in an incredibly short time. Invalids repair to Shingleton for its invigorating breezes; young men and strong for its pleasant society, and its wonderful opportunity to the yachtsman. Shingleton is also especially favored by wedded couples who are in the full celebration of their honey-moons. There is enough of distraction to prevent Edwin becoming heartily ennuyé with Angelina. But not so much that he is tempted away prematurely from her side. For the wedded couple, fresh from the altar, complete solitude is an utter blunder. The face which would bore you in the desert acquires additional charm when set off by human accompaniments. If you decide upon spending a week at Shingleton this summer you will act wisely if you put up at the Mere Hotel. It overlooks the sea. Its arrangements are excellent. It is always full, but it is never crowded; mine host is obliging, and the waiters know their work. If you wish for seclusion you can have it; and if you wish for society, there is the table d'hôte, and most agreeable improvised dances are subsequently devised in the saloon. Mr. and Mrs. Poynings had sent on a servant to engage rooms, and by a lucky chance they were obtained. Not, however, those which exactly suited the somewhat whimsical temperament of the reverend gentleman. Mr. Poynings was placed on the drawing-room floor, and he would have preferred the ground. But the suite on the ground-floor, the waiter informed Mr. Poynings, was already occupied by a lady and gentleman—Mr. and Mrs. Temple.

A very agreeable little dinner-party was going on that night on the ground-floor at the Mere Hotel, in Mr. and Mrs. Temple's apartments. Henry Temple—for it was, in truth, he who had anticipated Mr. Poynings, and who was then staying with his bride at Shingleton—had met more than one old friend on the Shingleton beach. Frank Martyn was there, and Frank's two sisters, staying with their married sister—Mrs. Massareene; and Bob Kennedy had most unexpectedly turned up in Sir John Sutherland's yacht. Henry Temple, as he well might be, was most indisputably proud of his wife, and he had experienced no small satisfaction when he had introduced her that afternoon on the Shingleton beach to his friends. By a kind of intuition he knew at once from the reception accorded her that she was a success.

"No answer to the Poynings letter," thought Henry to himself: "rather bad, certainly; but it will, it must, be all right. Only wait till they see her. I'd give a thousand pounds—if I had it—could some chance bring my uncle and aunt to Shingleton."

Frank Martyn was an old college friend of Mr. Temple's, and the pair smoked a bachelor pipe tête-à-tête that evening after the little party was concluded. Frank had congratulated his quondam chum on the newly made Mrs. Temple.

"Yes, Frank," observed Mr. Temple, "she's as good as gold every inch of her. But that only makes me the more anxious. If my uncle takes it as I expect he will, I don't see how we are to exist. I have written to him, and he has answered me not a word. What, in Heaven's name, would you advise me to do?"

"See him, Harry, see him by all means, at once, and let him see her, and then all must be right." But the interview was that which of all things Mr. Temple dreaded.

Foolish! Yes, he had been foolish, no doubt, and wrong too. But it was too late to decide what would have been the proper course to pursue. He could only hope that the fair young creature whom he had made his wife might never have cause to repent the oath which she had plighted only a week since. Then there was the financial aspect of the question, and that was not re-assuring. The exchequer was already low, and Henry was by no means clear as to how its replenishment was to be managed. They had probably done wrong in going to Shingleton; and the Mere Hotel was pleasant, but not especially economical. These were the thoughts which occupied Mr. Henry Temple as he sank to sleep. But with the morning came light and hope and new happiness. It surely would, it must, be all right; and as Harry came from his dressing-room he kissed his wife, and said, "Courage, darling! I dare say to-day's post will bring us good news; and if it doesn't—well, I have a head and I have a hand."

Mr. Poynings's first night at the Mere Hotel, Shingleton, was not restful. "Mr. and Mrs. Temple" almost the very first names he heard in the place. Who were they? Well, the waiter's description left no doubt on that head. Photograph could not have been more faithful than the sketch given by the intelligent menial aforesaid of Mr. Poynings's nephew. The Mere Hotel waiter was loud in their praises. It was the old story,

"Hervey, the handsome, had wedded
The beautiful Molly Lepel."

When Mr. Poynings, the following morning, inquired whether Mr. and Mrs. Temple were in their rooms, he was informed that they had been gone out about an hour.

III.

It was pleasant to sit on Shingleton beach in that glorious July weather, pleasant to watch the waves idly advancing and receding on the sand, pleasant to see the children at play, pleasant to note the loungers as they strolled by, and pleasant to inhale the glorious breeze that came straight away over the Atlantic. Both Mr. and Mrs. Poynings, seated on a bench on Shingleton beach, observed all these things and enjoyed them. They said little, but there were more thoughts in the mind of each than were spoken. It was a scene full of animation, for the morning was bright, and Shingleton beach was covered with loungers. Mr. and Mrs. Poynings were both absorbed in thought, and beyond gazing abstractedly at the sea, paid little attention to external objects. By those who gossiped and promenaded along the shore, however, the pair were not unnoticed. Frank Martyn knew Mr. Poynings well; and great was his surprise on turning suddenly round—he was with his sister and the two Colchester girls—to see the uncle and aunt of his intimate friend seated a few yards off.

A STROLL ON SHINGLETON BEACH.

"Laura," he said to his sister, "look there! As I live that is Mr. Poynings, Temple's uncle, and his wife. And here is Harry himself. Now for the recognition!"

Very much occupied with each other did the newly wedded couple, to whom Mr. Martyn pointed, seem. Henry Temple and his wife it certainly was; and close beneath the very eyes of Mr. Poynings did the pair pass. It was the accents of a well-known voice that arrested Mr. Poynings's ear: "All will come right, child"—those were the words. He looked up, and he saw before him his nephew and his wife. "All will come right!" There was a look of tranquil and loving confidence on either's face which was very pleasant to note. As Mr. and Mrs. Poynings watched them, they both thought that they had never seen two people whose faces were eloquent of happiness so perfect. Henry Temple was forgiven from the first moment that Mr. and Mrs. Poynings knew that they were in the presence of Henry Temple and his wife.

A long ramble, past the merry groups on Shingleton beach, went the newly wedded couple. It was late in the afternoon when they returned to the Mere Hotel; and a note from Mr. Poynings lay on the table addressed to "Henry Temple, Esq." Yes, it had all come right, and the uncle was prepared to forgive his self-willed nephew, and to accept his newly found niece. In the interval, however, since breakfast, other good agencies than those of Mrs. Temple's bonny face had been at work for the nephew. Frank Martyn had had a long interview with Mr. Poynings, and Frank's powers as a special pleader on his friend's behalf were exercised with as much of effect as they were of energy.

Within five minutes of the receipt of the letter from Mr. Poynings Henry Temple was in his uncle's presence. What passed there we need not say. It is enough to know that one of the results between uncle and nephew was that Mrs. Temple was in a very little space of time in her uncle's presence—an accepted niece. As Harry himself had declared would be the case, "it had all come right;" and when Mr. Martyn, who had dined with the whole party, bade his friends, some hours subsequently, good-night, he was able to say that he had not taken too sanguine a view of matters on the day previous, and that as much as ever he could wish had come of the stroll on Shingleton beach.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

PARIS presents a strange aspect at this moment; one which it never has had before and never will have again. We do not mean its ruins—those sombre and appalling memorials of its dissensions. But, scarcely emerged from an era of fire and pillage, the brilliant city appears anew, glittering with precious stones and adorned with new fashions. The shops look more beautiful than ever, and are more than ever full of marvels of luxury and art. Plumed bonnets, fresh muslin dresses, sheeny gauzes, and sparkling jewels are displayed in the windows; while all the ladies seen in the streets are in black. As they pass they cast a melancholy glance at these temptations, and seem to say, "All this is not for us!"

Indeed, scarcely is Paris pacified when orders for every kind of luxury pour in from all corners of the earth. The workshops are re-opened and every one is busy. But all this magnificence is for strangers. The Parisian ladies will wear mourning for a long time to come. The theatres are crowded, but the spectators are foreigners and countrymen. Many fashionable women are here; many stars of the imperial court have returned; yet no equipages are seen in the streets, and the houses are all closed at eleven o'clock at night.

Princess Mathilde has quietly resumed possession of her villa at St. Gratian, near Paris. The belles of last season are recognized in the simplest toilettes. For instance, the other day I met the Marquise de Gallifet in a little Huguenot hat of black beaver, bound with velvet, and trimmed with a plain jet buckle, and a black silk dress, without paniers, and trimmed only with three flounces, separated by black velvet. A wrapping of embroidered black cashmere completed the costume, while a long flowing veil of black tulle half concealed the face of the most celebrated of the blonde marquises of the imperial reign.

It is curious to meet the Comte de Paris in a fiacre, and the Duc d'Angoulême on foot, with his umbrella under his arm, in plain citizen's dress, gazing at the pile of ruins which was once the Tuileries, the palace of their ancestors, with faces full of an emotion which showed that they had not forgotten France.

But to return to our subject, the fashions, of which our fair readers are doubtless impatient to hear. At the last ball of the Princess of Wales, at Marlborough House, all the dresses were from Paris, as they were at the marriage of Prince Paul Demidoff with the young Princess Trombetskoi. Two dresses at the Marlborough House ball were especially admired. One was of cloud blue tulle over blue taffetas, with a train of blue faille veiled with lace, and covered with a shower of snow-balls. Corsage of cloud blue tulle, with square basques behind, edged with a ruche interspersed with snow-balls. Sash tied at the side, and falling in long ends. The other dress was of white muslin over a trailing skirt of sky blue velvet, trimmed with two pleated flounces of sky blue faille, separated by wide Valenciennes lace. White muslin tunic opening over a blue velvet skirt, and edged with a fall of Valenciennes lace. The revers of the muslin tunic were caught together in the back with flat bows of blue velvet. Christina of Sweden corsage of sky blue velvet, with large basques in front, and of blue faille covered with white muslin in the back.

At the marriage of the Prince Demidoff the toilette of the Princess K——, which was charmingly original, attracted much notice. Fancy a long trained skirt of white faille, with a very deep flounce, striped with transverse bands of black velvet. Skirt of white crêpe de Chine trimmed with a narrow flounce of black lace, and a double flounce of Bruges lace caught up behind in paniers by several bows of black velvet, and a black velvet bow with long flowing ends at the left side. Black velvet corsage, with large Charles IX. basque in the back, edged with Bruges lace. A very small demi-corsage of white faille covers the black velvet one only in the back, and epaulets of Bruges lace are set on the sleeves, which are finished with large black velvet cuffs edged with Bruges lace.

The béret is the style of hat most in vogue just now for street wear. This invariably has a flat crown and a tulle ruche underneath, and is tied in front or under the chignon with gros grain ribbon strings. The béret, when worn too small, is very unbecoming, and is at best a trying style for any but very young girls. It looks like an infant's cap, with its tulle ruche encircling the face, and may be worn by a young girl of twenty, but is absurd on middle-aged women. It is trimmed in innumerable ways. Most commonly the crown is encircled with gros grain ribbon, and an aigrette of curled feathers is set at the side. When made of black straw one or two black falcon's plumes, that follow the curve of the crown, form the trimming. The béret is also made of crêpe de Chine, which is the only stuff permissible. As to round hats, all styles are seen, from the sailor hat, with low crown and flat brim, to the archduchess toquet, with high crown and turned-up brim, and large plumes falling over the hair. ¶It may be said of a round hat that, provided it is pretty, fashion authorizes every thing.

For the street the Marguerite of Navarre vest is universally worn. This is of black cashmere, with very deep basques, confined at the waist and loose in front, with very large sleeves. This vest must be banded with soutache to be elegant. It is embroidered with marguerites, stars, or corn-poppies, all in black, and is edged with black curled feathers and fine passementerie. The vest is lined with white silk.

Mantles formed of a double cape are made in the same style. Vests embroidered in colors, and trimmed with black point d'Argenton, laid on flat, or black guipure, and a ruche of Valenciennes, are worn in carriages. When these vests are made of colored cashmere they are embroidered in the same shade; but in this case the tunic must correspond. Chamois over a skirt of Cordova leather faille is in perfect taste.

At the Ascot races many plain colored muslin dresses, trimmed with Valenciennes ruches, were seen. These dresses are admirably suited to sailing and fishing parties. They are made in the style of the Louis XV. redingote, with a pouf behind and a tablier in front, and are trimmed with a profusion of ribbons and pinked silk ruches. They are very coquettish. The hat is often of the same muslin, trimmed with a lace ruche and flower at the side, and another just over the ear. A lady in one of these costumes looks like a little Bourbon marchioness risen from the dead; but, of course, she must be as young and fresh as the spring.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

THE GOOD OF IDLENESS.

I THINK we can always notice in a family group whether or not there is a good intellectual tone—much mental activity or not. You have the best opportunity for raising the general tone when young people are withdrawn from their special studies. Let nothing that I say be understood in the depreciation of idleness.. Idleness, pure and unmixed, is one of the greatest luxuries of human life. It also is a luxury peculiarly appropriate to the holiday season. On the same principle, I am very much in favor of lying in bed late of a morning. Theoretically I hold the latitudinarian principle, but practically I am a tolerably early riser. The more sleep you give the brain, the better quality does the brain become, and the better is the energy and harmonious play of the whole system. Sleep as much as you can, and, in consequence, as late as you can, but never lie in bed after you awake, "thinking," as you are sometimes pleased to term it. It is all a mistake. It is the worst kind of debauch—as bad as dram-taking. I do not believe that there is any real quality of thought in such morning reveries. Similarly of the delights of idleness, the pleasures of the Castle of Indolence, some qualifying language must be used. I know of no greater pleasure than to saunter about for a whole day with one's hands in one's pockets, and with a steady determination to think, wait, and do nothing at all. And let me tell you, courteous reader, that in order to do this with proper effect a man ought to be on tolerably good terms with his own conscience; otherwise some dark influences will begin to brew disquiet in his mind. But this idleness is a first-rate clarifying process. Without any settled, studious effort of the mind, the subjects which had troubled you will begin to take shape and form. All kind of matters, which had been waiting for a quiet hour of deliberation, will gradually, and almost without a conscious effort, be satisfactorily disposed of. Moreover, your idle day, to be perfectly idle and happy, must not be haunted by the corroding recollection that there is something to be done. Such idle days are as rare as happy days, of which the Caliph could only score up eleven; and it may be that the happy day and the idle day are synonymous. I know of no greater luxury than to wake up in the morning thinking that it is seven and finding that it is nine. I always calculate on a feeling of intense vitality for that day, and an extra amount of my very limited power of doing and enduring.

SEA-SIDE FANCIES.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

L. H. G.—Joan of Arc and Jeanne Darc are one and the same person. The latter is the correct orthography.—Decoration-day, or the 30th of May, is a legal holiday.—Napoleonic is an English word, and consequently not accented.

E. S. H.—Read the "Ugly Girl" articles in the Bazar. Mix glycerine with water before applying it to your skin.

A BOSTON GIRL.—Young ladies of eighteen or nineteen do not wear their hair flowing to the waist. Your other questions are too trivial to require an answer.

ETIQUETTE.—If you are acquainted with the persons whom your friend is visiting, you should inquire for them when calling on her. Otherwise, this is not necessary.

A SKEPTIC.—The advertiser in our columns whom you mention is not a man of straw, but a veritable personage. Probably he either did not receive your letter, or thought it of too little importance to answer.

SALLY AND MAGGIE.—We never heard the ill-fated Mary Stuart styled the Queen of Tears; but can imagine no more appropriate epithet for the beautiful, fascinating sovereign who met so hard a fate, and whose misfortunes did not end with her death, but were continued in the persecution of her memory.

EPISCOPALIAN.—"The little church around the corner" is the Church of the Transfiguration, in East Twenty-ninth Street, between Fifth and Madison avenues, under the charge of the Rev. Dr. Houghton. It is one of the most picturesque edifices in New York.

BRUNETTE.—To make invisible or sympathetic ink take an ounce and a half of zaffer, or the residuum left after the sulphur, arsenic, and other volatile substances are expelled from cobalt by calcination; put it into a glass vessel with a long and narrow neck, and pour over it an ounce of strong nitrous acid diluted with five parts of water. Keep it in a warm place for ten or twelve hours, and then decant the clearest portion of the liquid. Having done this, pour about as much more of the diluted acid on what remains, which must be kept as long as before, and then be decanted and mixed with what was obtained by the first operation. All this being done, dissolve in the liquid two ounces of common salt, and the ink is ready for use. Write with a clean quill pen on white paper; and as long as the writing is exposed to the ordinary temperature of the air it is invisible. When the paper is heated at a fire or in the hot sun the characters will appear; but they become invisible again as soon as the paper cools.

L. T. B.—None but graduates of the New York city public schools can enter the city Normal School and College. The State Normal School at Albany is open to graduates from all parts of the State.

MICHIGAN GIRL.—We answer no questions about MSS. in this column.

ANNA.—Your plaid dress will look well made by pattern of Short-Sacque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Trim it with black velvet ribbon.

AN OLD MAID.—Wash goods—even thin Swiss muslins and organdy—are now made into basques without lining, but cut precisely as silks and poplins are.

JAMES.—Do not try to alter your short over-skirt. You can not do it very well, and next season it may be in fashion. The silk skirt under a grenadine suit serves merely as a petticoat, or else it has grenadine flounces high enough to conceal the silk. If you object to the expense of silk, use farmer's satin as a lining or a petticoat. An old silk dyed black will answer also.

B.—A lace or a piqué turban is suitable for a boy of six months. Make your empress cloth by cut paper pattern of Apron-Polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV.—We do not feel ourselves at liberty to disclose the real name of an author who uses a nom de plume.

DOLLIE AND SUE.—Hats of Swiss muslin shirred on reeds, a Leghorn flat with China crape scarf, or an English turban of white straw or black Neapolitan trimmed with gros grain ribbon of a becoming color—any or all of these will answer for church wear in the country.

ITALIA.—Your sample is the poorest quality of Japanese poplin. We can't say what it costs, as it is peddled about the country at various prices. It is utterly worthless. Slippers and low buskins are worn at home at all hours of the day and evening.—You should consult the gentleman to whom you are engaged in regard to accepting attentions from other gentlemen.

FELICE.—With your silk dresses wear a pointed collar of Valenciennes or other lace, or else a linen collar trimmed with lace. Baste pleated Swiss muslin, either plain or edged with Valenciennes, inside your flowing sleeves. You can buy Swiss pleating ready made. Under-sleeves are too warm for summer. White lace sacques are appropriate over silk or grenadine dresses at receptions.

HENRY L.—Young gentlemen wear turned-down collars very low at the throat. Their neck-ties are solid colors or else stripes. White silk handkerchiefs are being used again.

S. J. B.—"Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East" costs $7 50.

MRS. E. M. D.—Trim your black silk with lace; your purple with passementerie and fringe.

MOTHER.—Infants' outfits are often advertised in our columns. They cost, according to quality and quantity, from $75 to $200. For $75 you get half a dozen of each of the articles worn by an infant. They are plainly made, but in the neatest manner. Any furnishing house quoted in our New York Fashions will supply you.—We do not give addresses in this column.

R. M. O.—A plain basque, coat-sleeves, and a slightly gored skirt, untrimmed and just touching the floor, is the design for an old lady's silk dress.

STYLISH YOUNG LADY.—Your sample is not Irish poplin, but the poorest counterfeit of it. Make and trim it as plainly as possible, for the fabric does not justify expense.

L. C. M.—If you do not like the burnous drapery in the over-skirt, gather it all to the belt, though that fashion is very popular. Trim your Frou Frou brown dress with darker nut brown bands, bias, of silk, or else of a woolen stuff similar to sample. We can not change parts of patterns.

MRS. G. E.—The Apron-Polonaise Suit pattern sent you is prettily made up in a variety of fabrics both for morning and afternoon, house and street wear. Get piqué and striped percale, and make by wrapper pattern in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV. Make a Swiss muslin polonaise by pattern sent you, and wear over a black or other silk for afternoon and evening. Buff or gray linen polonaises made similarly are worn over silk for morning and for traveling.

MARY G.—Your ideas of making and looping the grenadine over silk are good. Put two rows of ruffling or of side pleating on the grenadine. The corsage should be a basque of grenadine on silk, or else a box-pleated waist worn over a high black silk waist.

KITTIE.—Wear your thick long hair in two hanging braids, with water-fall curls between and a Pompadour roll in front. Make your stone-colored poplin suit by cut paper pattern of Apron-Polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV. Trim with darker silk, not with blue. Wear bonnets for dress, hats for négligé. Trim your pink and white silk with pleated Swiss muslin ruffles alternating with others of the striped silk bias.

HOWARD & CO.,
No. 865 Broadway, New York.

We make only one style, and have but one price for our Pianos, which are all made from thoroughly seasoned and kiln-dried materials, and have seven octaves—rosewood case—carved legs and lyre—large square grand overstrung scale—front round corners—serpentine bottom—iron plate—French action—and are all warranted five years. We have no agents, and allow no commissions or discounts to any one. This explains how we can sell a good Piano for $290, which is about the price Piano dealers pay to manufacturers for instruments similar to ours. Piano dealers are allowed by all manufacturers, except ourselves, to add 100 per cent., and upward, profit to all sales. This the public can prove by investigation to be strictly true. Piano dealers, teachers, professors, and everybody else, are excluded from any and every possibility of a single cent of commission on our Pianos. If you wish a Piano sent for trial, you must make the matter of reference and payment unquestionable; and if the instrument is in any respect inferior to any Piano made in the known world at any price, you may send it back to us at the end of ten days' trial, instead of paying for it. If you order a Piano sent, we have one request to make; and that is, that the trial shall be made by parties who are not interested in other Pianos. Please send for our Circulars containing full particulars and references to bankers, merchants, and families, in thirty-five States and Territories, who are using our Pianos. Address or apply to the

BUCHU.

[From Dispensatory of the United States.]

DIOSMA CRENATA—BUCHU LEAVES.

PROPERTIES.—Their odor is strong, diffusive, and somewhat aromatic; their taste bitterish and analogous to mint.

MEDICAL PROPERTIES AND USES.—Buchu leaves are gently stimulant, with a peculiar tendency to the Urinary Organs.

They are given in complaints of the Urinary Organs, such as Gravel, Chronic Catarrh of the Bladder, Morbid Irritation of the Bladder and Urethra, Disease of the Prostate Gland, and Retention or Incontinence of Urine, from a loss of tone in the parts concerned in its evacuation. The remedy has also been recommended in Dyspepsia, Chronic Rheumatism, Cutaneous Affections, and Dropsy.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU is used by persons from the ages of 18 to 25, and from 35 to 55, or in the decline or change of life; after Confinement or Labor Pains; Bed-Wetting in children.

In affections peculiar to Females the Extract Buchu is unequaled by any other remedy.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has cured every case of Diabetes in which it has been given. Irritation of the Neck of the Bladder and Inflammation of the Kidneys, Ulceration of the Kidneys and Bladder, Retention of Urine, Diseases of the Prostate Gland, Stone in the Bladder, Calculus, Gravel, Brick-Dust Deposit, and Mucous or Milky Discharges, and for enfeebled and delicate constitutions of both sexes attended with the following symptoms: Indisposition to Exertion, Loss of Power, Loss of Memory, Difficulty of Breathing, Weak Nerves, Trembling, Horror of Disease, Wakefulness, Dimness of Vision, Pain in the Back, Hot Hands, Flushing of the Body, Dryness of the Skin, Eruption on the Face, Pallid Countenance, Universal Lassitude of the Muscular System, &c.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU is Diuretic and Blood-Purifying, and cures all diseases arising from habits of dissipation, excesses and imprudences in life, impurities of the Blood, &c., superseding Copaiba in affections for which it is used, in connection with HELMBOLD'S ROSE WASH.

Ask for Helmbold's. Take no other.

Describe symptoms in all communications.

HELMBOLD'S FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA,

The Great Blood Purifier and Beautifier of the Complexion.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

No more delightful travels are printed in the English language than appear perpetually in Harper's Magazine. They are read with equal interest and satisfaction by boys of every grade from eighteen to eighty. Its scientific papers, while sufficiently profound to demand the attention of the learned, are yet admirably adapted to the popular understanding, and designed as much to diffuse correct information concerning current scientific discovery as it could be if it was the organ of the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There are few intelligent American families in which Harper's Magazine would not be an appreciated and highly welcome guest. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

HARPER'S BAZAR
Pattern — Pleasure — Instruction

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Harper's Bazar at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

By all means buy Harper's Bazar. Not for yourself, but for your wife or daughter or sister or sweetheart. There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet: it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

FACETIÆ.

"DON'T a Quaker ever take off his hat to any one, Sir?"

"No, my boy, never."

"Then, Sir, if he don't take off his hat to a barber, how does he ever get his hair cut?"

HEIGHT OF AGGRAVATION.—Wet morning; bad street band in full blare before the house of literary man, writing an article and suffering from toothache; loud ring at the bell; servant, called off from a pressing domestic duty—making the beds, or minding the baby, or something of the sort—proceeds the whole length of the front garden to find at the gate one of the instrumentalists, who invites payment for the torture inflicted by himself and his fellow-fiends.

MAXIM.—Give a child a bat, and most likely it 'll bawl.

A good anecdote is told of a house-painter's son, who used the brush dextrously, but had acquired the habit of putting it on too thick. One day his father, after having frequently scolded him for his lavish daubing, and all to no purpose, gave him a severe flagellation. "There, you young rascal," he said, after performing his painful duty, "how do you like that?"

"Well, I don't know," whined the boy, in reply; "but it seems to me that you put it on a thunderin' sight thicker than I did."

Why is a hole in your shoe like harvesting operations?—Because it's reaparable.

A Baptist minister, living somewhere on the frontier of Missouri, was in the habit of saying to his family and to his church: "Friends, you need not take any unusual care of your lives; the moment of your death was writ before the foundation of the world, and you can not alter it." His wife observed, when he left on Saturday to meet one of his frontier missionary engagements, that he dressed the flint of his rifle with unusual care, put in dry powder, fresh tow, and took pains to make sure that the gun would go off in case he came upon an Indian. It struck her one day as she saw him in the saddle, with his rifle on his shoulder, that his conduct contradicted his teaching. "Yes," he replied, "to be sure, my dear, of course you are right, and that is a very proper view; but see here, my dear—now—really—suppose I should meet an Indian while I am gone, and his time had come, and I hadn't my rifle with me, what could he do? Yes, my dear, we must all contribute our part toward the fulfillment of the decrees of Providence."

A CLASSICAL QUESTION.—When you have to pay the piper, will the peppermint be the proper source—mint source—to apply to?

During a steam voyage on a sudden stoppage of the machinery considerable alarm took place, especially among the female passengers.

"What is the matter? What is the matter? For Heaven's sake tell me the worst!" exclaimed one more anxious than the rest.

After a short pause a hoarse voice replied, "Nothing, madam, nothing. Only the bottom of the vessel and the top of the earth are stuck together."

THINGS NOT GENERALLY KNOWN—Poor people!

A gentleman passing a country church while under repair observed to one of the workmen that he thought it would be an expensive job.

"Why, yes," replied he; "but, in my opinion, we shall accomplish what our parson has endeavored to do for the last thirty years in vain."

"What is that?" said the gentleman.

"Why, bring all the parish to repentance."

A SUGGESTION.

WHY SHOULD NOT PEOPLE AT EVENING PARTIES BE PROPERLY LABELED WITH A NUMBER IN SOME CONSPICUOUS BUT CONVENIENT PLACE, AND DESCRIBED IN A CATALOGUE, SO THAT ONE MIGHT KNOW WHO THEY WERE, AND ALL ABOUT THEM, WITHOUT TROUBLING THE HOST OR HOSTESS?"

A SLIGHT ACQUAINTANCE

LUBBERLY BOY. "A."

MISTRESS. "Well, what next?"

LUBBERLY BOY. "B."

MISTRESS. "Go on—what next?"

LUBBERLY BOY. "Well, mum, I knaws the beggar boi soight, but I can't name 'un."

HOW TO BE HAPPY ON THE CHEAP—Go without your dinner, and see how happy you will be—when supper-time comes.

The following is the interesting way in which the scientific pursuits of Lord Walsingham are spoken of in a California paper: "Lord Walsingham, an accomplished bug-hunter, is in California, making a collection of insects and reptiles. He has already found a great number of nice little toadies."

QUERY.—Does a dumb man always keep his word?

An old gentleman of eighty married a young wife, and in due course of time was presented with a son. On the day of christening the nurse handed young master about, with the usual exclamation that he was the very image of his papa.

"Very like, indeed," said a lady: "he has no teeth."

SAD CHANGE.—One of the most amiable and gentle of men, who had hitherto borne the character of being the best of husbands, actually boasted the other evening to a friend who dropped in unexpectedly that he had that moment beaten his wife hollow. The unhappy lady was found close to a chess table.

Most lovers like to be alone—with their sweethearts, of course.

FIGHTING IT OUT ON THAT LINE.—A romantic pair, not more than a thousand miles from New York, were blessed with a number of daughters. The eldest was called Caro*line*, the second Made*line*, the third Eve*line*, the fourth Ange*line*, when lo! the fifth made its appearance, and no name could be found with the desired termination. At length mamma, who had been reading the fashions at Saratoga, pounced upon a name very popular there, and forthwith the baby was baptized *Crino*LINE.

A bad hat taken to an evening party frequently comes out as good as new.

A FRANK ACKNOWLEDGMENT.—It appears that the Commune announced that it would pay "two hundred thousand francs to whoever should bring M. Thiers into Paris alive!" The German papers point out that as Marshal M'Mahon has performed the task, he is entitled to the reward at the hands of the Commune. Does not the Marshal un-commune-ly wish he may get it! He won't expect to be treated to an example of Commune honesty.

Some husbands, though any thing but sharp, are awfully shrewed.

FASHIONABLE QUALITIES.—A lover, who was told by his friends that he had engaged to marry a fool, said to them that the girl he had chosen had certainly some qualities to shine in a fashionable circle: she had plenty of apathy, was tolerably illiterate, was brilliantly vain and fertilely capricious, acquiesced with every one, and diffused universal smiles.

When should a man look for a jest in a meadow?—In the present month, when he is pretty sure to find 'em mowin' it—(a mot in it).

FOLLY'S FANDANGO.

In youth's bright days—'twas long before
My dancing days were over!—
I voted work a horrid bore,
And idly lived in clover.
I danced as I shall never dance
Again, now wisdom's riper,
And capered on in ignorance
Of who should pay the piper.

I danced until the money flew
Out wildly from my pockets;
I danced till dull and sunken grew
My eyes within their sockets;
I danced until rheumatic gout
Was of each toe a griper—
And then it was I first found out
Who had to pay the piper.

I danced till I'd worn out my soles,
My stockings needed mending,
My coat and trowsers were in holes,
My very hat was rending.
I went to Friendship for a loan,
But Friendship proved a viper,
And I'd no money of my own
Wherewith to pay the piper.

I set my shoulder to the wheel;
I worked just like a nigger:
My heap through constant toil and zeal
By slow degrees grew bigger.
From off the slate of each old score
At last I was the wiper;
And now, you see, I dance no more—
Let others pay the piper!

A young man was requested by an old lady to read the newspaper for her. He took it up, and read as follows: "Last night yesterday morning, about one o'clock in the afternoon, before breakfast, a hungry boy about forty years old bought a big custard for a levy, and threw it through a brick wall nine feet thick, and jumping over it, broke his right ankle off above his left knee, and fell into a dry mill-pond and was drowned. About forty years after that, on the same day, an old cat had nine turkey gobblers; a high wind blew Yankee Doodle on a frying-pan, and killed a sow and two dead pigs at Boston, where a deaf-and-dumb man was talking to his Aunt Peter."

Whereupon the old lady, taking a long breath, exclaimed, "Du tell!"

A SCHOOL-BOY'S ASPIRATION.—"Oh, how I wish I were a fountain, for then I could always be playing!"

The fellow who called tight boots comfortable defended his position by saying they made a man forget all his other miseries.

A JOB'S COMFORTER.—Harry Greville, in the American war, was one of four who were doomed to decide by chance which of them should be put to death. The lot fell on Sir Charles Asgill, but he was eventually saved. On the night before his intended execution Greville was deputed to sit up with him and comfort him.

"Well," said one of his friends, "what did you say to keep up his spirits?"

"Oh, I don't know," said Greville; "I said pooh! pooh! never mind."

One ought to have dates at one's fingers' ends, seeing they grow on the palm.

Soldiers in battle are not allowed to whistle to keep their courage up—that must be left to the bullets.

CONUNDRUMS FOR THE CURIOUS.

When is a penny like a hermit?—When it's a loan (alone).

When is a cat like a teapot?—When you're teasin' it (tea's in it).

Why is a bee like a donkey, I ax?—'Cause he's got an intimate knowledge of wax.

Why is the world like a piano?—Because it is full of flats and sharps.

Why is the letter Y like a prodigal son?—Because it makes pa pay.

What man carries every thing before him?—The waiter.

When is a soldier not half a soldier?—When he's in quarters.

BLACK BALL.—A gentleman who has lately failed in his endeavor to obtain admission to a select club inquires if the Black Ball line of packets was established for the convenience of rejected candidates like himself, who may be anxious to hide their mortification in a foreign land.

It is a bad sign to see a Communist with his hat off at midnight explaining the theory and principles of true democracy—to a lamp-post.

A CAPITAL LETTER—One containing a remittance.

Women as telegraph operators have proved a great success. They send the electric spark right through a fellow.

NATURE'S TAILORING—A patato patch.

Some tailors would make excellent dragoons—they charge so.

A NOTE ON NATURAL HISTORY.—An entomologist states that it is the female mosquito that bites us. The cruel "insecks" belong to the fair sex, which reminds us that if man makes the laws, at any rate woman makes the language—bless her talkative tongue!—and so why is the mosquito's thirst for our blood called malevolent instead of femalevolent?

Call a spade a spade, yet you may call stockings hoes.

STATISTICS.—Of the 1001 young ladies who fainted last year 967 fell into the arms of gentlemen, two fell on the floor, and one into a water-butt.

The expression "A broth of a boy" originated with "Tickets for soup."

HINT TO MOTHERS.—Treat your baby kindly, but not cordial-ly.

Why are this year's pease like reluctant payers?—Because they're so backward in shelling out.

AN OPTICAL ILLUSION.—A chandler having had some candles stolen, a person bid him be of good cheer, "for in a short time," said he, "they will all come to light."

An apothecary who is continually troubled with the inquiry for the time was asked the other day, "Please, Sir, tell me what time it is."

"Why, I gave you the time not a minute ago," said the astonished apothecary.

"Yes, Sir," replied the lad; "but this is for another woman."

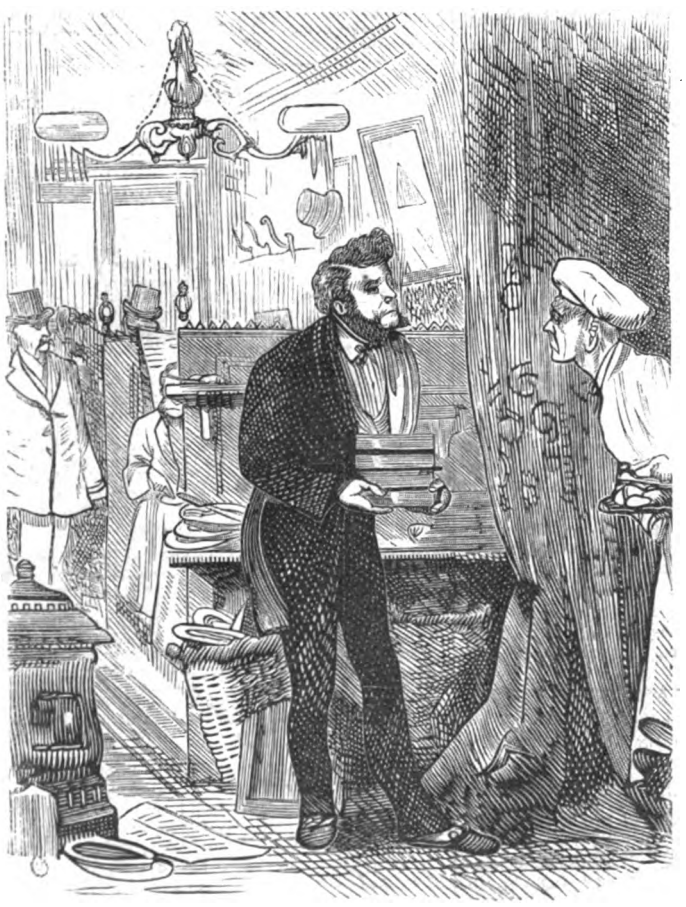
"Patty," a lady called to a little girl who was in the parlor, "did you tell your mother that I was here?"

"Yes, 'm," answered Patty, demurely.

"And what did she say?"

"She said, 'Oh, that dreadful woman again!'"

A young lady who was perfectly thunderstruck at hearing of her friend's engagement has since been provided with a lightning-rod.



UNCOMMON TATURS.

WAITER TO COOK. "George, Gent in No. 3 says as his Potatoes ain't good—says as they've all got Black Eyes in 'em."

GEORGE (real name Patrick). "Bedad, thin, it's no fault o' mine. Sure the Spalpeens have been Foightin' after I put 'em in the Pot!"

AND CABMAN NOT SO VERY WRONG.

IRISH AND IRATE CABBY. "What d' ye mane, Running fornenst the Horse's Head? If I had Knocked ye Down, an' Kilt ye, ye'd be Jumpin' up and Blamin' me."

Fig. 5.—LADY'S WALKING DRESS. Dress of pearl gray barége. The deep flounce, bows, and bias strips on the under-skirt are all made of the material. The over-skirt is open at the front and very long at the back, and is trimmed with a bias strip of barége and silk fringe. The draped part of the skirt at the back ends in scarfs at the left side; the bottom of these scarfs is trimmed with fringe. The waist revers and the sleeve trimming are formed of bias strips; the sleeve trimming and the bow at the waist are also trimmed with fringe.

THE WIDOW.

BY KATE PUTNAM OSGOOD.

THE chamber of death is empty now;
And, two by two, the funeral train
Slowly under the hill's high brow
Winds out of sight in the willow lane:

Under the hill, through the meadow gate,
And up 'neath the orchard's flying snow,
To the grave whose narrow bounds await
The owner of all, a week ago.

There is not a cloud in the whole great sky;
The redolent air is soft as June;
And that early robin that flashes by
Is trying a snatch of his summer tune.

For, with every step on a fresher flower,
The feet of April are close on May.
Young life, in its first unshaken power,
Laughs out defiance of death to-day.

Under the weeds, for her widowhood meet,
The heart of a woman gives back again
In tremulous measure, beat by beat,
The swell of the freed earth's choral strain.

Year after year hath the constant Spring
The same sweet miracle wrought anew;
Yet only to-day the robins sing,
The grass is growing, the sky is blue;

For here, by an open grave, the late
Dim buds of hopes that have missed their bloom,
Loosened at length from a wintry weight,
Stir blindly out of their prison gloom.

Heavy the burden of griefs and fears
That sinks with the coffin down to dust!
The death in life of her loveless years,
The long oppression, the murdered trust.

Bury it deep, the bitter Past!
Cover her dead from her tearless sight!
The frozen midnight is gone at last,
And a new morn risen with life and light.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

ECHOES.

THE marvelous sweetness of echoes is a phenomenon which has been often noticed. In mountainous regions—in some parts of the Alps, for instance—a few simple notes drawn from a shepherd's pipe are taken up and sent from hill to mount and from rock to cliff, and reduplicated and intertwined into the most enchanting melodies.

Such results can not be produced in a small room by any performer from any instrument. It is when one is making music out-doors and for others that Nature brings her arrangements into a powerful and musical orchestral following of a simple leadership. Then, out of five or six notes of the gamut evoked by an unscientific soul from a reed plainer than Pan's, she makes choirs of boys singing in a cathedral, companies of nuns chanting in a convent, and bugle calls, and all the highest capabilities of the organ, until the hearer listens in breathless delight, wondering whether it is heaven or earth that is thus set a-singing.

As in every thing else, there is a moral correspondence with the natural phenomenon. It is thus with all our speeches and all our deeds. We really have the least good of those things which we do entirely for ourselves, and the most pleasure of those things which we do for others. We seem almost utterly to fail to receive what we take to ourselves, and strangely incapable of impoverishing ourselves by giving to others. What we take we lose; what we give we gain. The whole social and spiritual world seems to have been constructed on the idea of echoes.

Down among men's most materialistic pursuits, mechanical labor, and the severities of trade life, this principle finds perpetual illustrations. The man who sets himself to the work of conducting a business, whether large or small, for his own special individual gain, soon finds that he is like the man who has carried his instrument into a small room, closely shut and strongly walled, that he may have all the music folded down upon his own ears. It soon grows dull, monotonous, and stale. The man who strives to make his business pecuniarily profitable to very many people is the outdoor musician, to whom echoes reply, reduplicating and multiplying his little capital many thousandfold. He grows most rich and most rapidly rich who most speedily sends pecuniary profits to the largest number of other operators.

The same holds good of our pleasures. There are none who have not had some experience of the dreariness of hunting pleasure for themselves. It is so toilsome, so unproductive, so unsatisfactory. So much so have men found it that we compromise by endeavoring to make the hunt socially, in groups, such as picnics and similar parties. But even then it is only a partial success.

Pleasure is like love, and love is

"Like Dian's kiss. Unasked, unsought, Love gives itself, and is not bought."

It is when we do not call it that pleasure comes. It flies the seeker, and seeks the worker. It is when we are least thoughtful of ourselves, and most intent on giving pleasure to others, that we find it coming to us. It is not our own music; it is an echo. We speak a word; it comes back whole sentences. We utter a note; from crag and scar it comes modulated and rhythmic, and the variations of the notes wrought into strains.

In our personal cares and troubles we seek the consolation of philosophy. The logic is sound. Our arguments ought to strengthen and comfort us, but somehow they do not. In our solitary chamber we grow heavier and more sorrowful, reasoning upon our youth and strength and elastic constitutions and troops of friends. Even those friends fail to make us happier. They come to comfort us, and go away brighter than when they came, but leaving us darker. Out of the darkness we go into busy life, hear of some stricken heart, and see some weak shoulder bending lower and lower under its burdens. We run to help the burden-bearer, and our own heavy hearts grow lighter. We speed away to cheer the stricken heart, and all our souls grow musical to our own sorrowful spirit, and we hear in our own words deeper and better things than the listener to whom they are addressed. Earth and heaven make musical echoes out of the utterances of our own hoarse voices.

Therefore let us go out under the open sky, among the grand mountains which were made for other things, but which make echoes, and whatever good, brave, kind word we speak to others shall return laden with emphasis of delight to our own souls. If we go selfishly, asking, "Do you love me?" the playful elfins of the echoes will begin their tantalizing begging of "Love me! love me!" But if a poor fainting heart lies at our feet, and we shower down tenderness in words, saying, "I love you," a thousand musical spirits of the air will peal their manifold assurances on our ears, each saying, in its own tone, "I love you! I love you! I love you!"

Let us waken the echoes.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of an Expensive Pleasure.

MY DEAR JOB,—I miss you from your accustomed haunts in the city, and I suppose, therefore, that you have flown to the hills or to the sea. Perhaps you think that you have left only heat and discomfort behind, and you fancy us parched and despairing in the desert of brick and stone. Spare your sympathy; for at this moment the softest of cool breezes blows over the paper upon which I write; and I smile as I think of those who walk under umbrellas by the glaring sea pitying the victims of the city. Yet I shall not conceal that I lately ran away for a few days, and stood by the loud-sounding sea, and looked across the great plain upon which no hedge nor fence severs us from Italy and Greece and all the lands of wonder and romance. It was at a great watering-place—a kind of resort that I had not seen for many years: since the days which my young friends are fond of calling the slow days of my youth, or the dull old times—as if any new times were so fresh and fair as those that I remember!

I was compelled, of course, to compare and contrast what I saw with what I remembered; and I wondered more than ever at the immense discomfort which we buy at an enormous price and call summer pleasure. Let me relate a few incidents, very familiar and very ludicrous, which will show you plainly, my dear Job, that I have been there. After a hot and dusty day in the cars we rolled into the sea-side village. Already I had seen from afar the huge card-paper palaces in which we were to lodge, with all the signs of a very short and very fierce season. Immediately the car was crowded with people pressing in to get seats for the station beyond, so that we had to fight vigorously to escape from the train before we were carried on. The struggle was very animated. I saw a great deal of ruin wrought upon the dresses of ladies; and you have never seen in a pig-sty at feeding time a more selfish contest than that of the gentlemen getting into the train to secure places. I wonder if we think that selfishness of the grossest kind is any more agreeable in traveling than under other circumstances in life. I observed one person, well dressed, and who evidently, as Thackeray used to say, thought no small beer of himself as a gentleman; but I assure you, my dear Job, that his conduct upon entering that car was precisely what it would have been, at a public table, if he had spread out his arms and had swept every thing that he could reach into his plate, and had bestowed his elbows literally upon all his neighbors.

The rule in traveling seems to be the sheerest selfishness; and we apparently think that the ordinary laws of decency and Christianity are unequal to the emergencies of a railroad train or a watering-place. It is really astonishing to remark how little real courtesy is observable under the various circumstances of travel. A person, for instance, occupies half of the seat in a car, and a mother enters with two children. She meekly inquires if the other place upon the seat is taken, and, depositing one child upon it, she pushes on to find another seat. How often does the Sybarite who has comfortably established himself by the window tell the mother to take the whole seat for herself and her children? Or the sun streams in upon the other side of a car on a dog-day morning, and, how often, my dear Job, do you rise, upon the shady side, and ask the lady or the elderly gentleman who is calmly boiling in the sunshine to take your more comfortable place? Indeed, there seems to be a feeling, an uneasy consciousness, that we are imposed upon if we do not secure all the best places and the best things for ourselves, instead of offering them to others. But I thought that courtesy was regard for others and sacrifice of self.

We pay an immense price, I say, for all this discomfort of summer travel. What rooms, for instance, they put us into! And what a constant and absurd consciousness a man has that he is being angled for by waiters and other cormorants and sea-side birds of prey! I struggle out of the car in which the fierce war of the succession is fought out, and I climb into an omnibus, in which my fellow-men sit near the door, so that they may be the first out and the first booked at the hotel. We are dragged through the street and dumped at the great gate of the caravansary. Then in procession we approach the office book and record our names, wistfully watching the urbane and gentlemanly clerk who is to allot us our cells. How warm is the greeting of some one who has the advantage of the clerkly acquaintance! How plainly the tone says that, of course, for such a friend there will be no exile to a back-room upon the fifth story! And here is the gentleman who drove the omnibus, awaiting his little fare. And here is the gentleman who has taken my umbrella and overcoat, and who will show me to my room. Alas! I knew not the gentlemanly and urbane warden, and the turnkey consigns me to a dreadful den.

There are a bed, and a wash-stand, and two small towels, and a bureau, and a chair. There is one window, and there is no view. The gentleman in attendance puts down the bag briskly, and begins to dust me with his broom. He dusts with a surprising agility and a kind of ridiculous cadence, thumping his wisp. How long did I think of stopping? He should like to wait upon me during my stay. His name is Borax, Sam Borax, and he is always sitting in the office; and, in fine, I discover that the time has arrived for a little outlay, and I place a small sum in Samuel's hand. He is very much obliged, and will bring a pitcher of ice-water immediately. He departs, and leaves the world to melancholy and to me. But he re-appears with his pitcher of water, and asks if there is any thing that I want. Any thing? Oh, Samuel Borax, every thing! A little sense of comfort, if you please, a chance of pleasure, a hope of escape from this doom! Samuel does not interpret my silence, and once more departs.

It is extremely entertaining to see how Sam Borax earns his money, and to observe what his idea of waiting upon me is. Every time I enter the house and proceed to my dreary quarters I have scarcely closed the door when I hear a knock. I open, and Sam appears with a pitcher of ice-water. During the day that I remain he brings me about five gallons of that liquid in relays. He is not daunted by the evident fact that I have not sipped a drop of his previous supplies, and he carries away the slopping pitcher as if I had drained it dry. As he leaves for the night he asks at what time I shall be stirring, and punctually at that time he is at the door. We exchange a few remarks about the pleasant morning, and he falls upon my clothes with his wisp. All the coats which he had severely dusted and hung up on the afternoon before, and which have been untouched since, he subjects to another severe dusting, and again hangs them up to await a subsequent wisping. It seems to me, as I watch Samuel Borax thrice slaying the slain, that the extremest under-clothes do not escape his dusting hand, and I wonder whether he will think it essential that my proper person be wisped before bathing.

As I emerge into the halls and upon the great piazzas of the house I see large numbers of persons who, like me, are enjoying themselves. They walk aimlessly up and down, or they smoke and look seriously at the ocean, or they are tilted up on two legs of their chairs reading yesterday's newspapers—squeezing them dry, as it were; every body with an air of intolerable ennui, and evidently delighted at the frequent passing of carriages in which drive the fashionable and the fair, duly arrayed to be stared at and to stare. A few of us stroll off in the heat with umbrellas, and meeting a boy with the morning papers from the city, we buy them for ten cents a copy. Groups of children are bathing in the surf, and a few nurses are parading with infants in their arms. I observe a very few gentlemen sitting in the shady corners of summer-houses over the sea, who, like me, are enjoying themselves at great expense.

By eleven o'clock we all begin to pull out our watches and think of dinner, which is yet three hours distant. There is a feeling of despair as to the disposition of that vast interval of time, and we move on a little further in the heat under our umbrellas. Then we turn and move homeward again. There are the same groups of smokers and tilted newspaper readers, who have an air of being very much obliged to us for coming in and furnishing them an object to look at. Happily, too, an omnibus with jaded passengers in rumpled dusters presently arrives, and we all gaze at them with intense interest. Then their luggage comes in a later wagon, and we are very grateful. We look over the old magazines and last week's illustrated papers at the news-stand, and we read the lists of arrivals in the hotel book, while Time, the snail, drops sound asleep.

I go to my room to pretend to dress for dinner, and Samuel Borax instantly appears with pitcher of ice-water number nine, and he proceeds to dust me vigorously. It is really an excitement of a more positive kind than seeing dusty passengers, or even contemplating their luggage. When he goes out I remark with pleasure that he has left part of his broom upon my floor, a trophy of his zeal. At dinner, mistrusting the water, I order a pint of sherry, at a rate which should speedily enrich the merchants of that particular brand, and I am at a great loss for food of any kind until I slip an amulet into the hand of my dusky servitor. But, my dear Job, I can not describe my day of pleasure in detail. Perhaps you recall similar feasts of joy in your own experience. When I appear to pay the little bill the amount strikes me as preposterous. "Why, no, Sir!" remarks the cashier. "There was the white wine, the juleps at night, the Congress-water in the morning, the bottle of sherry, and the Burgundy—"

"Yes, but I had only a pint of sherry."

The cashier assumed the air of a man who is tolerant of eccentricity, but at last consented to look, and discovered that I was right, and made a small deduction in his bill.

I have returned, my dear Job; my pleasuring of that kind is over for the summer. It was very expensive, but I am cheaply rid of it. And pray don't think, my young friend, as you saunter under your umbrella by the sea and long for dinner, that we who are comfortable and cool at home envy your sad and costly pleasures.

Your sincere friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MIDSUMMER TOILETTES.

THE season is at its height, and thinnest dresses are in order. French modistes have attained perfection in getting up fresh, tasteful, and inexpensive toilettes of organdy muslin. A solid color is selected for the costume, and the trimming is often in quaint contrast; for example, palest pink organdy is trimmed with golden brown, light Nile green with leaf brown, French gray with prune, écru with violet, and sky blue with black. Organdy, though a cotton fabric, is too frail to endure washing, but may be made to look well all season by being dampened and ironed occasionally. As the costume is not designed with reference to the laundry, modistes allow themselves the widest liberty in trimmings, using silk ruches, tarlatan puffs, and much black velvet ribbon. The belted polonaise, or else a close-fitting marguerite, with high white linen lining, half-flowing sleeves, and demi-train with many ruffles, is the prescribed style of making. The first model is of faint China pink. The slightly trained skirt has three side-pleated flounces separated by very full ruches of brown silk pinked out at the edges. The polonaise is long, simply hemmed on the edge, but trimmed down each side of the front with a silk ruche and Valenciennes lace. A ruche and wider lace are around the neck. Half-flowing sleeves, with deep-pleated frill falling on the wrist, edged with lace and headed by a ruche. A sash of brown gros grain is tied behind in wide loops, and lengthwise bows of the same loop the polonaise high on each side. This charming costume is intended for a house and carriage dress. It is becoming to brunettes who have but little color. More rosy brunettes should select an écru organdy with brown or lapis blue trimming. For blondes there is pale green organdy trimmed with tarlatan puffs of oak-color. An exquisite yet simple dress is of ciel blue. The demi-train has a wide flounce edged with white Bruges lace, the fullness held in broad box-pleats, separated by a bow and ends of black ribbon velvet. The polonaise has a border of velvet with lace on each side; velvet bows are down the entire front and on the elbows. A lace ruche around the neck. Sash of broad black velvet. With wild roses in her hair, the fair girl who wears this toilette makes a lovely picture of herself. If lace is too expensive, pleatings or puffs of white tarlatan may be substituted. Modistes sell simple costumes of organdy, white grounds with a black figure, trimmings of black velvet without lace, for $30. If made at home, the expense is of course far less.

Other organdy dresses have untrimmed skirts, as the breadths are now so slightly gored that the old fashion of hemming skirts is restored. The over-skirt is long, merely hemmed and draped by tapes beneath, or caught up by black velvet bows. The waist is a box-pleated blouse, with black velvet ribbon down the centre of each pleat. White Victoria lawn dresses made in this way, without the velvet, revive the old-time simplicity of white muslins, and are exceedingly pretty for young girls. The furnishing stores charge from $10 to $15 for such dresses.

A carriage dress worn at the sea-side by a young married lady is of sailor blue foulard. The skirt has five narrow overlapping flounces, each edged with white guipure, and the cluster headed by a festooned puffing of China crape. The long polonaise is China crape of the same blue, trimmed with puffs of the same and guipure. The neck is cut out square and filled in with diagonal folds of tulle. A walking suit has a skirt of absinthe silk with three flounces, and a polonaise of écru undressed silk.

Some very stylish toilettes are made of old-fashioned barége, and of grenadine of darkest brown shades. These are the most serviceable dresses of the season, as they do not show soil. They are warm, probably, but yet are a relief from the all-prevalent black grenadines.

WIDOW'S GRENADINES.

A dressy suit for a widow is made of smooth, small-meshed grenadine, with alternate scant ruffles of the material and English crape. The skirt is trimmed very high, and the polonaise is long and draped.

A grateful relief to the warmth of morning dresses is found in the chemises Russe of white organdy made for widows. These are perfectly plain, but of daintiest fabric—the blouse of organdy, buttoned to the throat with tiny thread buttons, the pointed collar and square turned-over cuffs of finest linen cambric, doubled without hem or tuck. This waist, with black skirts and a widow's cap of white lawn, is a comfortable dress, and so plain that the most fastidious can not carp at it.

HOW TO SHORTEN DEMI-TRAINS.

The slightly trained skirts worn in the house and carriage can be easily shortened for a promenade on the street. A loop of cord or a small ring must be sewed on the under side of the dress skirt in each back seam and in the centre of back widths. The side gores do not need to be shortened. A cord or tape is then passed through these loops, also through an eyelet-hole in the back seam of the side gore, and is tied outside of the skirt in front. The over-skirt hides the tapes in front, and the under-skirt is drawn up in a puff below the belt, that helps to give the stylish bouffant effect. To decide where to place the loops, measure the length of the train that hangs beyond walking-dress length, and put the loops half that distance below the belt.

INNOVATIONS IN COSTUMES.

Some innovations in costumes are announced by foreign correspondents. The corsage and skirt of dresses are of striped fabrics, with sleeves and over-skirt of solid color. Again, the entire basque and skirt are of silk, the over-skirt and mantelet of striped leno. Basques are also made of a material quite different from the rest of the costume; for example, a skirt and over-skirt of pearl gray cashmere, with a basque of claret-colored gros grain. Evening dresses are also made with bodices of a color in contrast with the skirt. Pink gros grain basques are worn with black Chambery gauze skirts, and turquoise blue silk basques with white muslin skirts. The effect is said to be very pretty. The basques are not low-necked, but are cut square and open in front, and are trimmed with a fringed-out silk ruche, and a tulle ruche inside.

The Gabrielle polonaise, fitting the waist perfectly, and very full in the skirt, yet with waist and skirt cut in one, is the fashionable over dress described by foreign correspondents. These differ but little from the Marguerite polonaise worn here. The edge of the garment is very little trimmed, having a double piping of thick cable cord or else a bias silk band for border. If a richer garment is desired, a basque is outlined by lace and passementerie. Bias bands of striped stuff, darker than the dress, are used for trimming suits. Cashmere skirts, to be worn with a variety of over dresses, are of solid color, and are no longer trimmed with flounces, but with many bias bands corded at each edge. Over-skirts made abroad are straight all around, without looping behind or on the sides.

DELAINE SUITS.

Delaine dresses, now so fashionable in Europe, are among the latest importations. They are intended for traveling, the sea-shore, and for early fall. The fabric is pure wool, fine, soft as cashmere, yet with round, distincts threads, like poplin, and has far better body than the delaines now in market. The dresses imported are ashes-of-roses, dust-color, and wood browns, with self-trimmings bound and piped with silk of the same shade. The prices range from $40 to $50.

FALL SILKS.

Silks for the fall trade are now exhibited in the shops to tempt strangers from the West and South who come to the city at this season. They have black grounds, with double stripes of two shades of a color. The stylish almond and darker wood brown are together in thickly repped stripes on a smooth black surface, turquoise and sapphire blue are associated, and emerald with bottle green. The silk is twenty-two inches wide, and worth the price, $2.

For $1 75 are repped stripes of a single color on black grounds, poncean, prune, gray, primrose, and dark green. White stripes on black are still very stylish, and will be in demand for autumn suits. At present they are sold for various prices from $1 a yard upward. The black and white check silks, that look so pretty when well made and trimmed with velvet, are as low as 95 cents.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN; and GEDNEY; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and WILSON & GREIGG.

Knitting-work Bag with Netted Cover.

THIS knitting-work bag is made of card-board covered with violet satin, over which is laid a cover of violet saddler's silk worked in diagonal netting; the netted cover is ornamented in the design shown by the illustration with violet chenille of a darker shade. A violet satin bag and violet silk cords, with tassels of chenille and saddler's silk, complete the bag. Cut five pieces of card-board from Fig. 57, Supplement; cover each of these pieces with net on both sides, and also with violet satin. Join the pieces from 30 to 31 each by means of overhand stitches; the first and fifth pieces, of course, are not joined, thus leaving an opening at the top of the bag. For the netted cover work a four-cornered piece of diagonal netting with violet saddler's silk on a mesh three-tenths of an inch in circumference. The width of this piece must be equal to the length of Fig. 57, Supplement (measuring from one point of the pattern to the opposite point), and the length must correspond with the length of the five joined pieces of card-board. Divide the piece lengthwise into five equal strips without cutting it, draw chenille through each strip in the design shown by the illustration, and sew the netted cover on the outside of the bag. The side edges of the cover must previously be cut out in points to suit the shape of the bag. Then ornament the bag at the upper edge, along the joining seams of the bag pieces and along the outer edge of the points, with chenille (see illustration), and join the extremities of the points similarly marked at the ends of the bag by means of a brass ring two inches in circumference, which is covered with single crochet of violet saddler's silk. Finally, sew a violet satin bag furnished with a shirr to the upper edge of the knitting-work bag, and furnish the latter with handles of coarse violet silk cord, which are ornamented with tassels as shown by the illustration. The seam made by sewing on these handles is covered by a satin button.

PERSONAL.

CAPTAIN HALL, of the Polaris, was the recipient of many presents pior to the departure of his expedition. One of these was a tin can carefully sealed, labeled "Not to be opened until the Polaris has reached the arctic seas." But on its passage to the Navy-yard, or being shipped, it met with an accident, and the secret leaked out. It was a can of patent axle-grease, with which Captain HALL or his survivors were affectionately requested by letter to lubricate the axle of this slow-going world, if found at the pole.

—Mr. ALVIN ADAMS, the founder of the Adams Express Company, is said to own the most expensive and beautiful country place in New England. It lies in Watertown, seven miles from Boston, and contains 150 acres. The grounds and farm are unsurpassed. The second floor of the house is on a level with the dome of the State-house in Boston, and from the tower can be seen twenty-six towns and cities. One of the features of the house is the art gallery, one of the best in the country. There is nothing in Boston equal to it. It costs $100,000 a year to keep up the place. So much for carrying parcels! Somebody once expressed the opinion that "Eve was created for Adam's express company."

—Mr. WILLIAM STUART, a lineal descendant of WILLIAM PENN, is the present recipient of a pension of $20,000 per annum from the British government, and has been since 1790, when WILLIAM PITT, then Prime Minister, after conferring with Mr. FOX, leader of the opposition, asked Parliament to make that allowance, as "an inadequate compensation" for the loss of the territorial rights of the PENN family in Pennsylvania. In 1759 Dr. FRANKLIN drew up a curious paper, giving a minute calculation of the supposed worth of the proprietary estate, and made it $50,000,000. The sons of PENN favored the British side; hence the $20,000 pension. The Duke of Marlborough still draws $20,000 a year for services rendered to the nation by his ancestor in Queen ANNE'S time. The Marquis of Bath, the Marquis of Camden, and the Duke of Grafton are pensioners to the amount of $15,000 a year.

—The Misses SCHENCK made their début at the court ball a few days ago at Buckingham Palace. The Court Journal says that "the graceful costume of Miss JULIA SCHENCK was particularly noticed, and was composed of rich poult de soie, skin-color, cut en train in the LOUIS XV. style. It was trimmed with a profusion of ruches of illusion tulle of a shade deeper than the poult de soie, also with Spanish blonde, called blanc de lumière, and running through the blonde and tulle were several garlands of brown leaves, blush rose-buds, and blush roses."

—The Empress EUGENIE, on the occasion of the papal jubilee, is reported to have sent a letter of congratulation to the Pope, through Cardinal LUCIEN BONAPARTE, together with an offering of 100,000 francs in the name of the imperial family; which goes to show that the "imperial" or any family that can give in that style is not likely to suffer for the common necessities of life.

—Mr. DADD—that is the name, DADD—is the "dad" of nineteen children, of whom an Eastern man says there are eight pairs and three aces. Mrs. DADD threatens to draw the poker on any man who speaks of her little ones in that derisive manner.

—MARY EARNEST, who recently died in Michigan at the age of 109, up to the hour of her death believed that "the Lord had forgotten her and left her upon the earth."

—The late PETER B. PORTER, of Niagara Falls, bequeathed $5000 to the literary fund of Hamilton College, from which he graduated in 1826.

—The fine country-seat of Rev. SAMUEL OSGOOD, on Long Island, has this peculiarity: throughout the grounds all the trees, rocks, and stones are embellished with scriptural quotations and verses of proverbs in conspicuous characters.

—A colossal statue of the late Lieutenant-General WINFIELD SCOTT, by LAUNT THOMPSON, is in such state as to give indication of a superior work of art. It represents the General as he appeared in his prime, at the close of the Mexican war.

—The Khedive of Egypt is so well satisfied with his American officers that he has declined the offer of several French officers who volunteered to enter his service.

—Miss LILLIE LELAND, daughter of Mr. WARREN LELAND, has just graduated from Rockland Institute with the highest honors. She had worn the Badge of Honor for four years in succession, the first time such a distinction had been achieved in twenty years, and which requires that the student shall not have missed a day, nor an hour, nor a lesson, nor in any way received a discredit mark during the entire year. Her valedictory is said to have been the best ever delivered before the Institute.

—Miss VIOLETTA COLVILLE, who had been a pupil of WERTELL, the educator of NILSSON, up to the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, but since has been prosecuting her studies in Leipsic, Saxony, was recently very highly honored. At a musical matinée performance given at the mansion, at Weimar, of the Grand Duke of Altenberg, Miss VIOLETTA and her mother, Madame MARY PROVOST, were invited guests, among whom was the Abbé LISZT, the great pianist. Among the vocalists Miss VIOLETTA appeared, and after her first song the "great LISZT" was so much pleased that he volunteered to accompany her himself in subsequent efforts. We doubt if even PATTI or NILSSON have ever been more honored.

—Dover has recently lost one of its notable men, Mr. SAMUEL TUTTLE, at the age of eighty-three. He was lineally descended from JOHN TUTTLE, one of the earliest settlers of Dover, and the ancestor of a succession of substantial families of that name, who have lived for nearly two centuries and a half in the southern part of Dover. He lived on the easterly side of the Neck, a little below the site of the First Church, where he died in 1663. In the year 1642 the lands bounding on the "Three Creeks," so called, on the west side of Back River, were granted to him, and formed part of his farm at the time of his death, above two hundred years ago. The title and possession of this primitive estate have continued to his descendants bearing his surname down to the late SAMUEL TUTTLE, the owner and occupant of the same at his decease. Except the NUTE (originally Newte) family, no other resident on the west side of Back River can claim to have been in uninterrupted possession of the lands of the first emigrant ancestor of the family to this day.

—Colonel FORNEY concludes his last number of "Anecdotes of Public Men" by reminiscences of two noted women, FANNY WRIGHT and ANNIE ROYALL, the latter of whom died in Washington in 1854—the terror of politicians, especially of Congressmen. Her career was a rough one, and she seemed to live for the purpose of revenging her misfortunes upon others. She was a native of Virginia, and at an early age was stolen by the Indians, with whom she remained about fifteen years. Shortly after her release she married a Captain ROYALL, and removed to Alabama, where she learned to read and write, subsequently taking up her residence in Washington. She was present during the administrations of J. Q. ADAMS, JACKSON, VAN BUREN, TYLER, POLK, and FILLMORE. Her squibs were more remarkable for bitterness than for wit. She was a woman of great industry and astonishing memory; but at last she seemed to tire of a vocation which grew more and more unprofitable with better times and sweeter manners. There are no ANNIE ROYALLS now. Correspondence at Washington and elsewhere by ladies has become a profession, and some of the most attractive as well as the best-paid letter-writers at the capital are ladies.

—Albany has furnished another vocalist who is rapidly winning fame and fortune abroad—Miss EMMA ALBANI (formerly EMMA LA JEUNESSE), who has accepted an engagement at Covent Garden, London, for this and next season, at a salary of $12,000 a year. The late ISABELLA HINCKLEY (Madame SUSINI) was from Albany, and is remembered as a superior artiste and excellent woman.

—Mr. A. L. DENNIS, President of the New Jersey Railroad Company, has given $25,000 to found a public library in Newton, New Jersey. Thirty years ago Mr. DENNIS left Newton, his native village, to enter a printing-office in Newark. He is now a millionaire, and is mindful of the scenes of his boyhood.

—Acting on the theory that "the pen is mightier than the sword," the ex-Emperor of France is said to be the author of the vigorous editorials that have lately appeared in the Situation, the London organ of the BONAPARTES.

—The Rev. PHILLIPS BROOKS, of Boston, who is regarded as the Paixhan gun of Episcopal pulpit orators in Boston, has declined the honor of a D.D., a title which seems to be disdained by the more brilliant preachers and scholars of the day. Mr. HENRY WARD BEECHER has declined to receive several basketfuls of that sort of thing.

—Alluding to the statement that the Hon. A. H. STEPHENS has gained nine pounds in weight since he became an editor, the Louisville Courier-Journal says that when he weighed himself last he had one of his editorials in his pocket.

—VICTOR HUGO contemplates giving to the public "The History of the Year of Trouble." He probably does not propose to make it a dry narrative of events, with tables of killed and wounded, but rather to seize the strong dramatic points of the contest, and out of them make a thrilling and VICTOR HUGO-y book.

—So far as safety of assets is concerned, it is sometimes, in war, a good thing to be a woman. Take the case of Madame ERARD, the noted piano manufacturer, of Paris. During the Commune ascendency she had $1,000,000 worth of mahogany in her lumber-yard in that city, not a log of which was injured, notwithstanding the fires that burned all around it. Her fine residence at La Muette—for which the French government had once offered her $1,500,000—was also unharmed, General DOMBROWSKI, the Commune commander, having used it for his headquarters. In one of the closets of this house she had hidden away $45,000 in gold, and when she returned to her home she found it where she had left it.

—Among recent weddings in "high life" in England may be named that of the Hon. and Rev. JAMES WENTWORTH LEIGH and Miss FRANCES BUTLER, daughter of the late PIERCE BUTLER. The fair bride, who wore a rich white silk dress, handsomely trimmed with Brussels lace, was received at the entrance of the church by a lovely bevy of youthful bride-maids, viz., the Hon. AGNES LEIGH, Miss CAROLINE ADDERLEY, Miss WADSWORTH, Miss PRINGLE, Miss LOW, Miss LEVESON-GOWER, and Miss HENRIETTA CRAMM, who wore dresses of white tarlatan, the tablier skirts trimmed with a number of small flounces, and the trains looped back at intervals with bouquets of pink roses. Long tulle veils and chaplets of pink roses completed this becoming costume. Each young lady wore a handsome crystal locket, bearing the monogram of the bridegroom in colored enamels, crossed by a scroll on which was inscribed the Christian name of the bride, mounted in gold and enamel of a chaste design. The bride was given away by Admiral TURNER, of the United States Navy, and the service was impressively performed by the Ven. Lord Saye and Sele, Archdeacon of Hereford. Among the guests assembled on the occasion were Mrs. KEMBLE, the mother of the bride, Lord and Lady LEIGH and Hon. MARGARET LEIGH, Hon. Mr. LEIGH, Hon. Miss LEIGH, Hon. Mr. and Mrs. CHANDOS LEIGH, Lady Saye and Sele, Sir CHARLES and Hon. Lady ADDERLEY, and Miss ADDERLEY, Mr. and Hon. Mrs. LEVESON-GOWER, Lady ABINGER, Sir J. B. EAST, Hon. and Rev. C. and Mrs. TWISLETON, and Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, M.P.

—At the time when the Empress EUGÉNIE and the ladies of her court found it expedient to make a rapid exit from Paris, their dresses, especially those of glowing colors, were promptly stolen by the wives and friends of the Communist leaders, and hidden in the Rue Parmentier. Since the Commune has evaporated the apparel has been restored to its owners.

—One reason, and in Paris they say the principal one, why Monsieur LOYSON ("Father HYACINTHE") keeps writing letters to the Pope, is that his "new departure" is inspired by the probability of his soon taking to himself a wife, just as an earlier reformer did.

—Mr. CHARLES NORDHOFF, formerly on the editorial staff of HARPER & BROTHERS, and for several years past managing editor of the Evening Post, has resigned that position, and retires, for the present, to his estate in New Jersey. Mr. NORDHOFF is one of the readiest and ablest journalists of the country, and will scarcely be able to resist the many tempting offers that will be made to him to re-enter the journalistic field. We understand that Mr. NORDHOFF is succeeded by Mr. CHARLTON T. LEWIS.

—Mr. CHARLES HALE, for six years past United States consul-general at Alexandria, has returned to Boston. Seldom has the country had a more thoroughly educated and competent consul than Mr. HALE.

—Mr. A. T. STEWART, it is intimated, has purchased the block of ground now occupied by the Harlem and New Haven Railroad companies as a passenger dépôt, and will in good time erect thereon another palace to be devoted to the diffusion of dry-goods. The block is bounded by Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh streets and Fourth and Madison avenues.

Crochet Corset for Girl from 1 to 3 Years old.

THIS corset is worked with white knitting cotton (Estremadura, No. 4) in sc. (single crochet) on a foundation thread of white dress cord. At the front of the corset at the top an overlapping piece is crocheted with finer knitting cotton in an open-work design, which may be fastened on the outside of the dress. To make the corset work, first, the middle strip, simulating a belt, on a foundation of 202 st. (stitches), and on this (in the original the latter is nineteen inches and three-fifths long), going backward and forward over a foundation thread of cord, work eighteen rounds of sc., passing the needle through both upper veins of each sc., besides this, work always 1 ch. (chain stitch) at the end of each round before turning the work for the new round. Pay no attention to this ch. in the following round. On one (the upper) lengthwise edge of this strip now work the upper part of the corset as follows: First make a foundation of 28 st., work, passing over the next foundation stitch, 1 sc. on each of the remaining 27 st. and on the foundation thread at the same time, then 1 sc. on each of the next 2 st. at the upper edge of the middle strip (beginning at one corner of the strip). Now turn the work and crochet on the foundation thread 1 sc. on each sc. of the preceding round, 1 ch. at the end of the round; then turn the work, and, going back, work one round of sc. on the foundation thread, always passing the needle through both upper veins of each sc., then 1 sc. on each of the next 2 sc. of the belt-like strip, and so on. In this manner work thirty-three rounds without changing the number of stitches. In this round, as well as in the course of the work, crochet after each eighth following round always 1 sc. on each 3, instead of each 2 st. of the belt-like strip. The 34th round is shortened 6 st. at the upper edge of the corset, and the 35th round is worked on the st. of the 34th round. The 36th and 38th rounds are shortened in the same way by 6 st. each. 39th–53d rounds without changing the number of st. 54th round.—8 sc. on the first 8 st. of the preceding round, 7 ch., pass over the last of these. 55th round.—14 sc. on the next 6 ch. and on the following 8 sc. The 56th and 58th rounds are lengthened by 6 st. each like the 54th round. 59th–63d rounds without changing the number of stitches. The 64th round is shortened at the upper edge of the corset by 1 st.; 65th–67th rounds without changing the number of st.; the 68th round is shortened at the upper edge of the corset by 1 st. 69th–71st rounds without changing the number of st. 72d round shortened 1 st. at the upper edge. The 73d round is shortened 6 st. at the under end, thus not reaching up to the middle strip. 74th round without changing the number of st. The 73d and 74th rounds form an inserted gore. 75th round on the st. of the preceding round and on the 6 st. of the 73d round that have previously been left unnoticed. 76th–90th rounds on the whole row of stitches; the 76th and 80th rounds, however, must be shortened at the upper edge of the corset 1 st. each. The 90th round completes one-half of the upper part of the corset; the second half is crocheted like the first half, but in a reversed succession of rounds. After completing the upper part of the corset, crochet the under part in a similar manner on the under lengthwise edge of the middle strip. To do this make a foundation of 21 st., pass over the first foundation st. and work 20 sc. on the remaining foundation st. and on the foundation thread at the same time, then 1 sc. on each of the next 2 st. of the middle strip, turn the work, 1 sc. on each sc. of the preceding round and on the foundation thread, and so on. The fastening to the middle strip is done in the same manner as in working the upper part of the corset. The 2d–33d rounds are worked with an unchanged number of stitches. In the 34th, 40th, 46th, 52d, 58th, 62d, 66th, and 70th rounds widen 1 st. each at the under edge of the corset. The 71st and 72d rounds form an inserted gore; to do this the 71st round is shortened by 10 st. at its under end (thus it does not reach to the middle strip), and the 72d round is worked on the st. of the 71st round. 73d round on the st. of the 72d round and on the 10 st. left unnoticed in the 71st round. 74th–90th rounds on the whole row of stitches; in the 74th and 78th rounds, however, widen 1 st. each at the under edge of the corset. The 90th round completes one-half of the under part; the second half is worked to suit the first half in the usual manner. In connection with the last round work one round of sc. all along the outer edge of the corset and on the foundation thread of cord; in working this round, form six button-holes at regular intervals on the right back edge of the corset, working the sc. on the foundation thread only at each relative place, passing over the corresponding piece of the back edge. The left back edge of the corset is furnished with the requisite buttons. On the upper and under edge of the corset work always alternately 1 sc., one picot of 5 ch. and one double crochet on the first of the 5 ch.; with each picot pass over the corresponding part of the corset edge. Crochet seven such picot rounds, going backward and forward from one corner to the other, for the overlapping piece at the front of the upper edge of the corset. In the first picot round of the overlapping piece work the sc., each on one of the free sc. of the round before the last. After working the last picot in this as well as in every following round, turn the work, crochet slip stitches to the middle of the picot referred to, then 1 sc. on it; now always alternately one picot, 1 sc. on the next picot. By crocheting in this manner the overlapping piece is sloped at the crosswise edges as shown by the illustration. For each shoulder make a foundation of 56 st., lay on the foundation thread of cord, and over this cord work 1 sc. on the second following foundation st., then 7 sc. on the cord only, with these pass over 6 foundation st., 1 sc. on each of the following 40 foundation st. and on the cord at the same time, 7 sc. on the cord only, with these pass over 6 foundation st., 1 sc. on the following foundation st. (this, as well as all the remaining st., are worked on the cord), 5 sc. on the following (the last) foundation st., then 1 sc. on each vein of stitches at the other side of the foundation, 5 sc. on the first st. at the other end of the foundation. On the part thus far completed, and on the foundation thread at the same time, work two more rounds in sc., widening in such a manner at the ends that the work neither fulls up nor puckers, then surround the part with a picot round. The shoulders thus far completed are buttoned to the corset as shown by the illustration; the buttons for this must be sewed to the upper edge of the corset at both sides of the armholes; the buttons for the front of the corset are sewed to the under side, and the buttons for the back of the corset are sewed on the outside.

Window Curtains.

THE accompanying illustration shows a pretty arrangement of window curtains, which enables our readers to use the point lace embroidery, still so much in favor, also on Swiss muslin and lace curtains. The inner curtains, which are fastened close to the window, that reaches to the floor, are of plain white Swiss muslin; the outer edge of the latter is scalloped and button-hole stitched. The curtains underneath the darker curtains shown by the illustration are of the same material. The border at the outer edge of the Swiss muslin curtains is worked in point lace embroidery; it is joined with the Swiss muslin foundation by means of button-hole stitches. An illustration of this will be given in our next number, with a description of the manner of working. The darker curtains and the lambrequin are of colored silk reps. Cut the lambrequin from Fig. 54, Supplement (the two pieces turned down in Supplement, however, must previously be joined on this pattern), and trim the edge with a tapestry border, as shown by the illustration. This border is worked on a straight strip of canvas of the requisite length and breadth; this, however, must previously be laid in pleats to form the corners, or else only mark the pleats for the present with thread or with pencil marks, and sew them after finishing the embroidery, which, of course, must not be worked where the pleats are marked. Illustrations of suitable tapestry designs for ornamenting the lambrequin will be given in our next number. When the embroidered border is completed, it is sewed on the lambrequin. Furnish the lambrequin with a muslin lining, edge it at the sides with coarse silk cord (the cord at the sides of the border must be finer), and sew on the tassels as shown by the illustration. The curtain bands, which are ornamented with tassels, are made of coarse silk cord, which also edges the silk reps curtains.

Figured Tulle and Lace Fichu.

See illustration on page 501.

FOLD a piece of lace twenty-nine inches and a half square in the shape of a neckerchief, so that the upper corner lies at a distance of three inches and a quarter from the under. In order to form the pointed ends at the front set on each a piece of lace three inches and three-quarters long, which is sloped toward the piece turned down. The shawl is edged with lace two inches wide, which is set on plain all around excepting at the corners, where it must be gathered. Gather the shawl at the middle of the back and fasten it with a bow of black velvet ribbon. The shawl is pinned at the front in such a manner that the ends are crossed, and fall carelessly. A bow serves for closing.

Figured Lace Fichu-Scarf.

See illustration on page 501.

FOLD a straight strip of figured lace ninety-seven inches and three-quarters long and eighteen inches and a half wide the whole of its length, so that it is double and the under edge projects two inches. The scarf is smoothly edged all around with lace an inch wide, which is slightly gathered only where the scarf covers the bust and shoulders. The front of the scarf is gathered as shown by the illustration, and fastened by an agrafe. At the back of the shoulders draw up the gathers to the width of three inches and three-quarters, and baste them down. The scarf is tied loosely at the back, and is left to fall in long ends.

CROCHET CORSET FOR GIRL FORM 1 TO 3 YEARS OLD.

THIS fichu with sleeves is made of black figured lace, trimmed with box-pleated ruches of silk ribbon an inch and a quarter wide, and with lace three inches and a quarter wide. Cut the fichu from Figs. 18 and 19, No. IX., Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 28, Vol. IV.; the back and fronts, however, must be cut whole on the shoulders, the neck must be lower, and the ends must be even at the under edge. Set on the trimming as shown by the illustration. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 9, No. IV., of the present Supplement, but only to the straight line indicated at the bottom. After sewing up the sleeves, gather the bottom slightly, and trim the sleeves, as shown by the illustration, with a ruche of box-pleated ribbon and a fall of wide lace like that on the body of the fichu. The fichu may also be made of white tulle, trimmed with guipure, Valenciennes, or other lace edging, and with ruches of ribbon to match the color of the dress with which it is worn. Two illustrations give front and back views of the fichu as seen arranged on the figure.

GERANIUMS.

THIS name, as popularly applied, is, botanically speaking, a misnomer—the plants commonly known under this name being Pelargoniums, or Stork's-bills, while Geraniums are Crane's-bills, and crodiums are Heron's-bills—names given to them from some fancied resemblance of the seed capsules to the beaks of these birds in each genus respectively. Gray enumerates five species of Geraniums and one of Erodium as being found indigenous in our Northern States; but Pelargoniums are strictly exotic, and, with but very few exceptions, are natives of the Cape of Good Hope. Botanists have of late years divided up the genus Pelargonium into several others, varying from each other in minor botanical characters. They have five or seven stamens, while Geraniums have ten stamens.

FIGURED LACE AND TULLE FICHU.

Pelargoniums are among the most beautiful plants we have for greenhouse decoration; for, apart from the sweet-scented varieties whose foliage is so indispensable in making up winter bouquets or intermixing with flowers for vases, the other sections are so beautiful in their foliage and flowers that no collection of greenhouse plants can be considered as complete which does not contain a large assortment of them. A few years since great attention was paid to the cultivation of the section with veined and spotted or blotched flowers, some of which rivaled prize pansies in size, beauty of form, and richness of color; but the passion for ribbon and bedding-out gardening turned the attention of amateurs and florists to the improvement of the Zonale, Horseshoe, or Fish geraniums, as they were formerly called, and the result has been really marvelous. The size of the flowers, individually, and the truss of them, is now something extraordinary when compared with the flowers of ten or fifteen years ago. Flowers as large and nearly as round as a silver quarter of a dollar, and trusses hemispherical in shape, and six or more inches in diameter, being nothing uncommon; while in colors we have them pure white, striped, and all shades of red from the most delicate rose to the most vivid scarlet and the deepest and richest crimson. In foliage we have them laced with white, or with golden yellow, or splashed and zoned with green, white, brown, black, crimson, or gold, and in a few varieties all these colors may be found in each separate leaf. In habit we now have them of dwarf, stocky growth, entirely unlike the long-legged varieties of former times. In addition to all this improvement, we have within the past four or five years had a class of double-flowered varieties introduced, and they have within that time become so numerous that in the catalogue of one florist we find fifty-five varieties offered for sale. These double flowered varieties run through the same series of colors as the single-flowered; the flowers are very large and double, often in immense trusses of seven or eight inches in diameter, and very persistent, which renders them exceedingly desirable for bouquets, as many of the single varieties are quite fugacious.

A new class of Lilliputian Zonales has been introduced within the past two or three years. They have small leaves, a compact, dwarf growth, but vigorous, the flowers equaling the stronger-growing classes in size. The florists are exercising their wits in devising sufficiently distinctive names for this class; among them we find Baby-Boy, Tomtit, Little Gem, Little Dear, and names of similar import.

The well-known Ivy-leaved species has also yielded to the effects of cultivation and hybridizing with the Zonale class. The results are varieties with variegated foliage, as in the Zonales combined with the solid, thick, fleshy leaf of the Ivy-leaved class. The flowers have also been improved, approximating in size and colors to those of the Zonales.

Among the fancy or show varieties with blotched and spotted flowers a double white variety has been introduced this year; also four or five with the petals beautifully fringed on the edges, and a variety with striped flowers.

The cultivation of this tribe of plants is very easy and simple. They require plenty of light, water, and air, a season of rest, and rich soil. We use a compost of one-third or one-half two-years-rotted manure and one-half good fresh loam. About the middle of September we take the plants out of the pots, shake all the earth away from the roots, pruning them back a little, and pruning back the tops severely or closely, making cuttings of them if we wish to enlarge the stock. We then repot them with the compost, shaking and pressing it firmly about the roots. We keep them in a cool, airy part of the greenhouse until the days begin to lengthen considerably—that is, about the middle of January or beginning of February—when we remove them to a warmer part of the house. They should not even then be kept too warm at night; from 45° to 50° is quite sufficient; if kept warmer they are apt to become drawn up. They should be kept as near the light as possible, and not be crowded together, as they like to have the air circulate freely around them; but draughts of cold air upon them are very detrimental. As they grow and commence blooming they should occasionally be watered with manure-water, or some horse droppings, broken up; or dry cow-manure may be put on the surface of the soil, which will supply a small proportion of fertilizing material every time that water is given to the plant. In June, when the weather becomes very warm, we place a saucer under each pot, and fill it with water in dry weather; for if the roots get dry the foliage wilts and becomes injured. In this way a succession of bloom is kept up, giving the greenhouse a gay appearance all summer. Of course air must be freely admitted, and it is desirable to shade the plants during the heat of the day, or from eleven to four o'clock.

The varieties are so numerous that it is difficult for us to say which are really the very best, and must therefore refer our readers to the catalogues of the most respectable florists, which give short descriptions of each, specifying the colors, habit of growth, markings of the foliage, and similar information, leaving our readers to make such selections as may be most in accordance with their own individual tastes as to color, etc.

THE SONG OF THE WAVES.

We are born of the infinite, measureless sea,
Children of laughter and tears:
Our chant rolls on eternally,
With its burden of hopes and fears;
We laugh as of old with our countless smile,
And the heart of man is glad the while.

We are ocean's offspring: the sea-god's will
We do at his bidding alway;
We sport in the sun, and our crests are still;
And the children as they play
By the gleaming marge of our mighty sire
Have never a thought of the sea-god's ire.

We laughingly carry on laughing breast
The delicate shallop above;
By our glittering spray the keel caressed
Can only tell of our love;
And the careless crew on their seaward path—
Little know they of the sea-god's wrath!

But stranger and sadder sights know we,
And sadder sounds do we hear:
The note of the strong man's agony;
Our waters the dead man's bier:
When ocean's heart is with wrath possessed,
Speed we our father's stern behest.

And a sadder song than tongue may tell
Could we sing of mortal woes;
Of our wrathful revel—the water's hell—
What time the death-wind blows.
When the spirit of death is upon the sea,
Death's fit instruments then are we.
By tempest maddened, or lulled in play,
The sea-god's bidding we do alway.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

By Miss BRADDON,

Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

MR. GRANGER IS PRECIPITATE.

Clarissa had little sleep that night. The image of George Fairfax, and of that dead soldier whom she pictured darkly like him, haunted her all through the slow, silent hours. Her mother's story had touched her to the heart; but her sympathies were with her father. Here was a new reason why she should shut her heart against Lady Geraldine's lover, if any reason were wanted to strengthen that sense of honor which reigns supreme in a girl's unsullied soul. In her conviction as to what was right she never wavered. She felt herself very weak where this man was concerned—weak enough to love him in spite of reason and honor; but she did not doubt her power to keep that guilty secret, and to hide her weakness from George Fairfax.

She had almost forgotten her engagement at Arden Court when her father came down to his late breakfast, and found her sketching at a little table near the window, with the affectionate Ponto nestling close at her side.

"I thought you would be dressing for your visit by this time, Clary," he said, very graciously.

"My visit, papa? Oh yes, to the Court," she replied, with a faint sigh of resignation. "I had very nearly forgotten all about it. I was to be there between twelve and one, I think. I shall have plenty of time to give you your breakfast. It's not eleven yet."

"Be sure you dress yourself becomingly. I don't want you to appear at a disadvantage compared with the heiress."

"I'll put on my prettiest dress, if you like, papa; but I can't wear such silks and laces as Miss Granger wears."

"You will have such things some day, I dare say, and set them off better than Miss Granger. She is not a bad-looking young woman—good complexion, fine figure, and so on—but as stiff as a poker."

"I think she is mentally stiff, papa; she is a sort of person I could never get on with. How I wish you were coming with me this morning!"

"I couldn't manage it, Clarissa. The schools and the model villagers would be more than I could stand. But at your age you ought to be interested in that sort of thing; and you really ought to get on with Miss Granger."

It was half past twelve when Miss Lovel opened the gate leading into Arden Park—the first time that she had ever opened it, though she had stood so often leaning on that rustic boundary, and gazing into the well-known woodland, with fond, sad looks. There was an actual pain at her heart as she entered that unforgotten domain; and she felt angry with Daniel Granger for having forced this visit upon her.

"I suppose he is determined that we shall pay homage to his wealth, and admire his taste, and drink the bitter cup of humiliation to the very dregs. If he had any real delicacy of feeling, he would understand our reluctance to any intimacy with him."

While she was thinking of Mr. Granger in this unfriendly spirit a step sounded on the winding path before her, and, looking up, she perceived the subject of her thoughts coming quickly toward her. Was there ever such an intrusive man? She blushed rosy red with vexation.

He came to her, with his hat in his hand, looking very big and stiff and counting-house-like among the flickering shadows of forest trees; not an Arcadian figure by any means, but with a certain formal, business-like dignity about him, for all that: not a man to be ridiculed or despised.

"I am glad you have not forgotten your promise to come early, Miss Lovel," he said, in his strong, sonorous voice. "I was just walking over to the cottage to remind you. Sophia is quite ready to do the honors of her schools. But I shall not let her carry you off till after luncheon; I want to show you my improvements. I had set my heart on your seeing the Court for the first time—since its restoration—under my guidance."

"Pompous, insufferable parvenu," thought Clarissa, to whom this desire on Mr. Granger's part seemed only an odious eagerness to exhibit his wealth. She little knew how much sentiment there was involved in this wish of Daniel Granger's.

They came into the open part of the park presently, and she was fain to confess that whatever changes had been made—and the alterations here were not many—had been made with a perfect appreciation of the picturesque. Even the supreme neatness with which the grounds were now kept did not mar their beauty. Fairy-like young plantations of rare specimens of the coniferous tribe had arisen at every available point of the landscape wherever there had been barrenness before. Here and there the old timber had been thinned a little, always judiciously. No cockney freaks of fancy disfigured the scene. There were no sham ruins, no artificial water-falls poorly supplied with water, no Chinese pagodas, or Swiss cottages, or Gothic hermitages. At one point of the shrubbery, where the gloom of cypress and fir was deepest, they came suddenly on a Grecian temple, whose slender marble columns might have gleamed amidst the sacred groves of Diana; and this was the only indulgence Mr. Granger had allowed to an architect's fancy. Presently, at the end of a wide avenue, a broad alley of turf between two lines of unrivaled beeches, the first glimpse of the Court burst upon Clarissa's sight—unchanged and beautiful. A man must have been a Goth, indeed, who had altered the outward aspect of the place by a hair's breadth.

The house was surrounded by a moat, and there was a massive stone gate-way, of older date than the Court itself—though that was old—dividing a small, prim garden from the park; this gate-house was a noble piece of masonry, of the purest Gothic, rich with the mellow tint of age, and almost as perfect as in the days when some wandering companionship of masons gave the last stroke of their chisels to the delicate tracery of window and parapet.

The Court formed three sides of a quadrangle. A dear old place, lovable rather than magnificent, yet with all the grandeur of the Middle Ages; a place that might have stood a siege, perhaps, but had evidently been built for a home. The garden originally belonging to the house was simplicity itself, and covered scarcely an acre. All round the inner border of the moat there ran a broad terrace walk, divided by a low stone balustrade from a grassy bank that sloped down to the water. The square plot of ground before the house was laid out in quaint old flower beds, where the roses seemed, to Clarissa at least, to flourish as they flourished nowhere else. The rest of the garden consisted of lawn and flower beds, with more roses. There were no trees near the house, and the stables and out-offices, which made a massive pile of building, formed a background to the grave old Gothic mansion.

Without, at least, Mr. Granger had respected the past. Clarissa felt relieved by this moderation, and was inclined to think him a little less hateful. So far he had said nothing which could seem to betray a boastful spirit. He had watched her face and listened to her few remarks with a kind of deferential eagerness, as if it had been a matter of vital importance to him that she should approve what he had done. A steward, who had been intrusted with the conduct of alterations and renovations during the absence of his master, could scarcely have appeared more anxious as to the result of his operations. The great iron gates under the Gothic archway stood wide open, just as they had been wont to do in Mr. Lovel's time, and Clarissa and her companion passed into the quiet garden. How well she remembered the neglected air of the place when last she had seen it—the moss-grown walks, the duck-weed in the moat, the straggling rose-bushes: every thing out of order, from the broken weather-cock on one of the gate-way towers to the scraper by the half-glass door in one corner of the quadrangle, which had been used instead of the chief entrance! It seems natural to a man of decayed fortune to shut up his hall door and sneak in and out of his habitation by some obscure portal.

Now all was changed: a kind of antique primness, which had no taint of cockney stiffness, pervaded the scene. One might have expected to see Sir Thomas More or Lord Bacon emerge from the massive Gothic porch, and stroll with slow step and meditative aspect toward the stone sun-dial that stood in the centre of that square rose-garden. The whole place had an air of doublet and hose. It seemed older to Clarissa than when she had seen it last—older and yet newer, like the palace of the Sleeping Beauty, restored, after a century of decay, to all its original grandeur.

The door under the porch stood open; but there were a couple of men in a sober livery waiting in the hall—footmen who had never been reared in those Yorkshire wilds—men with powdered hair, and the stamp of Grosvenor Square upon them. These flew to open inner doors, and Clarissa began with wonder to behold the new glories of the mansion. She followed Mr. Granger in silence through dining and billiard rooms, saloon and picture-gallery, boudoir and music-room, in all of which the Elizabethan air, the solemn grace of a departed age, had been maintained with a marvelous art. Money can do so much; above all where a man has no bigoted belief in his own taste or capacity, and will put his trust in the intelligence of artists by genius and profession. Daniel Granger had done this. He had said to an accomplished architect, "I give you the house of my choice; make it what it was in its best days. Improve wherever you can, but alter as little as possible; and, above all, no modernizing."

Empowered by this carte blanche, the architect had given his soul to dreams of medieval splendor, and had produced a place which, in its way, was faultless. No matter that some of the carved oak furniture was fresh from the chisel of the carver, while other things were the spoil of old Belgian churches; that the tapestry in one saloon was as old as the days of its designer, Boucher, and that in the adjoining chamber made on purpose for Arden Court at the Gobelins manufactory of his Imperial Majesty Napoleon III. No matter that the gilt leather hangings in one room had hung there in the reign of Charles I., while those in another were supplied by a West End upholsterer. Perfect taste had harmonized every detail; there was not so much as a footstool or a curtain that could have been called an anachronism. Clarissa looked at all these things with a strange sense of wandering somewhere in a dream. It was, and yet was not, her old home. There was nothing incongruous. The place scarcely seemed new to her, though every thing was altered. It was only as it ought to have been always.

She remembered the bare rooms, the scanty, shabby furniture of the Georgian era, the patches and glimpses of faded splendor here and there, the Bond Street prettinesses and fripperies in her mother's boudoir, which, even in her early girlhood, had grown tawdry and rococo, the old pictures rotting in their tarnished frames; every thing with that sordid air of poverty and decay upon it.

"Well, Miss Lovel," Daniel Granger said at last, when they had gone through all the chief rooms almost in silence, "do you approve of what has been done?"

"It is beautiful," Clarissa answered, "most beautiful; but—but it breaks my heart to see it!"

The words were wrung from her somehow. In the next moment she was ashamed of them—it seemed like the basest envy.

"Oh, pray, pray, do not think me mean or contemptible, Mr. Granger," she said; "it is not that I envy you your house; only it was my home so long, and I always felt its neglect so keenly; and to see it now so beautiful, as I could have only pictured it in my dreams, and even in them I could not fancy it so perfect!"

"It may be your home again, Clarissa, if you care to make it so," said Mr. Granger, coming very close to her, and with a sudden passion in his voice. "I little thought when I planned this place that it would one day seem worthless to me without one lovely mistress. It is all yours, Clarissa, if you will have it—and the heart of its master, who never thought that it was in his nature to feel what he feels for you."

He tried to take her hand; but she shrank away from him, trembling a little, and with a frightened look in her face.

"Mr. Granger, oh, pray, pray don't—"

"For God's sake don't tell me that this seems preposterous or hateful to you—that you can not value the love of a man old enough to be your father. You do not know what it is for a man of my age and my character to love for the first time. I had gone through life heart-whole, Clarissa, till I saw you. Between my wife and me there was never more than liking. She was a good woman, and I respected her, and we got on very well together. That was all. Clarissa, tell me that there is some hope. I ought not to have spoken so soon; I never meant to be such a fool—but the words came in spite of me. Oh, my dearest, don't crush me with a point-blank refusal. I know that all this must seem strange to you. Let it pass. Think no more of any thing I have said till you know me better—till you find my love is worth having. I believe I fell in love with you that first afternoon in the library at Hale. From that time forth your face haunted me like some beautiful picture—the loveliest thing I had ever seen, Clarissa!"

"I can not answer you, Mr. Granger," she said, in a broken voice. "You have shocked and surprised me so much, I—"

"Shocked and surprised you! That seems hard."

In that very moment it flashed upon her that this was what her father and Lady Laura Armstrong had wished to bring about. She was to win back the lost heritage of Arden Court—win it by the sacrifice of every natural feeling of her heart, by the barter of her very self.

How much more Mr. Granger might have said there is no knowing—for, once having spoken, a man is loath to leave such a subject as this unexhausted—but there came to Clarissa's relief the rustling sound of a stiff silk dress, announcing the advent of Miss Granger, who sailed toward them through a vista of splendid rooms, with a stately uncompromising air that did not argue the warmest possible welcome for her guest.

"I have been hunting for you every where, papa," she said, in an aggrieved tone. "Where have you been hiding Miss Lovel?"

And then she held out her hand and shook hands with Clarissa in the coldest manner in which it was possible for a human being to perform that ceremony. She looked at her father with watchful, suspicious eyes as he walked away to one of the windows, not caring that his daughter should see his face just at that moment. There was something, evidently, Sophia thought—something which it concerned her to discover.

CHAPTER XX.

MODEL VILLAGERS.

They went to luncheon in a secondary dining-room—a cozy little apartment which served pleasantly for all small gatherings, and had that social air so impossible in a spacious and grandiose banqueting-chamber—a perfect gem of a room, hung with gilt leather, relieved here and there by a choice picture in a frame of gold and ebony. Here the draperies were of a dark glowing crimson cut velvet, which the sunshine brightened into ruby. The only ornaments in this room were a pair of matchless Venetian girandoles on the mantel-piece, and a monster Pallissy dish, almost as elaborate in design as the shield of Achilles, on the oaken buffet.

The luncheon was not a very genial repast; Miss Granger maintained a stately sulkiness; Clarissa had not yet recovered from the agitation which Mr. Granger's most unexpected avowal had occasioned; and even the strong man himself felt his nerves shaken, and knew that he was at a disadvantage between the daughter who suspected him and the woman who had all but refused his hand. He did his utmost to seem at his ease; and to beguile his daughter into a more cordial bearing; but there was a gloom upon that little party of three which was palpably oppressive. It seemed in vain to struggle against that dismal influence. Mr. Granger felt relieved when, just at the close of the meal, his butler announced that Mr. Tillott was in the drawing-room. Mr. Tillott was a mild, inoffensive young man of High-Church tendencies, the curate of Arden.

"I asked Tillott to go round the schools with us this afternoon," Mr. Granger said to his daughter, in an explanatory tone. "I know what an interest he takes in the thing, and I thought it would be pleasanter."

"You are very kind, papa," Miss Granger replied, with implacable stiffness; "but I really don't see what we want with Mr. Tillott, or with you either. There's not the least reason that we should take you away from your usual occupations; and you are generally so busy of an afternoon. Miss Lovel and I can see every thing there is to be seen without any escort; and I have always heard you complain that my schools bored you."

"Well, perhaps I may have had rather an overdose of the philanthropic business occasionally, my dear," answered Mr. Granger, with a good-humored laugh. "However, I have set my heart upon seeing how all your improvements affect Miss Lovel. She has such a peculiar interest in the place, you see, and is so identified with the people. I thought you'd be pleased to have Tillott. He's really a good fellow, and you and he always seem to have so much to talk about."

On this they all repaired to the drawing-room, where Mr. Tillott, the curate, was sitting at a table, turning over the leaves of an illuminated psalter, and looking altogether as if he had just posed himself for a photograph.

To this mild young man Miss Granger was in a manner compelled to relax the austerity of her demeanor. She even smiled in a frosty way as she shook hands with him; but she had no less a sense of the fact that her father had out-manœuvred her, and that this invitation to Mr. Tillott was a crafty design whereby he intended to have Clarissa all to himself during that afternoon.

"I am sorry you could not come to luncheon with us, Tillott," said Mr. Granger, in his hearty way. "Or are you sure, by-the-bye, that you have taken luncheon? We can go back to the dining-room and hear the last news of the parish while you wash down some game pie with a glass or two of the old Madeira."

"Thanks, you are very good; but I never eat meat on Wednesdays or Fridays. I had a hard-boiled egg and some cocoa at half past seven this morning, and shall take nothing more till sunset. I had duties at Swanwick which detained me till within the last half hour, or I should have been very happy to have eaten a biscuit with you at your luncheon."

"Upon my word, Tillott, you are the most indefatigable of men; but I really wish you High-Church people had not such a fancy for starving yourselves. So much expenditure of brain power must involve a waste of the coarser material. Now, Sophy, if you and Miss Lovel are ready, we may as well start."

They went out into the sunny quadrangle, where the late roses were blooming with all their old luxuriance. How well Clarissa remembered them in those days when they had been the sole glory of the neglected place! In spite of Sophia, who tried her hardest to prevent the arrangement, Mr. Granger contrived that he and Clarissa should walk side by side, and that Mr. Tillott should completely absorb his daughter. This the curate was by no means indisposed to do; for, if the youthful saint had a weakness, it lay in the direction of vanity. He sincerely admired the serious qualities of Miss Granger's mind, and conceived that, blessed with such a woman and with the free use of her fortune, he might achieve a rare distinction for his labors in the fold, to say nothing of placing himself on the high-road to a bishopric. Nor was he inclined to think Miss Granger indifferent to his own merits, or that the conquest would be by any means an impossible one. It was a question of time, he thought; the sympathy between them was too strong not to take some higher development. He thought of St. Francis de Sales and Madame de Chantal, and fancied himself intrusted with the full guidance of Miss Granger's superior mind.

They walked across the park to a small Gothic gate-way, which had been made since the close of Marmaduke Lovel's reign. Just outside this stood the new schools, also Gothic, and with that brand-new aspect against which architecture can do nothing. They would be picturesque, perhaps, ten years hence. To-day they had the odor of the architect's drawing-board.

Beyond the schools there were some twenty cottages, of the same modern Gothic, each habitation more or less borne down and in a manner extinguished by its porch and chimney. If the rooms had been in reasonable proportion to the chimneys, the cottages would have been mansions; but Gothic chimneys are pleasing objects, and the general effect was good. These twenty cottages formed the beginning of Mr. Granger's model village—a new Arden, which was to arise on this side of the Court. They were for the most part inhabited by gardeners and laborers more or less dependent on Arden Court, and it had been, therefore, an easy matter for Miss Granger to obtain a certain deference to her wishes from the tenants.

The inspection of the schools and cottages was rather a tedious business. Sophia would not let her companions off with an iota less than the whole thing. Her model pupils were trotted out and examined in the Scriptures—always in Kings and Chronicles—and evinced a familiarity with the ways of Jezebel and Rehoboam that made Clarissa blush at the thought of her own ignorance. Then there came an exhibition of plain needle-work, excruciatingly suggestive of impaired eyesight; then fancy-work, which Miss Granger contemplated with a doubtful air, as having a frivolous tendency; and then the schoolmistress's parlor and kitchen were shown, and displayed so extreme a neatness that made one wonder how she could ever venture to exist in them; and then the garden, where the heels of one's boots seemed a profanation; and then, the schools and school-houses being exhausted, there came the cottages.

How Clarissa's heart bled for the nice, clean motherly women who were made to go through their paces for Miss Granger's glorification, and were fain to confess that their housekeeping had been all a delusion and a snare till that young lady taught them domestic economy! How she pitied them as the severe Sophia led the way into sacred corners, and lifted the lids of coppers and dust-holes, and opened cupboard doors, and once, with an aspect of horror, detected an actual cobweb lurking in an angle of the whitewashed wall! Clarissa could not admire things too much, in order to do away with some of the bitterness of that microscopic survey. Then there was such cross-examination about church-going, and the short-comings of the absent husbands were so ruthlessly dragged into the light of day! The poor wives blushed to own that these had still a lurking desire for an occasional social evening at the Coach and Horses, in spite of the charms of a Gothic chimney and a porch that was massive enough for the dungeon of a medieval fortress. Miss Granger and the curate played into each other's hands, and between the two the model villagers underwent a kind of moral dissection. It was dreary work altogether; and Daniel Granger had been guilty of more than one yawn before it was all over, even though he had the new delight of being near Clarissa all the time. It was finished at last. One woman, who in her benighted state had known Miss Lovel, had shown herself touched by the sight of her.

"You never come anigh me now, miss," she said, tenderly, "though I've knowed you ever since you was a little girl; and it would do my heart good to see your sweet face here once in a way."

"You've better friends now, you see, Mrs. Rice," Clarissa answered, gently. "I could do so little for you. But I shall be pleased to look in upon you now and then."

"Do 'ee, now, miss; me and my master will be right down glad to see you. However kind new friends may be"—this was said with a conciliatory courtesy to Miss Granger—"we can't forget old friends. We haven't forgot your goodness when my boy Bill was laid up with the fever, miss, and how you sat beside his bed and read to him."

It was at this juncture that Sophia espied another cobweb, after which the little party left this, the last of the cottages, and walked back to the park, Daniel Granger still by Clarissa's side. He did not make the faintest allusion to that desperate avowal of the morning. He was, indeed, cruelly ashamed of his precipitation, feeling that he had gone the very way to ruin his cause. All that afternoon, while his daughter had been peering into coppers and washing-tubs and dust-holes, he had been meditating upon the absurdity of his conduct, and hating himself for his folly. He was not a man who suffered from a mean opinion of his own merits. On the contrary, in all the ordinary commerce of life, he fancied himself more than the equal of the best among his fellowmen. He had never wished himself other than what he was, or mistrusted his own judgment, or doubted that he, Daniel Granger, was a very important atom in the scheme of creation. But in this case it was different. He knew himself to be a grave, middle-aged man, with none of those attributes that might have qualified him to take a young woman's heart by storm; and as surely as he knew this, he also knew himself to be passionately in love. All the happiness of his future life depended on this girl who walked by his side, with her pale, calm face and deep hazel eyes. If she should refuse him, all would be finished for him. He had dreamed his dream, and life could never any more be what it had been for him. The days were past in which he himself had been all-sufficient for his own happiness. But, though he was angry with himself for that hasty betrayal of his feelings, he did not altogether despair. It is not easy to reduce a man of his age and character to the humble level of a despairing lover. He had so much to bestow, and could not separate himself in his own mind from those rich gifts of fortune which went along with him. No, there was every chance of ultimate success, he thought, in spite of his rashness of that morning. He had only to teach himself patience—to bide his time.

WATER-PROOF GLUE.

ONE ounce of gum-sandarac and one ounce of mastic are to be dissolved together in a pint of alcohol, to which an ounce of white turpentine is to be added. At the same time a very thick glue is to be kept ready, mixed with a little isinglass. The solution of the resins in alcohol is to be heated to boiling in a glue-pot, and the glue added gradually, with constant stirring, so as to render the whole mass homogeneous. After the mixture is strained through a cloth it is ready for use, and is to be applied hot. It dries quickly and becomes very hard, and surfaces of wood united by it do not separate when immersed in water.

SERVANTS IN HOLLAND.

THERE is no scarcity of excellent servants in Holland. Emigration thins the numbers of either sex but little; and as there are but few manufactures, the younger rustic females are not drained off for handiwork in the large towns. A girl, therefore, who longs to escape from the hard labor of field-work—for a heavy portion of this is done by females—considers herself fortunate indeed if some kindly disposed housekeeper should take her in and teach her some domestic work. Few servants are kept, and, indeed, there is not work enough for many. For, in the first place, the ladies of the house do a great deal of household work in the early morning, and throughout the day disdain to have done for them what they can do for themselves. You never hear an everlasting running up and down stairs and ringing of bells, and "bring this," and "go up to my room and fetch that," and "shut the window," and "put on some coals," which, after all, is nothing more than finding work for an otherwise ornamental servant, and a fanciful luxury for a lazy mistress. And, in the second place, the quantity of furniture in each room, though the rooms themselves are generally roomy and high, is by no means great, so that household work is readily done, even by a domestic who knows little more than how to rub and wipe. The house-maid, however, of a newly married couple has a rather hard berth of it for the first few months; for the top of the new dining-room table is sent to its purchaser in the rough, and has to be polished every morning for a couple of hours or so with linseed-oil and plenty of elbow grease. The effect in the end is glorious, and lasts forever. No plates, however hot, will dim its glories, and it continues to shine to the end of its existence, and, with little care, clear and bright as a mirror. And then, again, the last finish to household work is probably done by more delicate hands, for until "coffee-drinking," at twelve o'clock, a visitor must expect to see little of the ladies. The pickling and preserving, the preparation of fruit for the table, those mighty dishes of beans and pease, the side-dishes and other delicacies for the day, all bear signs of a delicate touch and a cultivated intelligence. In the season of shrimps, which, like the fish, are brought all alive and kicking to the house, the prettiest of fingers are employed for a couple of hours at least in preparing a dish which is surely never seen out of Holland. Fancy a twelve o'clock "coffee-drinking," when the centre of the table is occupied by a large dish with an elegant pyramid of a peck or so of ready-shelled shrimps, which you eat wholesale with a spoon! And very fine eating they are, too.

Actual wages are low: $25 or $30 a year for a plain cook or house-maid; but the national institution of "tips" supplements pretty fairly these low wages. Nobody thinks of going out-of-doors without a supply of half-gulden, to give as occasion may require; and occasions often do require, for a half-gulden at least is expected in return for any little service performed by your friends' servants other than that of simply opening the street-door. This is an arrangement so perfectly understood and acted upon by all, that people who see a great deal of company pay their servants smaller wages than do those who live more retired from the world. It should be known that all presents to servants are put into a general fund, which is equitably divided at definite intervals. By this custom cooks and other servants whom visitors have no opportunity of seeing, but whose services materially contribute to the comfort of his visit, participate in the donation given at the door or in the bedroom; but the coachman, who expects something if even you accompany your friend in his own carriage, keeps what he gets for his own pocket. The regular tariff of a half-gulden, which is very seldom exceeded—and no wonder, considering how often the tax is levied—makes the custom tolerable and even agreeable to the giver.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

HOW to keep cool is a midsummer problem. Few solve it aright. While there are always some days during the season which are oppressively warm, and all suffer therefrom, the discomfort experienced in summer is much greater, in general, than need be if we better understood the art of keeping cool. Possibly a few simple hints may be useful. In January we eat as well to keep warm as to sustain strength; in July we naturally are warm enough without carbonaceous food, such as fat meats, sugar, molasses, butter, and articles containing starch. Therefore these things should be sparingly eaten, and their place supplied with cooling vegetables and fruits, some of which contain no carbon at all. Moreover, we need less food in summer than in winter. Half the people in the world drink too much in hot weather. We do not now refer to alcoholic beverages, it being pretty generally understood that they are heating to the blood. But one is no cooler to imbibe even a simple glass of ice-water every half hour on an August day. A moderate amount of drink is natural and useful, though ice-water should be used with care. Drinks containing some nutrition are best for warm weather, if any thing besides water is taken, so that the body may be strengthened to endure heat comfortably. If possible, avoid heating the blood by violent exercise, especially in the early part of the day. If you do, it will often take twenty-four hours to "cool off." Many persons recommend shutting windows and blinds early in the morning, thus excluding the hotter air of mid-day. Rooms are undoubtedly kept cooler thus, if occupied by only one or two persons; but a breeze is often more refreshing than still air, even though the former be several degrees warmer. Water applied to the wrists and temples, and allowed to evaporate, will cool the blood surprisingly; and a sponge bath of tepid water, taken before retiring at night, will often insure a comfortable sleep in a hot night. Exposure to the sun should, of course, be avoided as much as possible; but do not give up all employment because it is hot. Nothing so increases the discomfort of a warm day as devoting one's whole attention to thinking about it. The blood rises to the boiling point very speedily. So it does if you allow yourself to be vexed and fretted by the necessary friction of every-day life. Keep the mind calm and quiet, and it will go a great way toward keeping the body cool.

The road leading from the village of Catskill to the Mountain House is one of the finest mountain thoroughfares on the continent. It is kept free from stones, is hard and clean, and as free from dust as pure gravel can make it. Thus the three miles' ride is rendered not only comfortable, but delightful.

Lake Avenue, the well-known Saratoga drive, is this year subjected to a sprinkling, which only those who have encountered the fearful dust of past seasons can fully appreciate.

Amherst College has lately received as a gift from a Boston gentleman—George Howe, Esq.—a chime of bells for the new and elegant chapel which has been erected during the past season. These bells are a memorial of the patriot sons of Amherst College who lost their lives in the rebellion of 1861.

The young King of Bavaria is fully resolved to have a musical wife—so say the Munich gossips. Indeed, the story is that he has broken off several matrimonial engagements because he could not find a woman capable of admiring and appreciating Wagner's music sufficiently to suit him. His latest engagement with a German princess was chiefly founded on the circumstance that she dotes on the music of that composer as much as the King does himself.

A curious scrap of information has recently come to light, by which it appears that the impulse for the foundation of Harvard College was given by a woman. Lucy Downing, sister of John Winthrop, first Governor of Massachusetts, was not unwilling herself to remove to New England, but she was unwilling that her son George should be unable to be well educated there. In 1636 she therefore wrote to her brother from England, soliciting that the boy be allowed to remain in England until he had finished his studies, or means be afforded for his perfecting himself in them in Massachusetts; adding that the news of suitable provision for this purpose "would make her go far nimbler to New England, if God should call her to it, than otherwise she should; and she believed a college would put no small life into the plantation." In October of that same year, 1636, at a meeting of the General Court of the Massachusetts Colony, it was agreed "to give four hundred pounds toward a school or college." So readily did the General Court answer the suggestion of this brilliant woman. Her son George was, in fact, one of the first nine graduates of Harvard in 1642, went to England, and became the minister of the Commonwealth to Holland.

An English writer advises young women to look favorably upon those engaged in agricultural pursuits, assigning as one reason that their "mother Eve married a gardener." He forgot to add that in consequence of the match the gardener lost his situation.

It is well to be "posted" in biblical and mythological knowledge. It often makes one appear to fine advantage in general society. One evening not long since, at a grand party, a young lady approached a matron with the exclamation, "Oh, my dear Mrs. H——, I am so glad to have found you. Have you seen that painting in the library—something about Io and Jupiter? Now who were Io and Jupiter?" Although somewhat surprised at the question, as the lady was a graduate of a first-class boarding-school, and the gentleman on whose arm she leaned a university student, Mrs. H—— proceeded to explain, and got as far as "Io was transformed by Jupiter into—" "Oh yes," interrupted the lady, with vivacity; "I know; into a pillar of salt! I knew I'd heard the story somewhere, only I couldn't recall it. Come, Jack, that's the Strauss waltz;" and they whirled away.

Chinese names are a curiosity to American readers. To us Li Po Tai and Chy Lung look very funny. But suppose some of our own names were printed thus: Da Vis and Gree Ley, Schuy Ler Col Fax and Val Lan Dig Ham. What then?

A writer, observant and piquant, who has recently visited the "Monumental City," remarks: "I saw 'the prettiest girl in Baltimore' twelve times in the course of that week, and there were twelve of her. Like the arithmetical little maiden in Wordsworth's ballad, she might have said, with only a more guileless looseness of enumeration, 'We are—as many as you like.'"

The United States stands in advance of any other country in regard to the dental profession. Who would suppose that there were 13,000 dentists in our country? But so it is. Our teeth are likely to have plenty of attention. But that attention costs a pretty little sum, since these 13,000 have an aggregate income of twenty millions of dollars. There are nine dental colleges in our country, from which 1807 persons have graduated, and seven dental periodicals, with an aggregate circulation of 12,900 copies.

Fishes are now put to a novel use. In Easton, Pennsylvania, a couple of fishes—sturgeons—have been taught to draw a small boat, which is shaped like a shell. They are harnessed by means of India rubber bands, and guided by a long pole, to which is fastened a sharp spike. They obey the suggestions given by this spike with great alacrity.

In Atlantic City the dryness of the air is wonderful for a sea-side town. The finest of starched fabrics can be worn, and bedding is as little affected by the moisture of the atmosphere as in inland places. At Newport heavy fogs are frequent, and lawns and linens hang straight and limp about the wearers.

Brooklyn is as fond of flowers as is New York. It expends more than a million of dollars annually for bouquets.

The philosophy of mosquito bites is thus cheerfully explained by an amiable savant. It will be read with feeling interest: The microscope reveals the fact that he carries a pair of scissors inside of his proboscis; the neatest and sharpest little cutting tools you ever saw. He gets his living by these. They are two delicate little blades, and are placed alongside each other. When he is ready to make a meal off of us he first buzzes around with those beautiful wings, and sings a pleasant little song. If we let him quietly settle down, he picks out a place on our skin which is just to his liking. He is very delicate about it. When he gets ready he puts his proboscis down, and pushes the little scissors out, and makes a neat cut, so that he can suck the blood out. Then he drinks as much blood as he wants, and is done his dinner. But he does not leave yet. He is going to pay his bill. He has taken our blood, and he will leave us something in exchange for it. He has the pay in his pocket, ready to squeeze out before he goes. It is poison, but that makes no difference to him. It is the best he has to give us. His poison pocket is at the head of his proboscis, and at the lower end of his proboscis he has another little pocket, into which he puts poison enough for one dose. This poison is so very powerful that a very little makes the place where the mosquito puts it very sore. It is not the bite or cut that the mosquito makes that hurts us, but the dropping of this powerful poison into our flesh.

Probably many of our citizens do not realize that, in addition to the Central Park, there are about twenty parks and squares which have during the year received the care of the present Department of Public Parks. These are the City Hall Park; Tompkins Square; Bowling Green; The Battery; Duane Street Park; Beach Street Triangle; a nameless little square at the foot of Canal Street; two on Sixth Avenue, corners of Thirty-second and Thirty-fourth streets; the parks upon Park Avenue over the Harlem Railroad Tunnel; the Triangle at Five Points; Washington, Union, and Madison squares; Reservoir Park; Christopher Street Triangle; Mount Morris Square; the great public square of Harlem; River-side, Morning-side, and High Bridge parks. Before the close of the present season the Department expects to complete improvements in other squares, and various triangles and odd pieces of ground will be converted into plots agreeable to the surrounding neighborhood. These green spots in our city will be breathing-places for the many who can not go into the country during the hot season.

It is related of Dr. Young that one day, while walking in his garden at Melwin, in company with two ladies, one of whom he afterward married, a servant came to tell him that a gentleman had called to see him. "Tell him," said the doctor, "that I am too happily employed to change my situation." The ladies insisted that he should go, as his visitor was a man of rank, a patron, and friend. As persuasion, however, had no effect, one took him by the right arm, the other the left, and led him by the garden gate; when, finding resistance was vain, he bowed and laid his hand upon his heart, and in that expressive manner for which he was so remarkable, spoke the following lines:

"Thus Adam looked when from the garden driven,
And thus disputed orders sent from heaven.
Like him I go, but yet to go am loath;
Like him I go, for angels drove us both.
Hard was his fate, but mine still more unkind;
His Eve went with him, but mine stays behind."

The Germans left uninjured the château of the Marquis de Laplace, son of the illustrious astronomer, at Arcueil; but it was plundered by a band of robbers, supposed to be French Communists. The library, with all its rare books, souvenirs, and works of art, was almost entirely destroyed, and the original MS. of the "Mécanique Céleste" was thrown into the river near by, from which it was happily rescued.

ROYAL INCOMES.

THE PAY OF SOVEREIGNS, AND THEIR INVESTMENTS.

A GLANCE at the comparative resources of the leading rulers of the Old World and the people they control, by which an exhibit is furnished touching the immense sums which flow into the coffers of the crowned heads of Europe and those of less rank, at the present day will be found interesting.

Alexander II. of Russia enjoys an income of $25,000 a day, or $8,250,000 per year, and his neighbor, upon whom he is casting envious glances, is not far behind him in pay, Abdul Aziz receiving $18,000 per day, or six millions annually; while the luckless adventurer of France before his downfall stood next on the list, at an income of $14,000 per day, or five millions per year. He has not made any income return since Sedan by which we can estimate his ability to meet expenses; but his investments during his prosperous days have probably saved him from abject poverty now or hereafter.

The Emperor of Germany, owing to recent successes, has probably secured for himself and numerous family an enlarged income. As King of Prussia he is down in the list as entitled only to $8210 per day, or three millions per year. Francis Joseph has an income of four millions annually. Victor Emanuel, at present the happy recipient of something less than three millions per year, will probably enjoy from "united Italy" a much larger stipend. The Queen of England is said to live on an income of two millions yearly.

The Prince of Wales has the net revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall and a salary of $16,000 as general in the army, which, with his royal allowances, make his income $625,000 per annum.

The salary of "Count" Bismarck is said to have been only $9000 per annum. As Prince he will probably enjoy a sum more in keeping with the valuable services he has afforded in the recent war.

Prince Alfred receives the sum of $100,000 a year; and the Duke of Cambridge had an allowance of $60,000, a salary of $30,000 as field-marshal, and one of $15,000 as colonel of the Fusileer Guards.

King Amadeus of Spain is paid $125,000 a month, which will barely mitigate the discomfort attendant upon wearing a crown bestowed in opposition to the will of his subjects.

The Belgian king, Leopold, received a salary of only $250,000 per annum. At his death he nevertheless left a snug little fortune of $16,000,000, which shows that monarchs can be economical at times. He does not seem to have been mercenary; he only saved and invested his money, instead of spending it. When he became King of Belgium he resigned all the appointments he had held as the husband of the Princess Charlotte, amounting to $175,000 per year, which was so much saved to the people of England, retaining only a life-interest in the house of Claremont, which has been the residence of his father and mother in law, the ex King and Queen of France.

It must be borne in mind that, aside from the stipulated incomes of these rulers, they enjoy also many perquisites in the way of rental of estates, inheritances, etc. Queen Victoria is probably the most wealthy sovereign in Europe. She receives a large sum, spends little, and bestows less; has all her expenses paid, and her property is accumulating to an enormous amount. All her children are provided for by the state: and if she lives forty years longer, as she well may, coming of a long-lived family, she will die worth more millions than any one but a Rothschild could realize.

Some little time ago a man named Neeld, passing by all his relations, bequeathed to Queen Victoria $1,750,000, which was accepted by her. Such instances of extreme devotion to the "crown" are not rare. And it is said, in connection with this subject, that since the death of Prince Albert, who was remarkably saving, and who left the Queen all his accumulations, estimated at $5,000,000, there has been a total absence of any thing like extravagance on the part of the Queen.

The members of the English Parliament receive no pay; and the acceptance of such a post by a poor man is, of course, out of the question. And yet it is said that the cost of a seat in Parliament ranges from $5000 to $60,000, which expense is shared by the candidate and the constituents. Mr. Thackeray, for instance, stated that his unsuccessful contest for the comparatively small borough of Oxford cost him over £1000 sterling.

The English judges are liberally paid. The Lords Justices of Appeal, as well as the Masters of the Rolls, have equal to $30,000, and the Vice-Chancellors each $25,000; the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench has $40,000, and the other judges $25,000; the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas $35,000, and the other judges $25,000. The salary of the Chief Baron of the Exchequer is $35,000, and $25,000 to each of the barons of the court. Lord Monk, Governor of the new Dominion of Canada, receives for his services $50,000 a year, in gold.

An English newspaper recently asserted that "the clear annual income, or salary, of half the sovereigns of Europe does not amount to $23,455." Up to the commencement of the present century the richest sovereign family of Europe, excluding Russia, was the house of Hapsburg-Lorraine. They possessed, and still possess, enormous estates within the Austrian empire as private property, which, though mismanaged in most instances, produce over a million sterling per year.

Vastly superior to this property, though it can not be called private in every respect, is that of the reigning family of Russia. According to Baron von Haxthausen, more than a million square miles of cultivated land and forests, besides some two million square miles of uncultivated land, mountains and steppes, partly in European and partly in Asiatic Russia, belong directly to the Emperor, and are under his absolute control.

The real revenue derived from these possessions is unknown; but it is generally estimated that the expenditure of the Russian court, including the allowance paid to the numerous grand dukes and duchesses, can not be less than about three millions sterling a year. The rate of expenditure of the imperial family may be estimated from the recorded fact that when the late Empress-Dowager, the widow of Nicholas, went to Italy, in the summer of 1860, her suite comprised above two hundred persons, with an adequate number of horses and carriages, the cost of maintenance of which was calculated at the period by German newspapers at £3000 per diem. The coronation of Alexander II. at Moscow in September, 1856, is estimated, on like authority, to have cost above eight millions of rubles, or some £1,300,000.

These enormous fortunes of the imperial family of Russia, as well as of the house of Hapsburg, are gradually getting distributed through blood alliances. Many of the smaller German families, for instance, have greatly enriched themselves by their matrimonial connection with the reigning house of Russia. Czarina Catherine II., a princess of the house of Anhalt, made a present of most valuable domains in Southern Russia, comprising an area of about two hundred and thirty square miles, to her kinsfolk at home, the income of which they enjoy to the present day. It is this lavish liberality which has contributed not a little to the eagerness with which Russian alliances are sought after in Germany, and the consequent influence they exercise.

farmers, and others mining adventurers. The shrewdest of them all, the late autocrat of the principality of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, hit upon quite an original idea for making money. He established a large brewery and distillery, and forbade his subjects, under heavy penalties, to consume any other ale or spirits than those issued from the princely concern. In this way he is said to have acquired some considerable capital, which he invested in large estates in Bohemia and the grand duchies of Mecklenburg.

By recent computations made in Great Britain it is estimated that of the twenty million inhabitants of England and Wales nine millions are in receipt of an average yearly income of £35, which is a little less than two shillings a day; or, if we count one other person as dependent on each of these persons with a two-shilling daily income, we have eighteen millions, out of the twenty millions of English and Welch, living on a shilling a day. The disproportion between the income of the rich and the poor is as striking as the immense disparity in the numbers of the two classes. Eighteen millions live on a shilling a day, while the class who (with their dependents) possess yearly incomes of more than £300 have for their support £633 apiece, or about thirty-five shillings daily, and number over 400,000.

The exhibit of figures, according to recent English income returns, does not strike one as proportionate to the boasted wealth of the English people. Thus it appears that 332,431 persons pay income tax, and Leaving aside the wealth of the imperial house of Holstein-Gottorp, which can scarcely be called a private property, the richest sovereign family in Europe is commonly believed to be that of Austria, and next to it the house of Nassau-Orange, ruling the Netherlands. The riches of the latter family have been acquired almost entirely within the last few generations. When William VI. of Nassau-Orange was called, in 1815, to the throne of the Netherlands, which he afterward filled as William I., he was possessed of but a modest private fortune, which he increased enormously by investing it in commercial undertakings patronized by the government. Many of the German sovereigns have traded for the last half century in like manner, and with results largely profitable. Some ruling princes to this day are stock-jobbers, some cattle-dealers; some are the average income of each is equal to $1595. There are but 107 Englishmen who return over $250,000 per year; 1283 between $25,000 and $250,000; 627 between $20,000 and $25,000; 1438 between $15,000 and $20,000; 2204 between $10,000 and $15,000; and 7371 between $5000 and $10,000. An English paper, in an article commenting on American income returns, states that "Mr. Alexander T. Stewart's return of over four millions of dollars is probably the largest annual business income in the world;" and it adds that "if the Rothschilds, whose wealth is more that of a family than of individuals, are excepted, no uncrowned person has an income approaching Mr. Stewart's."

JENNIE'S FIRST ROMANCE.

DIMPLED arm of fairy grace,
Formed for tenderest embrace,
Holding for a moment's space
Pretty, dimpled, piquant face
Of little Jennie.

Such an arch, coquettish air
In her movements unaware,
That to prophesy I dare
Many hearts she will ensnare,
Bewitching Jennie.

Love of pleasing is an art
(Born, I think, of generous heart,
Little dreaming to impart
Pain by any careless dart)
Bequeathed to Jennie.

Pleasing, pleased—it happened so,
On the sea not long ago;
One, with manhood's years to show
For the six springs' tender glow
Of budding Jennie,

Played with her the deck upon.
Jennie, sparkling in the sun,
Acted "little wife;" a nun
Scarce more serious than the fun
Of earnest Jennie.

She all honest, he in play
(Truth is childhood's natural way);
So the fairy elf was gay,
Yielding to love's gentle sway,
Delighted Jennie!

Thus the happy days flew by,
Balanced betwixt bluest sky
And bold waves that terrify;
Yet fear never flashed her eye,
Courageous Jennie!

Pleasant greetings on the shore;
Sadder adieus scarcely o'er
Ere some radiant plan in store
Dried the eyes that dew-drops wore
Of buoyant Jennie.

What had she to do with tears?
What had she to do with fears?
Pain in pleasure disappears
As gay Hope the life-boat steers
Of trustful Jennie.

Many days have gone apace;
Why that cloud on Jennie's face?
Penitence for some disgrace,
Or what sorrow do we trace
In grieving Jennie?

He, her cavalier so gay,
Recreant proves, to her dismay;
Bitterly she rues the way
Lovers keep their vows in play,
Still constant Jennie.

Thoughtless man! what woes entail
On your sex through Jennie's wail:
Be ye sure she will not fail
To avenge this childish bale,
Remorseless Jennie!

Soon her womanhood will loom;
Soon full radiant roses bloom:
Have a care, ye bold ones whom
She will win to hapless doom,
All-conquering Jennie.

Yet deep tenderness I trace
Through and through that roguish face;
God's best grace, in fullest grace,
All the beauties interlace
Of gentle Jennie.

Glorious, though so immature!
Born with witchery to allure—
Queen of sirens!—yet be sure,
One all pure will keep her pure,
Ingenuous Jennie.

LOU'S BEGGAR.

CLARA VERNON, the cold, languid belle, was evidently impressed for once in her life, and that, too, by a perfect stranger. Not but that she knew his name, however; she found that out the very first evening she saw him at the opera, idly surveying stage and audience from the best box in the house. It was Hugh Blair, just returned from California, where he had been living for ten years, and dazzling rumor allotted him a gold mine for every year. Gold was not the only charm, however, if one might trust Miss Vernon's rhapsodies. He was not exactly handsome, she said, but something more than handsome; not exactly distinguished-looking, but something better than distinguished-looking; and he had an air of old-fashioned chivalry, and she did not believe he would pay silly compliments. She must certainly make his acquaintance; but how? Would he—oh, would he be at Mrs. Gale's Wednesday evening reception? She had been to see Mrs. Gale already, and easily prevailed on that lady to send him a card; and after that success she dropped in at Allie Stevens's to talk it all over. Allie was up stairs in her own room, nestled before a cozy fire, trying a new slipper stitch, while Lou Hallelyne held the pattern for her, and the two were chatting merrily.

Miss Vernon was not discomfited at finding Lou there, for Lou was a nice girl, and never tattled; so, after kissing them both, she took the easiest chair she could find, and held up her little Paris boots toward the fender.

"Where do you keep yourself, Lou Hallelyne?" she exclaimed. "Upon my word, I don't think I've seen you since that day in December when I wouldn't give you my old blue poplin for the mission-school. But you know I had to hand it over to Héloïse, or she would have left me on the spot, and there isn't her equal for dressing hair."

"Héloïse has more suits now than I!" said Lou, laughing, as she put by the slipper pattern, and rose.

"Lou, you sha'n't go!" exclaimed Allie, pulling her back into her chair. "If you don't keep your promise I won't do a thing for you. You see, Clara, Lou is the best company in the world, only you never can catch her, she is so busy. So I have learned a trick. She came round this morning to beg something for a sick woman, and I promised her my nice, warm old gray wrapper, if she would stay and talk with me for two hours. She couldn't resist the bait, and the time won't be up till noon. Now sit down and be good, Lou, and I'll give you a nice, soft old blanket-shawl!"

"But now, girls, about Mrs. Gale's party!" interrupted Clara, impatient of this by-play. "Who do you think is invited?" And then she ran off into an enthusiastic description of Hugh Blair's perfections, and how she must get acquainted with him; and would he go to the reception, did they think? For, as she concluded, pathetically, half the time these really splendid men didn't seem to care whether they were in society or not.

"Why, Harry knows him!" said Allie Stevens. "He was talking about him only last night, and how surprised he was to have him come walking into the studio all of a sudden."

"Harry knows him!" exclaimed Clara; "why, then he could make him go to the party with him, if you would only say one word. Will you ask him, Allie?"

"No," said Allie, laughing; "but you may ask him yourself. Come, girls, what do you say? Let's all go down to the studio and see Harry. He'll be ever so glad, and I want you to see a portrait he is painting of me. Come; you ought to patronize art a little, as well as parties and mission-schools!"

Harry Essex was engaged to Allie, and she was very proud of her artist lover, entering into all his day-dreams and ambitions, and flitting about him like a pet bird, with little songs and caresses, whenever she was in his studio.

On this particular morning he was full of a new subject which he had just sketched upon the canvas. It was to be a figure-piece—a real "composition," he said, for he was tired of smooth landscapes, and cows up to their knees in water, and trees, and ruins. In fact, the most successful bits he had ever painted had been sketches from life of saucy news-boys, ragged match-girls, and others of that ilk. This time he meant to attempt something more ambitious on a canvas six feet by four; and as rags are more picturesque than good clothes, the main figure was to be a beggar, and the most impressive beggar he could find a model for. For this ideal beggar Harry Essex had haunted the most miserable portions of the city, had watched the wretched throng that gathered garbage from the dust heaps and sewers, had chased every ragged garment he saw fluttering away in the distance; and yet he was not suited. He did not want a knave, nor an absolutely crushed and hopeless victim; his beggar, though a beggar, must be noble; must have a mute protest in his eyes against the wrongs of society, and yet be a very beggar for its smallest alms. The search had been in vain until to-day; but this very morning Harry Essex was satisfied, and sat at his canvas with a model before him as ragged, as noble, as sad, as utterly forlorn as heart could wish. Other pictures were huddled carelessly aside; even Allie's sunshiny face, still unfinished on its easel, was set away in a distant corner to smile at cobwebs, that all the room and all the light might be lavished on the beggar and the canvas.

"There, now, old fellow!" exclaimed Harry, when it was near noon, "I've got you splendidly sketched in; a mere outline, you know. There, don't get up; don't move; I'll wheel it round for you to see. I can fill up the rags and patches any time; but I want to get a little of your face now before we go to dinner, for fear I'll never catch the perfect expression again. I'm going to paint in your eyebrows, my boy; so keep still, and don't move a lash."

"Which I wish to remark, it is rather crampy business," said the beggar, with a slight laugh.

"Oh, don't laugh!" cried Harry, in dismay; "it takes the frown out of your brows. Do keep still! You know I'm no end obliged to you, and will be your debtor for life, and do as much for you over and over again, if you'll only sit for me. I never could capture such a splendid beggar before. There—look more pathetic, confound it; think of your starving family at home, and the mammon of unrighteousness, and every thing. There, that's it! Now don't stir."

And Harry plied his brush vigorously, gaining on his picture with every stroke. Time was precious, for models are restive and uncertain; and it was not with absolute delight that he heard, a few moments after, the click of dainty boot-heels on the stair, and then saw the door opened and his quiet invaded by—the three graces, he would have said, if he had been gladder to see them.

First came Allie, bright and sweet as a May morning, sure of her welcome. Then, peeping over her shoulder, was Lou Hallelyne's earnest little brunette face and brown eyes, full of pleased interest. Following these came Clara Vernon, the self-possessed and graceful beauty—the "fair one with the golden locks," as some called her—exquisitely attired, and half shrinking back on the threshold from the artistic confusion of the studio.

"What under heaven—" muttered Harry Essex, at this dazzling inroad; but he sprang up instantly, and greeted them with his usual bright, easy manner.

"I've brought the girls to see my picture, Harry," cried Allie at once. "And—oh! what have you put me over in that musty corner for? Bring me back into a good light this minute, Sir! And where are all your landscapes and match-girls and chimney-sweeps? Lou and Clara want to see them. And—oh, goodness, Harry! who's that?"

The last words were uttered in a startled whisper, as Allie for the first time caught sight of the ragged man who sat there, pathetic and defiant, with a huge bundle and knotted stick at his side.

"Beg pardon, miss," said the beggar, grimly, pulling his slouched hat lower on his forehead.

"It's only my model, young ladies," said Harry, his eyes sparkling with fun. "We painters have to keep queer company sometimes. I picked him up on the street this morning, and made him sit for my great beggar picture there. Splendid specimen, isn't he? Oh, I understand that look, Miss Lou; but I assure you he don't mind being talked about in the least. Unfortunate? Of course he is unfortunate, with a wife and six starving children! And now, Allie dear, you must let me be very rude, and leave you to do the honors of the pictures over there while I go back to my work. I must take a few more strokes anyhow, and not keep this poor devil any longer from his dinner than necessary."

And he fell to painting again, chuckling softly, while the girls flitted over to the other side of the room, turning pictures around to the light, and going into little raptures over every thing. Allie's portrait was pronounced "perfectly lovely."

"It flatters, of course; but then it ought to flatter," said Allie, sagely. "Portraits always ought to, for by-and-by you get old, and people forget how you used to look; and then it must be nice to point to your portrait and bid them see what you were."

"Oh, see this little garden corner!" exclaimed Lou; "and the morning-glory running over the trellis!"

"I like this better," said Clara, pausing before a lady in a balcony dropping her glove to a troubadour.

But while they laughed and chatted and admired, Lou Hallelyne's thoughts kept roving to the sad-eyed model, sitting motionless, while Harry painted. Lou's heart was always overflowing toward the poor and suffering, and she was a perfect little Lady Bountiful in her way. A wife and six starving children! Why, they must be seen to at once! Instinctively her hand went in search of her pocket-book. She whispered to Clara Vernon.

"My taste has never been educated to discriminate among beggars," Clara answered, with lofty coolness.

"Harry will look out for him," said Allie; "he is always good to poor people who are picturesque."

But, nevertheless, the six hungry children worked so upon Lou's heart that when they turned away from the pictures to cluster around Harry again she managed, in passing, to slip some money into the outstretched palm of the beggar, and was fairly thrilled by the flash of surprise that flew into his face, and his softly murmured thanks.

"You absurd child!" whispered Clara Vernon.

And now Harry Essex could do no more good work with his brush, he was so besieged with ringing, girlish voices, and bright faces close to his own.

"Oh, are these little soft, silvery bags full of paint?"

"Do you have to keep changing brushes? What are these old cloths for?"

"Oh, Harry, show them how you mix colors on the pallet!"

At last came the question, put in innocently among the others, like a wolf in sheep's clothing.

"Mr. Essex, are you going to Mrs. Gale's party Wednesday evening?" asked Clara, with a beaming smile.

"Well, I don't know. It's rather of a bore; but I suppose I shall drop in before the evening is over, if Allie insists on it. Shall I, Allie?"

"Of course you will," said Allie. "And, Harry, Mrs. Gale has sent Mr. Hugh Blair a card—that friend of yours you were telling me about, you know. Can't you get him to go with you? We all want to see him so much."

"You don't want to flirt, eh, Allie?" asked Harry, demurely.

"No, but Lou does," retorted Allie, with a spice of mischief.

"I!" exclaimed Lou, flushing indignantly. "Why, I never even heard of the man till Clara mentioned him this morning!"

"Oh, it's Clara, then, our sweet icicle herself," said Harry, with a burst of laughter for which there seemed no occasion. Allie told him afterward it was the rudest thing she ever knew him to do, under all the circumstances. But Miss Vernon overlooked it.

"Never mind who it is," she said, with a coquettish smile. "Only make him come to the party with you, Mr. Essex."

"I will," said Harry, as if he were making a vow.

And then the girls really must go; their silken dresses rustled away, the gay vision of the graces vanished, their light laughter died on the ear, and Harry Essex and his model sat staring at each other.

"Oh, do forgive me, Hugh; do forgive me!" exclaimed Harry, going into convulsions of merriment at last. "I couldn't help it; it was too rich!"

"You rascal!" said the beggarman, straightening himself and throwing off his shabby hat. "When you first began I meant to knock you down as soon as we were alone; but I'll let you off now, for without your pranks I never should have known what an angel she was."

"Angel! Which? The blonde one?" asked Harry, in vague surprise.

"No; the brown one, bless her!" said his friend. And then he showed the money, and told the story of her ready kindness, while Harry went off again into delighted laughter.

"And I've lost my heart to that girl," said Hugh Blair, "and I'll go through floods and fire to win hers!"

"Ah, life, life!" sighed Harry. "A falls in love with B, and B with C, and so on to the end of the chapter. Well, Lou is a star of a girl, though every one don't find it out. And now come, my boy; fling off your rags, and get your clothes out of that closet, and we'll go to Parker's for a game dinner. Luckiest fancy I ever had in the world to make a beggar of you, comrade, with your weather-beaten face and inscrutable eyes!"

There was a brilliant throng at Mrs. Gale's reception on Wednesday evening, and conspicuous among the fair young beauties there was Clara Vernon, her blonde loveliness heightened by the costume of shimmering pale green silk she wore, overlaid with precious lace like delicate frost-work. But when Harry Essex came with his Californian hero, the eyes of the latter roved unsatisfied around the spacious parlors, till at last they caught sight of the "brown angel" in a distant window nook with Allie Stevens.

Lou Hallelyne went home that night with a new sensation. She always, in company, kept herself so closely to the quiet corners that few ever sought her out, or paid her much attention. And now this stranger, whom no one could help liking, had devoted himself to her the whole evening.

"I don't know but I am going to be just like other girls, after all," she thought, perplexed. "It certainly was very pleasant when he looked at me and spoke to me so."

The acquaintance progressed. Hugh Blair was no laggard, and before long he only awaited the right moment to tell the sweet old story to his "brown angel."

But Lou meanwhile had not forgotten the poor man who had interested her in the studio, and more than once she asked Harry Essex how his painting got on, and said how glad she would be to render any aid in her power to the unfortunate model and his family. Harry's eyes would sparkle at these inquiries; and at last he told her he had found the fellow very deserving, and that, if she pleased, the poor man would come to her the next morning to ask a favor.

So, on the next morning, Lou Hallelyne, full of gentle pity, sat waiting in the library; but when the door opened, and she turned, expecting to see her beggar, behold it was Hugh Blair, and he asked for her heart!

Few words are needed to end the story. Two happier people—two more kindly, charitable people—never lived than Hugh Blair and his wife. Their choicest wedding gift hangs on their parlor wall—Harry Essex's masterpiece, "The Beggar at the Gate."

BUTTERNUT JEWELRY.

FEW would believe that under the rough, dingy covering of the butternut there existed such a pleasing variety of graceful forms as are here, in part, represented. Although one may have seen the nut frequently, and perhaps have noticed the beautiful, curiously jagged surface of its shell, it is seldom realized that the forms of its interior are even more beautiful, and it is not until the nut is cut through longitudinally that this is readily seen. It is another singular fact that even though it be cut into five or six sections there are no two of them alike, each one varying with the gradual tapering of the cavities within. So hard is the shell of the nut that it may be divided into these parts with a common handsaw, its substance being nearly as hard as ebony, yet approaching cork in lightness. Cutting these sections and adapting them to the construction of jewelry is comparatively a new idea, and using the part sections by subdividing them a decidedly new one. This jewelry is within the reach of all; the smallest amount of ingenuity and taste will enable any one to design and produce most pleasing articles of this kind, and at no cost save that of patience.

To divide the nut, it should be held firmly in a vise, or any instrument which will securely hold it, and, as I have said, it can then be cut through with a saw. The sections should be about a fifth of an inch in thickness, to allow for the waste in polishing. When a sufficient number of them have been obtained, the following directions may be followed. As the saw has left the surface rough, it is necessary that it should be made smooth; first use coarse sand-paper, then fine, and finish with fine emery-paper. Wear the sections down to about the sixth of an inch in thickness. When this is done they are ready for the dye. This is made by dissolving in one quart of boiling water extract of logwood, a piece the size of a hen's-egg, together with one-half the quantity, or even less, of copperas. This should be kept warm. Suspend the pieces in the dye, and let them steep for a few hours; or, what is still better, let them boil for half an hour or more; and then, if not black enough, repeat the operation until they become of a rich, deep black. When taken from the dye they may be washed in warm water and laid on a piece of paper to dry. (Great care should be taken in handling the dye, as it is very powerful, and stains permanently whatever it comes in contact with.) The next process is the most difficult of all; but it only needs patience to perform it nicely. In order to join the pieces together it is necessary that small holes should be made in them. This has to be done with a red-hot needle; and, as the substance is very hard, it takes some little time to burn through. There is generally a slight projection on the edge, that often seems put there on purpose; and when such sections can be found the operation is rendered much more easy. When the holes are all made the pieces should be wired together after the manner of jewelry in general. Annealed iron wire is the best for this purpose; it should be of a size sufficiently small to allow it to pass twice through the same aperture, as this is needful in making the joints secure. Before joining, the parts should be polished by rubbing briskly on a piece of chamois, and the edges brushed with a dry, stiff brush. The gold rings may be obtained at nearly any jeweler's, either in solid or plated wire; the latter answers just as well, and is not as expensive, the cost for one pair not exceeding twenty-five or thirty cents.

Of the accompanying figures, Fig. 1 represents a design for a pin, consisting of two large sec-are butternut, the pendant being a cross section of a peach stone. There are numerous other designs, which will readily suggest themselves to an inventive imagination, and many much more complicated and beautiful than the ones here represented. It is not really necessary to dye them, they are pretty without; but they are generally considered more attractive in black.

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

FASHION accurately reflects in its narrow sphere the conflicts, agitations, and experiments which appear in political, administrative, and social questions. We see all styles confounded, and can not yet clearly discern which will rise triumphant from the chaos. But something will arise from it; business has resumed its activity, and every one is setting to work anew with feverish energy.

For the moment there is a truce to invention, and we witness the transition from what has been to what will be. The general appearance of dress is, for the most part, what it was at this time last year, only trimmings are simplified and luxury is retrenched, without therefore encroaching on elegance. Crinoline is still worn, but very small; suits are still worn, but more plainly trimmed; round hats are still worn, but not flattened so completely on the nose; chignons are still worn, but not so voluminous; and we no longer see at all either chignons composed of floating curls, or short frizzes on the forehead, or long ringlets, so long, indeed, that an absent-minded person might mistake them for bell-pulls, and use them accordingly. At most, a single curl of moderate length is permitted behind the ear; and young ladies, both married and single, are seen already with their hair dressed in short, flat bandeaux, without any crêpe, terminating behind the ears in two very thick three-strand braids, which are wound around the head so as to form a diadem, and a moderate-sized chignon. This is paving the way for the simple coiffures, which can not fail to be in vogue next winter.

As to bonnets, they will be larger; they are already becoming so, indeed, thus proving that it was only the increased quantity of hair that restricted their size. Many have wide strings of ribbon or tulle edged with lace, and tied under the chin. Dark tints, black, brown, garnet, and violet, are most in favor this season for the trimming of white or yellow straw bonnets. Colored, gray, or brown straw bonnets are always trimmed with ribbons and feathers of the same color as the straw.

The best way to indicate the fashions is to describe a number of dresses. This I shall proceed to do.

Dress of very light violet foulard, almost lilac, trimmed with a wide gathered flounce. Above this flounce are two pleated ruches, each two and a half inches wide, set on upright. High, plain corsage, and almost tight sleeves, trimmed at the wrists with two pleated ruches, each an inch and a quarter wide. The skirt of the dress is not trained, of course, but round, and no longer than that of a walking suit. Over dress made of bands of black silk grenadine an inch and three-quarters wide, and separated by strips of black guipure insertion three-quarters of an inch wide, all arranged perpendicularly. This skirt is not draped, as over-skirts generally are, but falls straight; only it is shorter than the foulard under dress, and is edged with black guipure two and a half inches wide. The bottom of the guipure reaches the top of the upper ruche that forms the trimming of the under-skirt. High corsage of strips of grenadine and guipure insertion, opening from the neck to the waist over the foulard corsage, the opening being edged with black guipure four-fifths of an inch wide. The sleeves of the over-waist are very full; they are made of strips of grenadine and insertion, and are trimmed with guipure like that of the over dress. Belt of violet ribbon, elaborately embroidered with black on each side; a bunch of long violet and black loops is set at the back over the belt. In this suit the over dress takes the place of a wrapping. The same dress may be made by substituting ribbons of black silk or velvet for the bands of grenadine; or white may be used instead of black; white grenadine bands and white guipure insertion; or white muslin bands and Valenciennes or other lace insertion.

Dress of black silk, trimmed with a very wide pleated flounce of black worsted grenadine. This flounce is edged on the bottom with a white bias fold three-fifths of an inch wide, veiled with black guipure of the same width. Over dress of black grenadine, long enough to come just below the black silk flounce, and edged like this flounce with a narrow white bias fold, covered with black guipure. This skirt is slightly draped at each side, just back of the arms. High grenadine corsage over the black silk corsagé. Half-flowing grenadine sleeves, lined through with black silk. A grenadine scarf, edged with a narrow white fold covered with black guipure, serves as a wrapping; this scarf passes across the back without concealing the waist, crosses in front on the breast under a knot of violet velvet ribbon, and is tied behind at the bottom of the waist in a single knot without ends. White straw bonnet, trimmed with black lace, violet ribbons, and a violet feather.

Dress with three skirts of écru foulard. First skirt without trimming; second skirt shorter than the preceding; third skirt shorter than the second. The latter is cut in curves on the bottom, and edged with a narrow band of white nansook, ornamented with English embroidery. The bottom of this third skirt is caught up behind above the belt, and fastened by arranging it in a semicircular rosette, over which is placed a knot of écru foulard edged with a band of English embroidery. High, plain corsage, with short basques. Half-flowing sleeves, cut in scallops on the bottom, and edged with English embroidery. A short cape, scalloped on the bottom and edged with English embroidery, serves as a wrapping. Yellow straw round hat, trimmed with écru ribbon and bright red poppies.

Over-skirts are worn both very long and very short; the latter are the less graceful; indeed, very short over-skirts are becoming to but few persons; no one, however, can expect to dress becomingly who insists on wearing what other people do, regardless whether the style is suited to her face and figure. If the Parisians of all classes excel the whole world in the art of dressing well, as is generally admitted, it is because they know how to adapt the fashions to their own gracefulness or ungracefulness, beauty or ugliness, instead of adapting themselves to the fashion, whatever may be their face or figure. For instance, a Parisian, knowing that tight-fitting, closely clinging garments are the most unbecoming things imaginable for stout persons, when the fashion favors this style of wrappings, evades the difficulty instead of accepting what would render her ugly, and, if she is robust, wears them tight in the back and loose in front. It may be laid down as a general rule, without exception, that every thing loose-fitting, whether in dresses or wrappings, is alike becoming to women who are too stout or too thin, as it conceals both defects. Short over-skirts make stout figures look stouter, and thin figures look thinner, and should, therefore, be worn only by those of medium size. White, light écru, and light gray make persons look thicker; they are consequently suited to slender ladies, and should be avoided by those who are robust. Perpendicular stripes make one look thin, and horizontal stripes stout; they should, therefore, be chosen according to the figure. There are also many prejudices with respect to color which should be combated; it is generally thought that yellow is becoming to brunettes, and that the latter should avoid lilac, which is only suited to blondes. This is a mistake; yellow is suited only to fair brunettes, and is very unbecoming to those with a brown complexion, while lilac suits all complexions, even brown and yellow. The Parisian ladies know all these little secrets by instinct; they would probably be very much puzzled to analyze them, but they admirably understand how to put them in practice, to choose what suits them in the prevailing fashions, to avoid what is unbecoming, and even to make the most of what they have by transforming it in such a manner as to be always in vogue.

A number of fancy wrappings are in preparation for the watering-places and the sea-shore. These are mostly of white cashmere, and are large slashed paletots with very full sleeves. The trimming is composed of rich embroidery, richly executed with silk twist of the bright colors used for the patterns designated in Paris as cashmere designs. Silk fringe corresponding in color to the embroidery, and cords and tassels, complete the trimming; the latter are tied behind over the belt. These wrappings are worn with all kinds of dresses when the temperature renders an extra wrapping necessary. Much simpler wrappings are made for the same purpose of white cloth, embroidered with brown or black braid. These are loose paletots, hooded talmas, or else plain, short talmas without hoods. In the latter case the bottom of the talma is hollowed out in the back so as to form an arch, and a pointed or square hood is usually simulated with braid.

White muslin dresses are much worn; these are made with an over-skirt, either falling straight or looped. They are generally very simple, being trimmed with pleated flounces of the same muslin, though some are elaborately striped and trimmed with lace or guipure insertion and edging. One of these dresses, designed for a youthful bride, consists of an apple green silk skirt with low waist and short sleeves, over which is worn a white muslin skirt composed alternately of a strip of muslin two inches wide and Valenciennes insertion half an inch wide, and trimmed with a deep flounce of plain muslin, bordered with Valenciennes insertion and edging each an inch wide; tunic of plain white muslin, bordered with Valenciennes insertion and wide edging, and looped in the back with a large bow of apple green ribbon, which fastens the bottom of the tunic to the bottom of the high-necked muslin waist, trimmed with lace and insertion, which is worn over the silk one.

The silks in preparation at the Lyons factories are all in brown shades, from the darkest to the lightest. The newest brown is tinged with red, and called the tiger. It closely resembles the old Bismarck shade. Glacé silks will be much worn in the coming season. Passementerie seems destined to go out of fashion; the trimmings most in favor will be made of the material of the dress. For wrappings silk embroidery and braiding will take the lead of passementerie trimmings.

For summer dresses muslin and écru linen continue in favor. They are not trimmed with bands and folds as much as last season, but rather embroidered with white or maroon, and a very few with brown soutache.

Large Scotch plaid shawls are taking the place of the water-proof cloaks, which are convenient, I admit, but so ugly and ungraceful that we part with them without a sigh. The plaid shawls are brown and black, black and white, and green and dark blue. They are just as impermeable as water-proof, and are less sombre. They are in the shape of long circulars, with collars trimmed with fringe, and cover the dress entirely. They are rolled up and carried in a strap, like the old-fashioned water-proof.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

LIVING IN GERMANY.

AMUSEMENTS.

HEIDELBERG and, in fact, most of the German cities and towns, not excepting the metropolitan ones and capitals, are eminently, in the American sense, quiet places. Those habituated to the emotional agitation of our country, its quick social and political sensibilities, its fullness and publicity of event, and the fluctuations of a society the surface of which is ever disturbed by the shifting of its elements, will find European, and especially German, life torpid even to dullness.

There are few excitements, but many pleasures in Germany. This is especially true of Heidelberg and those kindred places where the economy of living and the facilities for education combine to render them desirable resorts for prudent American families. It will be fortunate for the older members if they have already so far resisted, by a timely discipline, the influence of the wild excitement of their own country as to submit readily to a tamer civilization. As for the younger, they will find in the out-door life of Germany, with its freedom and suggestions to move the limbs and awaken the senses, an endless source of animated pleasure as well as vigorous health. American children certainly enjoy themselves better in the quiet places of Europe than they do in the most stirring of their own country. The pleasure of a child is especially dependent upon liberty of movement, and this can be safely conceded to even the youngest almost any where in Germany. We have been in no town or city of that country which did not offer an easily accessible public park, garden, or rural suburb. There is, moreover, such a general habit of order and decorousness of demeanor, not to speak of the ever-present gens-d'armes, that out-door amusements can be enjoyed any where without risk, either physical or moral.

People who have some taste for science or literature will find in Heidelberg—and what we say is not only true of it, but many other German towns and cities—every inducement and facility for its cultivation. There are not only the regular lectures of the university, but frequent popular courses given by the professors. The college library opens its full treasures to every stranger whose fidelity to its regulations is guaranteed by his banker or some respectable citizen. The museums of natural history are large, and freely accessible without charge or fee of any kind. The Botanical Garden is within ten minutes of the most distant part of the town, and its shaded walks, arbors, and sweet-scented shrubs and flowers attract those even who are indifferent to the scientific interest of the labeled trees and plants. All the parks and neighboring grounds are, in fact, so many fields appropriated to science, for there is hardly a growing thing which does not bear its learned mark.

Heidelberg is not even devoid of the means of entertaining the mere idler. We should advise, however, no one to trust himself any where, in fact, but especially in the quiet towns of Germany, without some more or less serious object, or the illusion of one. He can not pass most of the day in a broker's office, for there is none, and find an endless topic of talk in his own and his neighbor's wealth, for the subject is never mentioned. There is, however, a club called the Museum, of which no reputable foreigner has the least difficulty in being elected a member. Here he will find all the principal newspapers of the world and chief reviews and periodicals, a supply of billiard-tables, bowling-alleys, card-rooms, and a café and restaurant. Clubs are supposed to be cheap luxuries every where, but in Heidelberg and most German towns they are reduced to a lowness of cost unapproached in any other part of the world that we, extensive traveler as we are, have ever visited. The Museum at Heidelberg demands no initiation fee, and makes an annual charge of only ten dollars! Refreshment of all kinds is at the extremely moderate prices prevailing in most German places of public resort.

Cafés and bierhäuser of course abound where people abide so little at home as the social Germans. These are cheerful places of resort, in which there is seldom wanting a full company of animated but never disorderly people. A true social equality prevails; and the peasant, taking his mittagessen of sausage and black bread from under his blouse, washes down the dry morsels with a schoppen of beer by the side of the portly burgomaster or venerable professor. There is always a group, go where you may, of students, with their varicolored caps, flaming badges, monstrous dogs, and infinite capacity for beer, to enliven the scene. The newspapers—of which there is generally an abundant supply—cards, dominoes, and billiards serve to prolong the intervals of eating and drinking; and a large part of the day is passed at the coffee or beer house by every inhabitant of the place. The cost of the ordinary articles of consumption seems ludicrously small to the American accustomed to the free demands upon his purse made at similar resorts in his own country. The capacious glass of beer at only two cents, the cup of coffee or pint of wine at four or six cents, and an hour of billiards for ten cents, permit the poorest and most saving freely to enjoy the privileges of the beer-houses and cafés. To these resorts there are generally attached gardens shaded with linden-trees, and more or less adorned with flower beds; and in the summer-time the freshness of the breeze, the coolness of the shade, and the fragrance of the blossoms give an increased flavor to the enjoyment of the beer and cigar. Women and children then oftener brighten the company with their cheerful presence.

The winter is short in Germany, and the length of the mild spring and summer, with the many inducements to out-door enjoyment afforded by the cheerful and healthful attractions of the public walks, parks, and gardens, brings with it no weariness to the most restless seeker after pleasure. Heidelberg is especially favored. There is a walk for each day of the week. The traveler—for every one visits this famous university town—need not be reminded of the glorious old castle and its magnificent hills of park and terrace, from which he has looked down with Thackeray upon the "Neckar running its bright course through that charming scene of peace and beauty." Again, the Molkenkur attracts us up the steep ascents, with its pretty Swiss cottage, and its look-out from the vine hills of the Odenwalk, over the Rhine and its broad valley, to the distant mountains of the Vosges. France was once, but is no longer, visible from this commanding summit. There is, besides, the Wolfsbrunner, the Kaiserstuhl, and the Speyerhof, all familiar places to the traveled European.

The German, who, with all his feeling for the æsthetics, is never insensible to the dietetics, will tell you, while descanting upon the picturesqueness and romance of these charming excursions, that there is a glass of beer at the end of every walk. And indeed there is, and worthy of greeting all thirsty travelers. There are delectable things for the hungry too. At the refectories of the castle and the rest you can always fare with that combination of the substantial and cheap specially provided for the fullness of German appetite and scantiness of German purse. There is hardly a day in midsummer when the hills are not echoing the orchestral music from bands placed here and there. There are open-air concerts at all these establishments frequently during each week, with the trifling charge of four or six cents for admission. On such occasions the whole population leaves the town to take its fill of a music in which it especially delights; and nothing can then be more cheerful than the walks and terraces of the castle or its rival resorts, crowded with holiday folks.

A SKETCH IN THE MONKEY-HOUSE.

THE opinions of mankind concerning monkeys are pretty well known. Other animals, such as the dog and the elephant, may, in point of intellectual development, more nearly resemble the human species; but, with regard to physical similarity, the monkeys are unequaled in their likeness to men. Consequently a cage full of monkeys possesses an intensely human interest. We seem to see ourselves through the bars, bereft of speech, it is true, and furnished with tails, but in all other respects wonderfully human.

So much for what we think about monkeys; the next question is, what do monkeys think about us? Here in our picture are a number of ladies and children gazing into the monkeys' cage at the London Zoological Gardens. Is it not possible that the denizens of those cages, being by no means destitute of brains, may have some views of their own concerning their visitors? Can we not fancy that on some balmy summer morning, before the public are admitted to the gardens, some ancient patriarch of the race, hanging gracefully by his tail with his head downward, addresses his audience thus: "Fellow-citizens, the gates are still shut, and the men-monkeys have not arrived. Let us reserve our gymnastic performances till the period of nut-throwing approaches, and spend the interval in the improvement of our intellects. I propose, fellow-citizens, to deliver a brief lecture on the Development of Species. The monkey, of course, stands at the head of animated nature; but there are links in the great chain of creation, and the man-monkey forms one of these links. In viewing the man-monkey, my friends, you view, if I may venture to borrow a literary simile, a cheap and inferior edition of yourselves. Did I hear a chatter of disapprobation from the trapeze at the north end of the hall? Allow me to inform that gentleman in the trapeze, with the little green friend here reminds me, that hair, in the case of the female man-monkey, is very often borrowed from somebody else; for, the other day, my honorable friend in green with one skillful twitch removed the whole of a lady's chignon without hurting her a bit. It is almost painful to observe, in the case of an animal so nearly allied to ourselves, that this absence of a natural coat compels the unlucky men-monkeys to cover themselves with the wool of sheep and the webs of silk-worms. Even their feet are protected by bullock-hides, and their hands by goat-skins. But there is another point in which they show their inferiority still more decidedly. I allude to their entire deprivation of that invaluable prehensile organ commonly called a tail. Nevertheless, as we know that certain members of our own family are similarly destitute, I do not despair that, as the ages roll on, the man-monkey will be furnished with that spinal prolongation which to us seems as necessary as a pair of eyes. And now let me tell my younger friends why the man-monkey entraps us and cages us. It is that he may study our habits with a view to his further development. Heavy and clumsy though he be at present, the cultivation of athletic sports will indubitably add lightness and grace to his figure, and will gradually induce a tail to sprout."

The arrival of a batch of visitors here caused the venerable sage to descend from his perch with undignified alacrity, exclaiming — so a school-boy declared—"Prigs I first nut."

Woolen Reps Wall Pocket.

THIS convenient wall pocket, which is designed to be hung on the wall over the bed, simulates a bouquet of green leaves and white flowers, made of woolen reps or cashmere, with an interlining of wadding. The stitching may be done by machine or hand with saddler's silk of the color of the green reps. The wall pocket is also trimmed with green silk cord, as shown by the illustration. Cut from Fig. 31, Supplement, one piece of card-board, one piece of green reps, and one piece of green muslin, leaving four-fifths of an inch extra material all around the two latter pieces. For the larger pocket piece cut two pieces of green reps, with the same quantity of extra material all around, from Fig. 32, Supplement; one of these pieces forms the lining. These pieces are interlined with wadding laid between muslin. Baste the piece of reps intended for the back of the pocket on wadding, and stitch the pieces with green silk as shown by the illustration, simulating the veins of leaves. For each of the four small pockets cut two pieces of white reps from Fig. 33, Supplement; furnish these pieces with a thin interlining of wadding, and quilt and ornament them in herring-bone stitch with green silk, as shown by the illustration. Run the edges of the material together, button-hole stitch the edge of the pocket pieces with green silk, at the same time fastening each pocket piece to the cover of the back of the pocket as indicated on the pattern. The flower stems are simulated with green silk cord. After fastening the larger pocket piece on the cover of the back of the pocket according to the corresponding figures, baste the latter on the card-board, and cover the loose under side of the card-board with muslin. Finally, sew a row of green silk cord on the outer edge, at the same time fastening loops to the points of the leaves of the back, which serve to hang up the pocket.

Work-Basket, Figs. 1 and 2.

THE frame for this basket is of stained black cane, the sides are of card-board covered with pleated green silk and trimmed with embroidered strips of white cloth. The frame of the basket may also be made of wire, which is covered with worsted and crystal beads. Cut of card-board one piece from Fig. 55, Supplement, and two pieces from Fig. 56; the card-board pieces, Fig. 56, are covered on the outside with a straight strip of green silk four inches and a half wide, which corresponds in length to the circumference of Fig. 56. Sew the ends of this piece together, and gather one of the outer edges closely; then fasten it on the card-board in such a manner that the gathered edge comes on the middle of Fig. 56, fold the edges of the other side on the under side of the card-board, and lace the silk on the card-board by means of long stitches, which are stretched on the under side between the edges opposite each other. Set a button covered with silk, an inch in diameter, on which gold thread is stretched, on the middle of the side covered with silk, and sew on the trimming strips as shown by the illustration. The latter consists of two strips of white cloth each twenty inches long and four-fifths of an inch wide, which are pinked finely at both sides and ornamented in point Russe embroidery with saddler's silk of a different color. Both cloth strips are interwound at regular intervals, as shown by Fig. 1; at each intersecting point they are fastened by means of a small button, which is covered with woven green silk. Cover the under side of the card-board smoothly with green silk. The card-board piece, Fig. 55, is also covered at each end, from the upper edge to the straight line on the outside, with a gathered piece of silk. The middle free part between the lines (the bottom of the basket) is smoothly covered with silk. Then cover this piece of card-board smoothly with silk on the under side, and join Figs. 55 and 56 according to the corresponding figures. Sew on a row of green silk gimp half an inch wide along the seams and the upper edge. For the frame of the basket (see Fig. 2), cut of black stained Spanish cane a quarter of an inch in diameter two pieces each twenty inches long, four pieces each eight inches and three-quarters long, two pieces each sixteen inches and three-quarters long, and two pieces each fourteen inches and a half long. Cut of cane three-tenths of an inch in diameter two pieces each twenty-one inches and a quarter long. All of these pieces are soaked in boiling water, which makes them soft and flexible, so that they may be easily bent into the shape shown by Figs. 1 and 2. Slope the two thicker pieces of cane at the ends to a length of an inch and a quarter each, then bend each piece in an oval, and fasten the ends on each other by means of small rivets. The oval thus formed must correspond with the outer edge of Figure 56. Form two similar ovals of the thinner pieces of cane each twenty inches long. They must fit exactly into the larger oval. The two pieces of cane sixteen inches and three-quarters long edge the side pieces of the basket and form the feet at the same time. Bend them in the shape shown by the illustrations, observing the upper edge of Fig. 55, Supplement. Bend the four corner pieces, which are eight inches and three-quarters long. The remaining two pieces form the handle. Then join all the hoops and bars into a frame as shown by the illustration by means of small black rivets. The two hoops are joined at the bottom (see Fig. 2) by two straight pieces of the requisite length; between the two latter set a piece of cane bent in a long four-cornered piece. Now put the joined pieces of card-board into the frame, fasten them on the latter, and, finally, set on the two cane hoops arranged in a handle. These, as well as the corner bars of the frame, are furnished at the ends each with a bronze plate and a large black bead; the latter are also fastened by means of a thin rivet. Bows of green silk ribbon three-quarters of an inch wide finish the basket.

bars must rest loosely on the foundation. Now work the parts in button-hole and knotted stitch as shown by the illustration. Where the button-hole edge should be wider and more raised underlay the outlines more thickly. Work the lace stitches, separate the embroidery from the underlayer, and cut away the foundation on the under side, and also cut away the projecting material at the scalloped outer edge.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SAMPLE.—By all means make your linen lawn by directions given for box-pleated waists of cambric and calico dresses in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 28, Vol. IV. A narrow gathered ruffle is on the upper skirt, a wider flounce on the lower. The Bazar does not admire the dark brown linen trimmings on lighter linen. Bias bands of the same linen are far prettier, and, if you can afford it, linen fringe on the upper skirt. The box-pleated waist, or else a regular polonaise in the apron-polonaise shape, is commended for the buff suit. Wear black belt and gros grain sash with shirt-waists, but not with polonaise.

H. M. H.—Your sample is pongee. Make by pattern of Traveling Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 21, Vol. IV.

AUNTIE.—The cut paper patterns of children's clothing that we have already given will supply you with all the guides you need in dressing your nieces and nephews. For the girl of twelve use the misses' polonaise suit, the Gabrielle and walking dress will answer for the smallest boy and girl, and the knee-breeches suit illustrated in Bazar No. 29, Vol. IV., will fit the boy of seven. The Bazars in which these suits are illustrated will furnish more lengthy suggestions about materials and making than we could possibly give in this column.

JACKSON.—Light pantaloons and dark coat are not worn as full dress; but they appear at many receptions where gentlemen are in full evening dress.

BROWN AND WHITE CHECK.—Gore your skirt sufficiently to get some broad pieces for making a false postilion-basque. This will improve your round waist.

CORA M.—Sashes are not tied in bows, but are long loops drawn over the belt, with short ends but little longer than the loops.

MINING TOWN.—Your sample is not real seersucker, but merely calico. The stripe, however, is stylish, and will make up prettily by directions given for calico dresses in Bazar No. 28, Vol. IV. The figured grenadine is out of style. Get a solid black or a striped grenadine, and make by Postilion-Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV.

ZARAH H.—We do not believe you have been cheated in your silk. It seems to be all silk; but the Bazar, with all its experience, can not pronounce positively on the black silks now in market. The only test is in wearing them. Your sample certainly makes a good show for the money invested.

HATTIE.—A demi-train and basque is all you need of your gray dress. Trim with gray fringe and passementerie.

A CONSTANT READER.—Your sample is a poor imitation of Valenciennes lace, and not good enough for under-sleeves, etc. Plain muslins look better than figured over silk. Put a button in the seams and halfway between each seam of your skirt, and fasten to a tape strap and button-hole pendent from the belt of your skirt.

J. S. L.—The engagement ring is worn on the third finger of the left hand—that is, next the little finger.

MAUD.—Make your pretty écru linen by directions for cambric dresses in Bazar No. 28, Vol. IV. Put a deep side pleating on the lower skirt, headed by a bias band. Linen fringe and a bias band trim the upper skirt. Make your silk a suit by Postilion-Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV.

KATRINE.—You can not wear a trained petticoat with a court train, because the court train is worn over a short dress skirt. Make your écru pongee by Postilion-Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. Trim with darker brown silk and fringe.

TENNESSEE.—Your black grenadine basque and sleeves can be lined with farmer's satin. The skirts are not lined, but should be worn over a black farmer's satin skirt. Make with slight train and loop for the street by buttons and straps near the top. The trimming you suggest is pretty. A linen over-skirt and sacque or shirt-waist, or else a linen polonaise, over a black skirt of silk or alpaca, is popular for a traveling suit. Sashes are worn with shirt-waists, but not with basques or polonaises.

MRS. S. J. C.—Gray linen is selected for new suits this summer, because almost every lady had a buff linen last year; but both are stylish. Make by hints in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 28, Vol. IV.

KATE AND ALICE.—The Gabrielle and walking coat are the best patterns for a child's first short clothes. By way of variety you can have yoke dresses—the waist and skirt in one, gathered to a yoke. Mothers often cut off the skirts of long robes for short yoke slips. Children are seldom seen in short-sleeved and low-necked dresses any more.

SUBSCRIBER.—White Swiss polonaises or over-skirts and sacques are worn over black silk or quiet colors, and are not thought too dressy for church in the country.

MRS. P. M. R.—Trim the apron-polonaise of your buff linen suit with an inch-wide bias band of the linen and buff fringe. Put a side pleating three fingers deep around the dress skirt, headed by a bias linen band.

B. N. G.—The bride-maid is one of the first to congratulate the bride, and she usually remains standing as during the ceremony.

OXELLE.—Gaze de Chambery, grenadine, or white muslin with lace, may all be used as bridal dresses when satin and silk are objected to.

DESOLATION.—It is proper for a lady to wear mourning for the lover who dies after their engagement has been made public and before marriage. "How long and how deep" she will wear it depends upon her own tastes and feelings.

MRS. G. G.—Your sample is a checked grenadine, and should be worn over black silk, or else farmer's satin. Trim with gathered ruffles, either wide or narrow, as you fancy.

MORRISETTA.—If two people really and truly love each other, the fact that the gentleman is three years the lady's junior will not cause them unhappiness.

WINNIE.—We have not given a cut paper pattern of the Marguerite polonaise. The Worth basque and over-skirt are among the most stylish worn now. The Bazar introduced them some time ago, but there is nothing newer.

X. Y. Z.—Black grenadine trimmed with crape bands is worn by widows in fresh mourning. The polonaise style is preferred. It should be made over farmer's satin, as it is less lustrous than silk.

M. A. G.—"Hannah" and "The Lovels of Arden" are not concluded. We publish them as soon as the advance sheets arrive.

ADA N.—Make the dress like green sample by pattern of Traveling Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 21, Vol. IV., and trim with bias bands of the same and fringe.

MRS. S. H. S.—We can not recall the letter inclosing sample. A cut paper pattern of misses' suit has been sent you.

MRS. B. S. P.—Gabrielles of plaid flannel will be pretty for your boy's winter dresses.

CÆSAR covered his bald head and gray hair with a laurel crown. AYER'S HAIR VIGOR covers gray heads with the still more welcome locks of youth.—[Com.]

HALL'S Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer removes scurf and all impurities from the scalp.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

HOTTENTOTS SEEN GATHERING BUCHU LEAVES AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE FOR H. T. HELMBOLD.

BUCHU.

[From Dispensatory of the United States.]

DIOSMA CRENATA—BUCHU LEAVES.

PROPERTIES.—Their odor is strong, diffusive, and somewhat aromatic; their taste bitterish and analogous to mint.

MEDICAL PROPERTIES AND USES.—Buchu leaves are gently stimulant, with a peculiar tendency to the Urinary Organs.

They are given in complaints of the Urinary Organs, such as Gravel, Chronic Catarrh of the Bladder, Morbid Irritation of the Bladder and Urethra, Disease of the Prostate Gland, and Retention or Incontinence of Urine, from a loss of tone in the parts concerned in its evacuation. The remedy has also been recommended in Dyspepsia, Chronic Rheumatism, Cutaneous Affections, and Dropsy.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU is used by persons from the ages of 18 to 25, and from 35 to 55, or in the decline or change of life; after Confinement or Labor Pains; Bed-Wetting in children.

In affections peculiar to Females the Extract Buchu is unequaled by any other remedy.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has cured every case of Diabetes in which it has been given. Irritation of the Neck of the Bladder and Inflammation of the Kidneys, Ulceration of the Kidneys and Bladder, Retention of Urine, Diseases of the Prostate Gland, Stone in the Bladder, Calculus, Gravel, Brick-Dust Deposit, and Mucous or Milky Discharges, and for enfeebled and delicate constitutions of both sexes attended with the following symptoms: Indisposition to Exertion, Loss of Power, Loss of Memory, Difficulty of Breathing, Weak Nerves, Trembling, Horror of Disease, Wakefulness, Dimness of Vision, Pain in the Back, Hot Hands, Flushing of the Body, Dryness of the Skin, Eruption on the Face, Pallid Countenance, Universal Lassitude of the Muscular System, &c.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU is Diuretic and Blood-Purifying, and cures all diseases arising from habits of dissipation, excesses and imprudences in life, impurities of the Blood, &c., superseding Copaiba in affections for which it is used, in connection with HELMBOLD'S ROSE WASH.

Ask for Helmbold's. Take no other.

Describe symptoms in all communications.

HELMBOLD'S FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA,

The Great Blood Purifier and Beautifier of the Complexion.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA

will radically exterminate from the system Scrofula, Syphilis, Fever Sores, Ulcers, Sore Eyes, Sore Legs, Sore Mouth, Sore Head, Bronchitis, Skin Diseases, Salt-Rheum, Cankers, Runnings from the Ear, White Swellings, Tumors, Cancerous Affections, Nodes, Rickets, Glandular Swellings, Night Sweats, Rash, Tetter, Humors of all kinds, Chronic Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, and all diseases that have been established in the system for years.

BEING PREPARED EXPRESSLY FOR THE ABOVE COMPLAINTS, ITS BLOOD-PURIFYING PROPERTIES ARE GREATER THAN ANY OTHER PREPARATION OF SARSAPARILLA. IT GIVES THE COMPLEXION A CLEAR AND HEALTHY COLOR, AND RESTORES THE PATIENT TO A STATE OF HEALTH AND PURITY. FOR PURIFYING THE BLOOD, REMOVING ALL CHRONIC CONSTITUTIONAL DISEASES ARISING FROM AN IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, AND THE ONLY RELIABLE AND EFFECTUAL KNOWN REMEDY FOR THE CURE OF PAINS AND SWELLINGS OF THE BONES, ULCERATIONS OF THE THROAT AND LEGS, BLOTCHES, PIMPLES ON THE FACE, ERYSIPELAS, AND ALL SCALY ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, AND BEAUTIFYING THE COMPLEXION.

HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE PILLS,

The most reliable PURGATIVE and CATHARTIC known, superseding Salts, Magnesia, &c., in Sick or Nervous Headache, Jaundice, Indigestion, Constipation, Dyspepsia, Biliousness, Liver Complaints, General Debility, &c. No nausea, no griping pains, but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation.

The CATAWBA GRAPE PILLS are purely vegetable, being composed of Catawba Grape Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb.

Beware of those cheap patent pills carelessly prepared by inexperienced persons, most of which contain either calomel, mercury, or other deleterious drugs.

FACETIÆ.

If the ants give an example of industry, it is much more than a good many uncles do.

A SANGUINE SPECULATION.—"An Illinois paper calls itself the Artery," says a contemporary, "in the hope of pushing its circulation." Yet success will all depend upon whether it is carried on in the right vein. The principal outpourings of the Artery will, of course, be what one would dub (b)leading articles.

A CAPITAL FELLOW—The possessor of a million.

DRAWING.

"Can you draw at all, young man?" asked Uncle Raphael of an applicant for private instruction.

"Oh yes, considerable," replied the candidate. "At ten years of age I could draw beer, cider, or a sled up a hill; at twelve, a truck loaded with cabbage; at fifteen, a prize in a lottery; at seventeen, an inference; and at twenty, a bill of exchange. If I were an actor, I reckon I could draw the largest kind of a house; but I'm going to be a teacher, and shall have to be content with drawing a salary—the bigger the better."

"Well, you may draw up a chair and sit down," said Uncle Raphael; "you'll do for a beginner."

"THE HOUR OF NEED"—You can not help knowing it, for when it does come it is sure to strike one.

The following is told of a young society gentleman who graduated from Harvard. On the examination in physics he was asked, "Mr. ——, what planets were known to the ancients?"

"Well, Sir," he responded, "there were Venus and Jupiter and" (after a pause), "I think, the earth, but I'm not quite certain."

THE PIERIAN SPRING—A font of type.

FOLK IN THE MOON.

On a recent moonlight night a mother had the following observation made to her by her son, "It maun be a' nonsense, mither, about there being folk i' the moon."

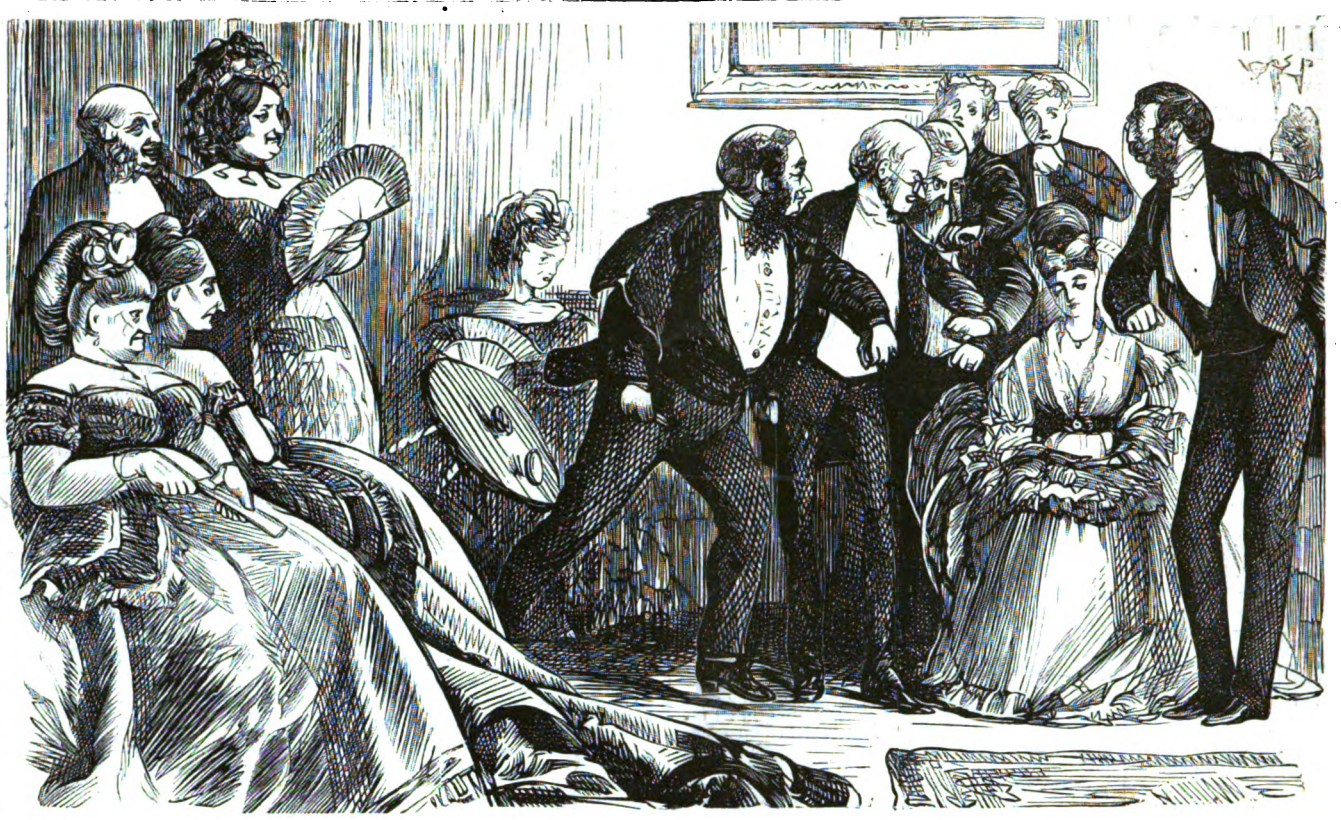
"What way, my man?"

"Ou, because how could they crush themselves thegither when it's only half-moon?"

"Maybe the folk are like spy-glasses, and shut themselves in," said mamma, grinning.

EMBLEMS OF—

Glory—No arms, no legs, and no relations.
Virtue—A diamond necklet.
Time—A set of false teeth.
Humility—Shaking hands with your baker.
Charity—Nickel half-dimes at a collection.
Resignation—Keeping five servants instead of seven.
Religion—Having a pew and letting the servants fill it.
Consolation—I hereby give and bequeath.
Hope—Bill at six months.
Love—Soothing-sirup.
Youth—Gaudy neck-ties.
Truth—A horse-dealer.



AWKWARD SCENE AT A DINNER-PARTY.

UNCONVENTIONAL HOST (who has completely forgotten his wife's instructions as to who was to pair off with whom). "Oh—a—Dinner's Ready, Gentlemen. No Ceremony, I beg. Take down whom you Please!"

IT WAS VERY ELEGANT OF YOUNG WHATSHISNAME TO SO GRACEFULLY ACKNOWLEDGE THE SALUTATION OF THE TWO YOUNG MISSES THINGEMBOB.

BUT WHY THE DICKENS DID HE NOT MANAGE TO KEEP CLEAR OF THE WHEELBARROW?

DREADFUL INCIDENT IN A RISING SUBURB.

CLASSICAL QUERIES.

Whether Hannibal really cut his way through the Alps, as it has been alleged, by pouring vinegar over them—whether he peppered them, or carried them by assault?

Whether Hebe was really the daughter of Jupiter and Juno; and if so, how could She-be?

Whether Hesiod, described as a very early Bœotian poet, was really so very early; and if so, at what hour did he generally turn out on a winter's morning?

Whether Homer, who wrote "Homeri Operi," ever heard any of his own operas performed?

Whether Mæcenas, so highly famed for his countenance of Virgil, ever drew the Latin poet's portrait?

Whether the Groves of Academus were on the site now occupied by the Groves of Blarney?

Whether the small band that accompanied Æneas on his wanderings in Italy was a quartette band, or whether, in consequence of the expected length of march, it was a band adapted for promenade concerts?

Whether the hundred hands of Briareus were ever known to strike at once?

Whether Cerberus, the dog who had three heads, found himself undecided when he wanted to wag his tail?

Whether Diana's partiality for the chase rendered her so chaste?

Whether the fact of the cynic Diogenes living in a tub caused him to try and make a butt of every one?

Whether the Dryads ever got wet?

The young lady whose feelings were "all worked up" has ordered a fresh supply.

An experienced dark nurse says: "It isn't much trouble to take care o' sick pussens; most on 'em don't want any thing, and if they do, they don't get it."

CONJUGAL REFLECTION.—A woman with two heads may be found to be attractive. But conceive, says Mr. Phunky, a wife having two tongues! Woe betide the husband who yields to her attractiveness.

WRESTLING EXTRAORDINARY.—Those who wish to keep Time will succeed by seizing him by the forelock rather than about the waste.

It has rained so hard at Milwaukee for four months that all the children born there are web-footed.

Why is buttermilk like something which never happened?—Because it hasn't a curd (occurred).

GROUND-BAIT—Advertisements on the pavement.

You can't get blood from a stone, but you can get money from a brick.

What is the difference between a rhododendron and a cold apple-dumpling? (Perfectly obvious, and yet nobody ever guesses it).—Why, of course, the one is a rhododendron, and the other is a cold apple-dumpling.

PATERFAMILIAS (with his family at a country inn). "Have you any West India Pickles, Waiter?"
PADDY. "We've not, Sor."
PATERFAMILIAS. "No Hot Pickles of any Description?"
PADDY. "No; shure they're all Cowld, Sor."

BOB. "I say, 'Arry, 'ow is it yer don't 'it it off with Tom Wright?"
'ARRY. "Well, yer see, he's such a Cad! He's always talkin' rot about Mental Culture, and that sorter thing, yer know, and yer never 'ear of 'is bein' in Debt, or gettin' Tight—or doin' any think Manly, yer see!"

YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS elegant suit may be worn by youths from eight to fifteen years old, and is equally well adapted to summer, fall, and winter materials. In the original the pantaloons are of pearl gray, and the vest and coat of black summer cassimere. The pattern is graded, as usual, by the bust measure, which is taken in the ordinary way, by passing the tape measure around the body, under the jacket, close under the arms, and drawing it moderately tight. As, however, the length of the pantaloons may vary, before cutting the cloth care should be taken to measure the person, and adapt the pattern thereto. To measure for the length of leg of pantaloons, measure from the fork toward the ankle to the point which the pantaloons are desired to reach; then measure the pattern the same way, and lengthen or shorten it as much as may be required. In cutting, care should be taken to let the nap of the cloth run toward the bottom of the garment. Be very particular to put the pattern together by the notches. The suit is furnished in eight sizes, from 25 to 32 inches, bust measure, for youths from eight to fifteen years old.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises three articles, viz.: English walking coat, vest, and spring-bottom pantaloons.

ENGLISH WALKING COAT.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, back, sleeve, collar, and pocket welt. The perforations show where to put the buttons, breast pocket, cash pocket, and pocket on the hip. The perforations at the top of the sleeve show the form of the under part, and those on the collar where it should be creased and well shrunken in with a hot iron, so that it will fit to the neck. Roll the lapel to the top button-hole. Sew the sleeve with the longest seam to the notch in the back, the hollowing side to come to the lowest part of the armhole under the arm. Finish with a single row of stitching near the edge. Allowance is made for quarter-inch seams in this pattern. If the sleeves are too long or short, add to or take from the bottom and the top an equal amount, always keeping the same shape. The average length is given in the pattern, and this can easily be increased or lessened to suit exceptional cases.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for youth eight years old, 2¼ yards.

Farmer's satin for lining, 2¼ yards.

Buttons, 4.

Add one-eighth of a yard for each size.

VEST.—This pattern is in three pieces—front, back, and collar. The perforations show where to put on the buttons and pockets, and where to crease the collar and shrink it in with a hot iron so as to make it fit well to the neck. Allowance for quarter-inch seams is made in this pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for youth eight years old, five-eighths of a yard.

Buttons, 4.

SPRING-BOTTOM PANTALOONS.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, back, waistband, back strap, fly, and facing under the fly for buttons. Place the pockets between the notches in the outside seam and the top, and face with a strip of the same material as the pantaloons. Put a piece of canvas four inches wide in the bottom for stiffening. The pantaloons should be shrunk at the bottom on the wrong side with a hot iron, so as to make them fit easily over the boots. Allowance is made in the pattern for quarter-inch seams, and an inch for facing at the bottom.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for youth eight years old, 1¾ yards.

Buttons, 11.

Add one-eighth of a yard for each size.

Ladies' Toilettes.

WOMAN'S WORK.

IN all the talk concerning the elevation of women from their present barbarism, of women's wages and women's work, it may be doubted if much serious consideration has been given to the amount of work and of intelligence that at present are absolutely required of every woman, simply as a woman, and independently of the trade, business, or profession in which she may be engaged.

We are perpetually being taunted with the perfections of our grandmothers, with their bread, their cake, their preserves, their cookery, and housewifery in general. No one seems to remember that we have invented since their day a score of new styles of bread; that where our grandmothers had half a dozen recipes for cake, and killed their husbands with the slow torture of black fruit-cake, a sort of peine forte et dure, lying, as it did, like a stone on the stomach—where they had an ignominious poverty, we have varied the disease with at least a hundred different and less guilty concoctions; while our endless list of preserves and jellies and canned delicacies, if they could but hear of them, would make the good people turn in their graves with longing for the flesh-pots of Egypt.

But our grandmothers made their light bread, their rich cake, their tolerable sweetmeats; some of them did a little weaving, and a good deal of spinning; they made their husband's and their children's clothes, roping in the little ten-year-old daughters to the fine sewing; they ruled their servants with rods of iron; and that was all they were asked to do. Their accomplishments, with seldom exception of harpsichord or spinet, were confined to dancing and such simple embroideries as enabled them to mark their household linen plainly; they could read the Bible without much spelling, and they could sign their name to a deed after a fashion.

But look at their descendants. These are expected to leave school stored with an amount of information the mere catalogue of whose leading subjects would have dizzied the brains of their ancestresses with a consciousness of total imbecility. They must have such accomplishments as a certain amount of music, of drawing and painting, of acquaintance with at least two languages besides their own; they are expected to make no more of dancing than of walking, of embroidering and crocheting than of felling a seam; to be well acquainted with literature, with the topics of the day; to be able to give good reason for the faith, or want of faith, that is in them; to have, moreover, all the feminine graces that adorned their grandmothers; and when they marry, although it is understood that the servants, and not they, are to hold the rod of iron, they are expected to exhibit, whether they actually do exhibit or not, an orderly and admirable system of housekeeping according to the latest methods and appliances. To be sure, they have no loom to round their shoulders over, nor any spinning-wheel to flatten their thumbs, except in so far as their lots may be cast in the vast pandemonium of the deafening mills; but in their place there is the sewing-machine to weaken their ankles and bring on nameless diseases, with all the countless intricacies of tucks and bands it has originated; there is a patent sweeper, making about as much trouble as it saves; there is an egg-beater, claimed to revolutionize domestic life, and having which a woman would be a wretch to complain, but which, in the old country, has been worked to as good purpose, time out of mind, with a jack and string; and though there may be rubber wringers in the kitchen, there are ten articles now to one formerly to be wrung through them; and in spite of all the ameliorations of life to those who dwell in city houses—the description of which their grandmothers could only treat as a fairy tale, with the account of the gas and water and elevators and speaking-tubes and all the rest—in spite of these things and such as these a thousand new wants have arisen with them, and have become necessities, and made life not one iota less laborious now than in the good old days, "so called."

Meantime, those who live in the city houses are a small number at most, and the fortunate ladies of Beacon Street and Murray Hill and Michigan Avenue and the like must pass for mere nonentities in summing up the grand total of myriad wives and mothers over all the breadth of the land. These live in houses but little better than the preceding generations had, and something harder to keep clean; have but few more ingenious contrivances to supply their needs; have needs unknown to those who went before, and which the luxury of the age has painfully imposed upon them; while, at the same time, their chief duties are unaltered: babies are not born by machinery, nor brought up, any more than they were a hundred years ago; and even a nursing-bottle, bringing with superior qualities superior complications, requires twice the time and attention now that it did then. So that on the whole, since the old simplicity of life has vanished before the new conveniences, we find more work, if any thing, in every family, and can not declare that the present civilization has largely lightened the labors of woman, in whatever degree it may have refined and improved her mental being.

"Man's work is from sun to sun,
But woman's work is never done," says the threadbare adage, and so truly that the world recognizes it as an axiom as immortally fixed as that which declares a straight line to be the shortest distance between two points. Of course we do not speak of the few wealthy women lolling at their ease. As we said before, they are mere bubbles on the great tide of the average of women. We speak of that class of women each one of whom combines in her own person the office of wife, mother, housekeeper, servant, and any thing else unoccupied there may happen to be within the four walls where her husband has placed her. Take one day's routine from their lives, for example. In some rarely virtuous exceptions among them the husband rose and made the fires, and pottered round the house and yard, doing convenient little nothings, agreeable to have if done, but not much missed if undone; but more usually he turned for a last sweet snooze till his wife, having laid and kindled the fire and made ready the meal, summoned him to his smoking breakfast—the wife much preferring that course, on the whole, to the bother she would have to endure about her work in the constant criticism and suggestion of his better experience. We can assume, if we will, that his affections were warm and his temper perfect, and that he made the morning meal a delightful half hour to his family ere he went across the threshold, and the day's work began for him. He went to his business—possibly with a sense that things were going on by clock-work at home, not by handiwork, possibly with no sense at all about it—and his business was one solid thing about which and which only he was expected to have either knowledge or skill. He may be a book-keeper; he is occupied with his figures, and is not called upon to be a salesman. He may be a salesman, and he takes down and puts up the goods, and chaffers with the customers, and is not called upon to be a porter. He may be a merchant; all that is required is that he should know what to buy and where to sell. He may be a mechanic; he would be rated, if he attended to any thing more than his specialty, as Jack at all trades and good at none.

But his wife! Her first duty is to be a thorough domestic. She is to be a good scullion, or she is disgraced with floors ill scrubbed or pots and pans poorly scoured, with smoking lamps and rusty knives and greasy dishes; a good chamber-maid, for the family health will suffer if the beds and rooms are not neat and clean; a good house-maid, and know exactly where to throw tea leaves, how to sweep without making more dirt than she takes away, how to dust without smutching. She must be a good washer and ironer, for nobody knows better than she the rout that will be made over the shirts if they are not right to a particle, and in which if the starch is one grain too light they will be "limp as a rag," and if too heavy they will be stiff enough "to cut a man's ears off;" and nobody would be more vexed than she to have her husband go about with mortifying linen on; and nobody loves better than she to see her children march off to school in their spotless tiers. She must be a good nursery-maid, or else her children's bodies will be injured and their dispositions soured; perhaps, too, a few duties of the governess are to be thrown in, if, being ambitious for the little people's success, she hears the doubtful lesson before the school bell rings. She must be a good cook; it is both her duty and her policy, for she believes, with Bichât, that the epigastric ganglion of nerves is the brain of the emotions—or, in other words, that man is, like most animals, to be influenced through his stomach. What if the bread should be streaked, the pies not baked at the bottom, the fruit settled in the pudding, the potatoes waxy, the veal too rare, the beef too well done—would it not be ample cause for a divorce, or would it not be very likely to lead to one? With all this, since in this country she is "just as good as any body," she must be ready at any moment to lay aside the rôle of menial with her great apron, and, dress clean, collar straight, hair smooth, to answer the door bell, and greet the guest in the character of lady. And in all her duties she must have exercised a precision, skill, and calculation equal to any emergency or any calling. Then, too, the heavy work being well under way, she must be a complete seamstress; she must know how to seat her husband's worn trowsers and make her little boys' jackets as well as if she had been brought up a tailoress; she must fit the little girls' gowns as if she had been brought up a mantua-maker; she must trim their bonnets, if not her own, like a milliner; she must, in short, cut out and stitch together all the family garments, make caps and cloaks and muffs and mittens, represent, in fact, every trade in some measure except the shoe-maker's, thinking herself lucky and well used if now and then she does not have to cobble the shoes into the bargain! Nor, meanwhile, must she neglect any of the duties of the good mother. She must be ready to settle disputes, to make pleasure, to heal the sick, to give caresses, to answer distracting questions, to impart religious and other instruction, to bring her children up in the way they should go; and when her husband comes home, no matter how much the teething baby has fretted, the fire has refused to burn, the work has dragged at her soul, she must be the happy welcoming wife, a sunbeam in his house—and if she has sinned in one of these requirements, she has sinned in all. Not that husbands mean to be selfish or tyrannical or exacting, or do not love their wives with all their hearts, but that custom has established this order of things, and her own conscience and womanly love of approbation would destroy her if she did not do all as well as in her lay.

We confess that when we indulge in such a train of thought, and know such statements to be true, and that the odalisque of the harem has hardly a more absolute bondage than such women have, we are appalled with all it intimates and threatens. And we must declare that it behooves the race, wishing to be elevated, first to elevate its women out of such serfdom—to look about and find some remedy to a state of things universally accepted as the only state at present to be had. For ourselves, we are free to say that the surest help out of the darkness which we can see is in the adoption of the Cambridge plan of associated kitchens, furnishing hot meals and clean clothes to families at cost price, and leaving the mother of the family in her own house still, and with time to consider if the life she lives is worth the price of living.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Card-Playing.

MY DEAR JACK,—I was lately traveling by the train, and had taken a seat in the spacious and comfortable drawing-room car, gazing at the landscape and observing my fellow-passengers, when a gentleman entered, and, after looking about for a moment, and remarking that every body seemed to be engaged but me, he smiled, and said, courteously, "Would you like to take a hand at cards?" And he told me that a party in one of the little rooms, whose voices I had heard laughing and talking, needed only one person more to complete the proper number for a game. I thanked the gentleman, but I was compelled to tell him the truth, so I said, as politely as I could, "The fact is that I always drop asleep at cards." He looked at me suspiciously, as if he supposed me to be joking; but, as it is the truth, I did not betray any jesting intention, and the gentleman bowed and withdrew, blaming himself probably for not having foreseen that an old gentleman of my aspect was not likely to accept his invitation.

I saw him presently returning with a recruit whom he had found elsewhere; and for a long time afterward, as we were passing some of the finest scenery upon the continent, we could hear that loud and not merry laughter which proceeds from the card-table. But don't suppose, my dear Jack, that I am an enemy of cards. Like all other amusements, they are often very entertaining; but I have no passion for them, as many people seem to have. Sometimes I am fairly forced to take a hand at whist, when not to play would be to spoil the pleasure of three other persons. So I sit down, but with a sinking of the heart and sad misgivings. Your old whist-player, Mrs. Battle, for instance, is so terribly in earnest! The game is like the most solemn religious act. The silence and gravity in which it is played are awful. The deep sense of injury with which a bad play is regarded is too appalling for me; and when I seat myself with veterans at the whist-table I feel like an arrant impostor. I know that my excuses and deprecations are totally unavailing, and that they neither hear nor believe what I say. It is simply preposterous to them that a person should be so nonsensical as to insist that he does not like whist. You might as well tell the Duke of Clarence that you did not like Malmsey.

When the game begins I am in such an excited condition that I play second hand high, and lead trumps when I have no more, and throw out a whole series of the most positive but the most illusive signals to my partner. I am like the commander of a fortress who has lost his wits in the battle, and who allures his supporting army to destruction by false lights. At first I am overwhelmed with shame, and my conscious eyes avoid the stern virtue of Mrs. Battle's glance. But as the game proceeds, and the anarchy of my play becomes utterly hopeless, involving that unhappy lady in the shame of countless apparent blunders, compromising her very reputation as a wise and superior player, I grow reckless apace; I actually smile as I play at random; and I gaze blandly in her disturbed and indignant face as I frantically perpetrate every crime of misplay possible in the venerable game.

And if this excitement passes away under the sway of a more lenient partner than Mrs. Battle I become fatally drowsy. The silence and monotony of the game lull me irretrievably. My eyelids press together, my companions fade into spectres, my hand becomes lead, sweet oblivion steeps my senses, when the very silence arouses me, and I find that I have nodded, and that the game has stopped, every eye bent severely and with amazing and exasperating wakefulness upon me. Can you not imagine, my dear Jack, with what a sickly and vague smile I study my cards, profoundly unconscious both of what the last trick was, and of what my play should be? Indeed, on one occasion, which I can not recall even now without a certain terror, after resisting the sand-man with desperation, he suddenly emptied a load upon me, and I fell so sound asleep that my whole hand dropped upon the table, showing every card that I held, and, of course, bringing the solemn service to an abrupt close.

I thought of these things as I heard the sounds from the card-party in the car, and I knew that they were not playing whist. And as the train rolled on I thought of the little game, and of the cards, and of their various suits, until I found that I was musing upon the greater journey upon the road that we are all traveling; and Fate, or Destiny, or Life seemed to me to be playing with mankind as with a pack of cards, and all of us cast in some one of the suits. There is the suit of hearts—the emotional forces; the affections, sympathies, ambitions. There are clubs—brute strength, or, reflectively, intellectual power. The spades—what are they but industry? and the diamonds, but the force of money, the might of external splendor? I remembered the picture of the "Game of Life" by the German Retzsch—Mephistopheles playing a game of chess with a beautiful youth for his soul. But the game of life is played with cards rather.

You open your history, my dear Jack—that history in which I have no doubt that you read a chapter every day—and in the earliest ages the great game seems to be played with clubs. If the beginning were barbarism, which I do not assert, and which no man knows, it was the rule of force, of brutality. Does Homer recount traditions that were ever told, or is it an old tale of the poet, or of many poets, merely? "The great Achilles, whom I knew"—what is he but the king of clubs? or is he the ace and Hector king? It is still a game in which clubs were trumps, and he won most who was richest in that suit. The game is played with every suit, indeed, and trumps change with the constant deal. But when we come down to the epoch in which we hear the hermit Peter crying "God wills it! God wills it!" and Christian Europe pours into Asia to rescue the holy sepulchre, the civilized world is lifted upon a great emotion, religious fervor inspires all Christendom, and hearts are trumps. Still later, when this zeal has died away, and instead of Cologne Cathedral and religious temples, the palaces are built of Versailles and Marly—when the spirit of the age is symbolized in the glory of Louis the Fourteenth, and modern times begin—it is plain to see that it is hearts no longer, but diamonds, which are trumps. And in the world which the imagination sees, the Arcadia of the poets and of hope, the millennium of the prophet and the religious enthusiast, still the great game goes on; but men learn war no more; the spear is beaten into the pruning-hook, the sword into the plowshare: peace and industry and pastoral joy prevail, and spades are trumps.

So the great heroes are the picture-cards, the court-cards, of history. When Xerxes comes glittering and endless out of Persia into Greece, when Alexander is universal victor, when Julius Cæsar masters Rome, when all the great captains, to Napoleon Bonaparte, carve their names with their swords, they are all kings of clubs if their cause is humane, and knaves if it is not. The poets, the philosophers, the story-tellers, they are the kings and queens of hearts. From Homer to Hawthorne, they lead the precious suit to which all priests of the imagination belong, and of which our Shakespeare is the ace. Then the sober suit of spades, with all its honors: from Gutenberg to Morse, the great inventors, the direct benefactors, they are the kings and queens and aces of the honorable and millennial suit, and they only are the knaves who prostitute invention to base ends. And who, dear Jack, are the kings and queens of diamonds? Not rich men merely. Your father may have been a highwayman, and your fortune may be but the money that he stole. That is not a patent of regality, nor a kingship by the grace of God or of desert. If you will go with me about the city, into fine houses and into public offices, or to the gayest haunts of summer fashion—to Newport, to Saratoga, to Long Branch—I will show you the knaves of diamonds. And there with them, indeed, may be the kings and queens. But these are not they who wear the diamonds for their own display, but who light the way of others with their lustre. They are the rich who do not plate their own lives with gold, but cheer the world with their beneficence. They are the stewards of a divine bounty. Their diamonds are seen, not upon their shirt bosoms, but in great schools, in hospitals, in reading-rooms, in workshops, in lodging-houses, in thoughtful details of beneficence every where. They are the kings and queens of the splendid suit. When such large souls are in the hands of Destiny, diamonds are indeed trumps.

You see, my dear Jack, how the fancy spun itself in my mind as we rattled along, hour after hour, in the beautiful summer day, while the game went on in the car, and I heard from time to time the laugh of the players. I thought of the private lives I knew all around me in which this or the other suit was trumps. I do not blame the choice, if, indeed, it be not rather temperament. Here is Tom, whose soul is devoted to his game, in which diamonds are trumps. He sees every thing through them. He measures every thing by them. He secretly thinks that they will make home happy, and that without them it must be chilly and pinched. He supposes that every man is swayed by them at last, and that they are the indispensable good. Here is Will, who smiles at Tom, and who sets his hope upon position and public power. He gladly spurns the diamonds, if he can touch the hearts of men. And here Ned wonders at both, and finds his sole delight in rural seclusion and his spade; while Hal is happy in boating, hunting, leaping—a muscular Christian, a king of clubs.

So are we all distributed, dear Jack, each in his suit: so may life seem, in little or in large, a game of cards. I wonder if we could persuade Mrs. Battle and her friends at the whist-table to play the real game as earnestly as they do their little parody of it?

Yours, dear Jack,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE Youth's Suit, an illustration of which is given on our first page, consists of an English walking coat, vest, and pantaloons. It is worn by boys from nine to fifteen years of age. The coat is single-breasted, fits the figure easily, covers the hips well, and is made after the English fashion, with broad back, open below the waist, and an overlapping flap, side body seams very wide apart, and a button on each seam to define the waist. Broad pocket flaps are also used. Two buttons fasten the front. The collar rolls low, beginning at the upper button. The edges of the coat are turned in and a facing stitched on, or else the entire garment is bound with braid.

The vest is single-breasted, with a low collar. The pantaloons are easy-fitting, with considerable spring at the ankle, and are made to wear with suspenders, precisely like those worn by gentlemen.

Blue-black, blue, and dark green cloth are selected for dressy suits of this description, which can easily be made up from the cut paper pattern published. The entire suit of one fabric is usually bought, costing about $25 for sizes large enough for a boy of twelve years. A binding of silk braid, and fine lasting buttons, finish the coat without ornaments. A pretty suit for midsummer is made of the jacket of blue diagonal cloth with white pantaloons. Fine diagonal cloth costs from $6 to $7 a yard, and is a yard and a half wide. Smooth surface blue cloth, weighty enough for the present and for fall wear, costs from $2 50 to $4 a yard. Entire suits of white duck, and of the white washing cloth—a sort of twilled flannel—are made for the seaside. Every-day suits are of gray Cheviots or brown, or else black with irregular dashes of white. The furnishing houses are making gray cassimere suits for fall. Smoked pearl buttons are used with these. Heavy gray cassimeres cost $1 50 a yard; qualities weighty enough for the present season are sold for $1.

Shirts worn by boys of the ages under consideration have two or three pleats each side of the box-pleated centre. Straight turned-over collars and square cuffs complete them. Neck-ties are of narrow gros grain ribbon, or of grenadine—a scarf with pointed ends—and are tied in a bow or sailor's knot. Made-up ties and scarfs do not look well on boys.

The youth's overcoat in preparation for fall is called the King William. It is a sort of sleeveless sack, with a cape at the back only, but falling over the arm and hanging like a loose sleeve. It is stylish, and will be comfortable also, as it is doubled on the shoulders, where boys need most protection, as their vests have merely thin cambric backs.

HINTS TO LADIES.

Buyers for the wholesale houses, having returned from Europe, speak with authority of next season's styles. Neutral tints, quiet and distinguished-looking, and the dark cloth colors that are scarcely removed from black, will prevail. Black will be more worn than ever, as half Paris and Berlin are in mourning. Three shades of a single color will appear in many costumes. The preference for soft, flexible fabrics has incited manufacturers to bring out new goods that will drape gracefully, and prominent among these is faille cashmere, a combination of silk and very fine wool, made as soft as twilled cashmere, but richly repped, like velours. This is for over dresses, mantles, and trimming. Stripes are not so popular abroad as are bold checks and blocks, especially of black and white together. Solid colors are preferred above every thing.

BLACK SILK SUITS.

In midsummer autumn costumes are prepared. Suits of black silk to be worn in September have the Gabrielle polonaise, described last week, and a single skirt. The entire costume is silk, with pleatings of the same; no velvet, but fringe and passementerie. The polonaise skirt is shaped in various ways, sometimes much shorter behind, with long and broad apron front; again, very long behind, with the front falling open, or closed by buttons or bows. It is bordered by fringe and passementerie, and the latter outlines a vest on the front. Ornamental buttons fasten the front, and passementerie ornaments are on the sides and back of the skirt, where the fullness is massed. The dress skirt has a single wide flounce, straight, in narrowest side pleatings, hemmed top and bottom, and simply stitched on just below the top, and caught again half-way down the flounce, letting the fullness below hang loosely. A cashmere polonaise made in the fashion just described will be much worn with single skirts.

BLACK ALPACA AND CASHMERE.

The black alpaca, mohair, and cashmere suits worn in the intermediate season will show a repetition of the popular box-pleated waists, with a difference. Instead of five single box-pleats, we shall have in the back and front three very broad double box-pleats. These will look exceedingly well in alpaca; and the loose-shirred blouse or chemise Russe of which they are composed is so easily made that ladies who have a good-fitting blouse pattern will not need a dressmaker's assistance. Alpaca blouses should have a lining throughout of soft muslin, put in after the pleats have been stitched and the waist fitted. The shoulder seams must be very short, the neck high, and the sleeves coat-shape or half-flowing. The simple over-skirt is long, and caught up by tapes falling from the belt, with a button-hole in the end to fasten them to a button half-way down the skirt. This makes a graceful bouffant drapery. The under-skirt has a wide flounce, arranged in broad double box-pleats, with a button just below the top of each pleat and another half-way down the pleat. The flounce is loose below.

Mohair and cashmere waists and over-skirts, made like those just described, will be worn with silk skirts. If the garment is to be very rich, a velvet pleat, or one of heavy repped silk, will appear on each side of the box-pleats, instead of making double box-pleats of cashmere. A passementerie vine passing up the centre of the box-pleats is also very handsome. The over-skirt should then be trimmed with fringe and passementerie.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. BROOKS BROTHERS; A. T. STEWART & CO.; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

PERSONAL.

THE Hon. CLARKSON N. POTTER, member of Congress from the Tenth District (Westchester, Rockland, and Putnam counties), having at his bestowal a cadetship at West Point, caused it to be made known that he would give the appointment to the boy who in open competitive examination should prove himself best entitled to it. Some twenty lads accordingly assembled at White Plains last week, from different parts of the district, to compete for the honor. After an exhaustive examination, the young gentleman who proved himself most competent was Mr. WILLIAM H. DYKEMAN, a son of District-Attorney DYKEMAN, and to him the appointment was consequently given.

—The new president elect of Union College, the Rev. Dr. POTTER, performed a very courageous and gallant act a few days since at Fire Island. A young lady, while bathing in the surf, was so imprudent as to venture too far into, and was caught by a wave and carried out far beyond her depth. She was in imminent danger of being drowned, when the doctor swam out, rescued her and brought her safely to shore. A moment more and she must have perished.

—In "The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson" we find the following allusion to the Prince of Wales, who, by chance, made the fourth person at a dinner given to JEFFERSON. "The Prince ate half a leg of mutton; did not taste of small dishes, because small; drank Champagne and Burgundy as small beer during dinner, and Bordeaux after dinner, as the rest of the company. Upon the whole, he ate as much as the other three, and drank about two bottles of wine without seeming to feel it. . . . He never associated with a man of sense. He has not a single idea of justice, morality, religion, or of the rights of men, or any anxiety for the opinion of the world. He carries that indifference for fame so far that he probably would not be hurt if he were to lose his throne, provided he could be assured of having always meat, horses, and women."

—Mrs. JULIA A. HOLMES has recently established at Washington a "women's printing-office," in which she proposes to instruct as many young ladies as possible in "the art preservative of arts." In connection with the composing-room is a stereotyping department, where the young ladies will be taught how to do it, it being a suitable and profitable employment for "heaven's last, best gift," etc., etc.

—When Colonel FORNEY'S "Reminiscences of Public Men" shall have reached their hundredth number they will appear in book form; and they will be the best "reminiscences" of the kind yet published by an American.

—The present wife of Mr. M. M. (Brick) POMEROY is said to be a granddaughter of JEAN PAUL RICHTER.

—Rev. SAMUEL J. MAY was the only surviving brother of Mrs. ALCOTT, the mother—or grandmother, just as you like it—of "Little Women."

—Princess DORA D'ISTRIA has been honored by the Greek Parliament with the title of Megia Politissa, or Great Citizen of Greece. The title has heretofore been conferred upon Lord BYRON, ALEXANDER MAVROCORDATO, defender of Mesolonghi, and Admiral CONSTANTINE CANARIS, the latter being the only one of the three who still lives. The Princess has gained this distinction by her literary services, her beauty, and her accomplishments.

—Mr. EMANUEL B. HART, president of Mount Sinai Hospital, and his colleagues, were honorably conspicuous in their efforts in behalf of the wounded during the recent riots. Some thirty wounded were taken there on the afternoon of that terrible Wednesday, and treated with the greatest skill and kindness. Although a Hebrew hospital, it is open to persons of every race and creed. Under the liberal and philanthropic management of Mr. HART, Mount Sinai Hospital is commending itself to the highest place in the public esteem.

—The Baroness BURDETT COUTTS did one of her customary neat things recently by presenting to the clerks in the banking-house in which she is a partner the sum of $16,000.

—A dinner quite unique in character was recently given at the Crystal Palace, London, to the actors of the Comédie Française. The chair was occupied by Lord DUFFERIN, supported by Lords GRANVILLE, HOUGHTON, POWERSCOURT, Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK, and others of the nobility, and by BOUCICAULT, TOM TAYLOR, AINSWORTH, WESTLAND MARSTON, and others celebrated in literature and art. Lord GRANVILLE made a speech en vrai Parisien, one point of which was that a cabinet council had actually been held one hour earlier than usual to enable his lordship to be present at the banquet. From such a man and such a minister the compliment was neat and notable.

—Rev. Dr. BENT, of Baltimore, has had a singular experience in Boston. He went to church, where he heard music that made him wonder how he got in without a ticket.

—JENNY LIND has added manuscript to music by becoming an authoress. She is said to be the author of a novel recently published at Stockholm, entitled "An Artist's Pilgrimage on Earth." The book contains so much information about her early career that it must have emanated either from herself or from one intimately acquainted with her.

—JOAQUIN MILLER, whose poem of "Kit Carson's Ride" was published and illustrated in Harper's Weekly of August 5, is now on a visit to his brother in Easton, Pennsylvania, where he is revising the proofs of a volume of poems which will soon be given to the public. At a dinner given to him in London by ROBERT BROWNING he electrified and delighted the company by reciting the "Heathen Chinee." What a comfort it is to have these new poets coming on among us!

—Mr. JOHN KELLUM, one of the eminent and most successful architects of New York, died a few days since at Hempstead, where he was engaged in managing the extensive enterprise of Mr. A. T. STEWART. He was the architect of Mr. STEWART'S store on Broadway and Tenth Street, the Women's Hotel in Fourth Avenue, the Herald building, H. B. CLAFLIN'S store, and many other large edifices. He had accumulated property valued at over a million of dollars by his profession, and was emphatically the architect of his own fortune.

—Among the personal items of interest in the English papers is one to the effect that the Duke of Sutherland, Mr. JOHN PENDER, and Mr. FOWLER, the eminent engineer, are about to purchase the Suez Canal for £6,000,000. The undertaking cost the French company £22,000,000.

—Miss CUSHMAN, should she continue to improve in health, will probably re-appear on the stage early in the autumn at BOOTH'S Theatre. She will appear in but one character—Queen Katherine, in "Henry VIII."—not intending to revive any of the other characters of her répertoire.

—The Rev. Dr. THOMAS, of Dayton, Ohio, must rejoice in that little boy of his who had been visiting at the house of a female relation, where he took some primary lessons in the history of the American Revolution, and how the Americans whipped the Britishers. The lad returned home full of his new subject, and at the tea-table said to his father, "Pa, be you a British?" "Yes, my son; I was born in England." "Well, we whipped you!" retorted the youngster.

—Mr. HALLAM TENNYSON, a son of the poet, has recently won one of the poetry prizes at Marlborough College.

—M. GUIZOT, who has been quite ill of late, has recovered his health, and thinks he may live to celebrate his one hundredth birthday. He was born in 1787. He walks daily from eight to ten miles, is a hearty eater, uses no glasses, and works nine hours. His home recreation consists in playing with his grandchildren and listening to the reading of DUMAS'S novels, of which he is very fond.

—Senator WILSON, of Massachusetts, who is enjoying a much-needed vacation abroad, has been received with much consideration in England and Germany. He writes home to a friend that while in England he was struck with the absence of inebriated persons in the public thoroughfares.

—The "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain" with the lover of money have a curious illustration in the recent death of Dr. ANTHONY MINTNER, in Shelbina, Missouri. He left a will bequeathing $18,000 to his wife and children, and providing for the distribution of the rest of his estate. As his assets were not known to exceed about $14,000, some curiosity was felt to know how the provisions of the will were to be carried out. The executor, on examining Dr. MINTNER'S papers, found a memorandum telling where in the garden a number of pots would be found, containing money. On digging at the places indicated $9,000 in gold coin was found. It had been buried there during the rebellion.

—In manner following does the poet SAXE gibbet to the stare of a disgusted world a certain malefactor who had misrepresented him on the lady question. Mr. S. is now, as has been his wont or will for many seasons back, enjoying his opium cum digitalis at Saratoga. He saith:

"Apropos of the ladies, you must permit me to make a 'personal explanation' over my initials in flat contradiction of an interviewing correspondent of the New York World, writing from Saratoga, who says that the present writer declared in conversation that 'women have no merit whatever,' etc., etc., which derogatory remarks were never uttered by me, nor, indeed, by any man whose pride in his mother, his wife, and his daughters is as sincere and hearty as that of "J. G. S."

—Should Mr. DISRAELI fail in his expectation of being restored to the premiership next winter, it is more than probable that he will make a visit to this country.

POINT LACE AND WHITE NEEDLE-WORK BORDER FOR WINDOW HANGINGS, ETC.

Point Lace and White Needle-work Border for Window Hangings, etc.

WORK the single figures first in white needle-work on cambric or fine linen, then transfer the design of the border to linen, and baste on the point lace braid and the needle-work figures, following the contours of the design. The intersecting points of the braid are fastened together with a few stitches. Work the button-hole stitch bars with picots, and the wheels as shown by the illustration, and button-hole stitch the scallops at the outer edge of the border. Button-hole stitch the border to the material to be ornamented. This border is seen on the window curtains illustrated in the last number of the Bazar.

broidery on the flannel strips use silk, split worsted, or Saxony wool. In the original the quilted strips are of pink satin, interlined with thin cotton batting, and quilted with fine white silk. The flannel strips are embroidered with green and brown shaded saddler's silk and pink filling silk. With the latter the large and small flowers are worked in chain stitch and point Russe. The branches are worked in herring-bone stitch. The white flannel border which surrounds the quilt is embroidered in a similar manner; along the outer edge the border is pinked. In the original the satin strips are each four inches wide, and the flannel strips three inches and a quarter wide. The sides of the latter are fastened to the satin strips with a seam of cross stitch and point Russe worked with white silk (see illustration). Having lined the quilt with white flannel, fasten the border to the outer edge with a cross stitch seam and point Russe worked with white silk, and lay a pleat of the requisite size in each corner of the quilt. The surplus material of the pleat is cut away on the under side. These quilts can be made long or square. Embroidered strips of flannel and quilted strips of silk or merino joined in this manner may also be used as covers for cushions, chairs, etc.

Wall Pocket with Lambrequin.

THIS wall pocket is made of pasteboard, and is covered with dark brown cashmere on the outside and light brown cashmere on the inside. The trimming consists of lambrequin tabs of light brown cashmere, lined with brown muslin, and bound and trimmed with light brown silk braid. Light brown worsted cord and tassels and ruches of light brown silk ribbon complete the trimming. To make the pocket, cut for the back a piece of pasteboard sixteen inches and three-quarters long and nine inches and a quarter wide, which must be rounded off from the upper corners to the middle of the under edge. Cut the front of the pocket to correspond with the back, but an inch and three-quarters longer at the upper edge. At the rounded outer edge of the front cut slits three-quarters of an inch long at regular intervals, let the edges of the slits slightly overlap each other, and sew them on each other so that the rounded outer edges of the back and front correspond in length. Cover the front on the outside with the dark cashmere, and on the inside with the light cashmere; cover the back with the light cashmere on both sides. Overhand the rounded outer edges of the back and front together, and cover the seam with a dark brown worsted cord. Fasten to the front the lambrequin tabs, which are rounded at the under edge. The tabs are all four inches wide; the middle tab is nine inches long, and the others are graduated in length, as shown by the illustration. Bind the double material of each tab at the sides and rounded ends with dark brown silk braid three-quarters of an inch wide, and trim the tabs with dark brown silk braid a quarter of an inch wide as shown by the illustration. Overhand the straight sides together on the under side, and fasten the lambrequin thus formed to the upper edge of the front, laying the edge of the lambrequin over on the inside of the front three-quarters of an inch. Between the tabs set on the cord and tassels. Trim the inside of the top of the pocket with a ruche made of brown silk ribbon an inch and a quarter wide, letting the ruche project beyond the edge of the pocket half its width. Two brass rings, covered with brown silk, are fastened to the back of the pocket whereby to hang it up.

CROCHET BORDER FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Medallions for Card-Cases, Cigar-Cases, etc., Figs. 1 and 2. Colored Embroidery

THESE medallions, which are also suitable for baskets, porte-monnaies, etc., are worked on cloth, silk, satin, velvet, or gros grain. They are worked in mosaic or dovetailed satin stitch, knotted and half-polka stitch, or point Russe with colored saddler's silk.

Crochet Border for Lingerie, etc.

THIS border is crocheted lengthwise with tatting cotton, No. 80. On a foundation of the requisite length work the 1st round.—Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 1 ch. (chain stitch), with the latter pass over 1 foundation stitch; after the sixth dc., however, not 1, but 2 ch. (with these pass over 2 st.), then, going forward, after each eleventh following dc. always 2 ch. also. 2d round.—4 ch., 1 dc. on the next dc., 1 dc. on the second following dc. of the preceding round; these 2 dc. are not worked off separately, but together; * 2 ch., 1 dc. on the same dc. on which the previous dc. has been worked, pass over 3 dc. of the preceding round, five leaflets on the next scallop of 2 ch., each of these leaflets consists of 3 tc. (treble crochet), which are not worked off separately, but all together; after each of the first four leaflets 3 ch., after the fifth leaflet 1 dc. on the fourth following dc. of the preceding round, 2 ch., 1 dc. on the same dc. on which the previous dc. has been worked, and 1 dc. on the second following dc. of the preceding round; these 2 dc. are not worked off separately, but together; 7 ch., 1 dc. on the same dc. on which the previous dc. has been worked, and 1 dc. on the second following dc.; these 2 dc. are worked off together. Repeat from *. 3d round.—1 sl. (slip stitch) on the first of the 4 ch. at the beginning of the preceding round, 3 ch., * 1 stc. on the first of the next three leaflets, 1 stc. on the middle of the next 3 ch.; these 2 stc. are not worked off separately, but together; 7 ch., 1 stc. on the same ch. on which the previous stc. has been worked, and 1 stc. on the following leaflet; these 2 stc. are worked off together; 7 ch. After having crocheted in this manner eight times 2 stc. worked off together, and after each of the first seven of these stc. figures always 7 ch., work 3 ch., 1 sl. on the middle of the next 7 ch. of the preceding round, 3 ch., and repeat from *. Crochet three rounds just like those described also on the other side of the foundation stitches.

WORK-BAG TO BE WORN ON THE BELT.

Work-Bag to be worn on the Belt.

THIS work-bag consists of a piece of card-board five inches and a quarter long and three inches and three-quarters wide, which is pointed at the bottom and rounded at the upper corners. Cover this piece on both sides smoothly with brown silk, having first lined the piece coming on the outside with stiff net and furnished it with a band of the material half an inch wide, about three-fourths of an inch from the upper edge. Sew through this band crosswise several times, so as to form compartments, which serve to hold sewing utensils, such as scissors, needle-case, thimble, etc. For the front of the work-bag cut of brown silk taken double and stiff net interlining two pieces. these pieces must correspond in shape to the back of the work-bag, but must only reach from the under pointed edge to within an inch and a quarter of the upper rounded edge of the back, while the upper edge must be straight. The second piece is of the shape just described, but the upper straight edge must be three-quarters of an inch higher than the first piece. Having run the edges of the material together, draw two lines on the under side of the larger piece, which must reach from the under point to the upper edge, and be at equal distances from each other and the side edges. Lay the piece in a fold along each of these lines, overhand the folds on the under side, and trim them on the outside with gold braid a tenth of an inch wide as shown by the illustration. Run the outer edges of the smaller piece, join the two parts, and sew into them a brown silk bag nearly three inches deep. Three-quarters of an inch from the upper edge make a shirr, through which run crosswise two brown silk cords finished with tassels. Finally, sew the front thus prepared to the back of the bag, and cover the seam with gold braid, which must also extend around the rounded upper edge of the back. Finish the bottom of the bag with a tassel made of brown silk and gold braid. The bag depends from two chains, the top and bottom of which only are given in the illustration (the middle part being cut out). They consist of oval rings and bands. Each of the latter is made of a double strip of the material with a stiff interlining two inches long and half an inch wide, which is trimmed with gold braid as shown by the illustration, and sewed together. The bands are connected by oval rings of bonnet wire an inch and three-quarters long, covered with single crochet of brown silk. Each chain consists of three bands and three oval rings. The upper rings of the chains are joined by a band two inches long, which is made like the other bands, and trimmed with loops of brown silk ribbon. Furnish the under side of this bag with a hook of brown bonnet wire, and cover the seam with a piece of card-board covered with brown silk.

Knotted, Crochet, and Tatted Curtain Bands, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 517.

BOTH of these curtain bands are partly made in knot-work and partly in crochet-work; the curtain band Fig. 2 is also worked partly in tatting. The knot-work and tatting are worked with fine white woven cord, and the crochet-work with coarse white knitting cotton on a foundation thread of cord. The illustrations only show one-half of each curtain band with rosette.

Fig. 1.—KNOTTED AND CROCHET CURTAIN BAND. To make this curtain band work first the foundation for the flowers as follows: Wind one end of a piece of fine white woven cotton cord twice around a bar two inches and four-fifths in circumference, and on the ring thus formed crochet 16 to 18 times alternately 1 sc. (single crochet), 1 ch. (chain stitch). On the first round thus formed crochet 4 similar rounds, always going forward; the sc., however, must now be worked always on the ch., and at the same time on the cord, which is passed on for a foundation. Besides this, widen in such a manner that a flat round part is formed which neither gathers nor puckers. At the end of the fifth round crochet several sl. (slip stitches) without the cord foundation. To the outer edge at one side of this foundation knot 6 pieces of twisted white cord, each 48 inches long, in such a manner that both ends of each cord project equally from the relative stitch; it is to be observed also that two of the cords must come close together; at three-fifths of an inch distance from the latter cords knot one piece of cord to the right, and one piece of cord to the left of them; then again, after a distance of three-fifths of an inch each, knot one more piece of cord to each side. With these 12 ends of cord the knot-work is made. The latter consists of flat knots, which are worked like the knot shown by Fig. 3, page 132 of Harper's Bazar, Vol. IV., No. 9; work such a knot first with the 4 ends of cord to the right, and then work a similar knot with the 4 ends of cord to the left. After forming both knots divide each 4 ends of cord into twos, crôss both free middle cords, and work a knot with the two inner ends of cord of the left knot and the two nearest of the middle cords, then also work a knot with the two remaining middle cords and with the two inner cords of the knot to the right. Now again divide each 4 cords, and with each 2 cords of one part and the nearest 2 cords of the other part work one knot each; by doing this the knots are alternated. Continue in this manner until the knotted strip counts 8 knots at both sides, then divide the 12 projecting ends of cord into sixes, lay each 6 ends flat next each other, and with the twice 6 ends work a flat knot like the other knots. The cord windings of this knot must be joined with a few stitches so that each 6 cords lie flat beside each other. Now form a ring 4 inches in circumference of the ends of cord, sew them together in this position, and then cover them closely with button-hole stitches of woven cord. Now tie 6 pieces of cord, 48 inches long each, to the opposite side of the crochet foundation also, and with these work a knotted piece in the manner just described; this must also end in a ring. For the calyx of the flower crochet on the cord ring on which the 1st round of the foundation has been worked, always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 1 ch. (the dc. must always come between the st. of the 1st round). Now lay on the foundation cord, and on this and the st. of the preceding round work the second round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the next ch., 1 ch. Third round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the next ch., 2 ch., and, finally, the fourth round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the next ch., then 1 picot of 5 ch., and 1 sc. on the first of the 5 ch.; this completes the calyx of the flower. For each petal make a foundation of 15 st. with knitting cotton, and on this crochet, going back and passing over the 4 last st., 5 times alternately 1 dc. on the next st., 1 ch., with the latter pass over 1 foundation st., then one more dc. on the next st. This open-work strip forms the middle of the petal. Now work 1 ch., turn the work, lay on the foundation cord, and on the strip crochet always alternately 1 sc., 1 ch., the sc. always on the ch. of the preceding round and on the cord foundation. At the point of the strip (the middle of the round) widen in such a manner that the work neither gathers nor puckers. At the end of the round work 1 ch., turn the work, and, going back, crochet 1 round like the preceding round, then 1 more round in a similar manner. When the requisite number of petals are worked sew them on the previously worked foundation as shown by the illustration, so that the edge of the calyx covers the seam made by sewing on the upper circle of leaves. Now fasten the stamens, which are 4 inches long, into the calyx; these stamens consist of woven cotton loops and several three-strand cotton braids; the latter are wound at the ends as shown by the illustration, and form a short thread strand there.

Fig. 2.—KNOTTED, CROCHET, AND TATTED CURTAIN BAND. To make this curtain band first crochet a round foundation, like the foundation of curtain band Fig. 1. Then tie 8 pieces of fine woven cotton cord, each 48 inches long, to one side of the crochet foundation; they must be at a distance of two-fifths of an inch each apart, and tied so that both ends of each cord project equally. With each 4 ends of cord next each other (2 of these serve for knotting, and the other 2 form the foundation) work, as shown by the illustration, alternate double-knot bars like those of the bat shown by Fig. 10, on page 476 of Harper's Bazar, No. 30, Vol. IV. (see also design for ironing mat, Fig. 2, page 484, Harper's Bazar, No. 31, Vol. IV., which gives directions for working these double knots). When the knotted piece is long enough, work with the 4 outer ends of cord to the right, then also with the 4 outer ends of cord to the left, each one bar of double knots somewhat longer (see illustration), and with the remaining ends of cord work the middle double-knot bar as shown by the illustration; the latter plainly shows that two double cords are here used in knotting, the remaining four cords form the foundation. Finally, lay all the projecting ends of cord together in the shape of a ring, and on this ring work close button-hole stitches of similar cord. A similar knotted strip is also worked on the other side of the crochet foundation. Now work the rosette at the middle of the curtain band in tatting with woven cord. For the rosette work 5 circles of tatted rings graduated in size, the 3 under circles count 8 rings each, the fourth circle counts 6 rings, and the fifth (the upper) circle counts 3 rings only. Each ring of the under (the largest) circle consists of 20 double stitches, the rings of the following circle count 16 double stitches each, the rings of the third circle each 12, of the fourth circle each 10, and of the fifth circle each 8 double stitches; it is also to be observed that the rings of each circle are fastened to each other by means of a picot. Sew the rings on the crochet foundation as shown by the illustration, and tie white cotton tassels to the rosette.

Repeat from *; at the end of the round work only 1 k. instead of 3. 3d round.—2 p., * t. t. o., p. 3 together, t. t. o., 5 p. Repeat from ; at the end of the round work 4 p. instead of 5. 4th round.— 3 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., k. 2 together. Repeat from *; at the end of the round, after the last 2 st. knit together, work 1 more k. 5th round.—2 p., * t. t. o., 3 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 1 p., p. 2 together. Repeat from ; at the end of the round, instead of the last 2 p. together, work 1 p. only. 6th round.— Sl., k. 2 together, draw the slipped st. over, t. t. o., 5 k., t. t. o. Repeat from ; at the end of the round, after the last t. t. o., k. 2 together. 7th round.— 1 p., t. t. o., p. 2 together, 3 p., p. 2 together, t. t. o. Repeat from *; at the end of the round, after the last t. t. o., work 1 p. 8th round.—2 k., * t. t. o., sl., 1 k., the slipped st. drawn over, 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 3 k. Repeat from *; at the end of the round work 2 k. only instead of 3. Continue the design with the assistance of this description and the illustration.

Corners of Tapestry Borders for Lambrequins, Cushions, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 517.

THESE borders are worked with zephyr worsted and filling silk in cross stitch on canvas. The description of symbols indicates the colors to be used. Both designs are suitable for ornamenting the lambrequin for the window curtains shown in the last number of the Bazar.

A RAILWAY ADVENTURE.

A LAWYER'S office in summer-time is by no means an agreeable place of sojourn. There is a prevailing sense of dryness and a lack of verdure. The only greenness perceptible is in the conduct of the clients and in the green "ferret" with which the sheets of parchment are bound together. Pastoral influences, too, are altogether wanting. There are no "bleating flocks," nor any thing to suggest their existence, unless it be the skins which have been stripped from their backs and converted into the aforesaid parchment, in which sheep's clothing the ravening wolves of the profession are wont to disguise their meaning, if not themselves; the only fountains are ink fountains; and there are no trees except those genealogical growths which flourish under the culture of Garter and Clarencieux.

The office of Messrs. Catchem & Eatem, of Spiders Inn, formed no exception to the general truth of this description. I had been their bond-slave or managing clerk for some time, and was seated in my prison one fine afternoon during the month of June, 186–, bewailing my hard lot in the intervals of labor in a somewhat depressed frame of mind. I rather suspect that I must have fallen into a doze. I had been engaged for some time in making out a bill of costs against some unfortunate debtor whom we had been grinding in our legal mill, and I remember that I had been speculating upon the remarkable analogy existing between the bestial and human creations, and reflecting how precisely the tigers, wolves, snakes, and wasps in the former are repeated in the lawyers, bill-discounters, doctors, and old maids of the latter dispensation. The vastness of the subject was, I suppose, too much for me, and I had taken refuge from the problem in sleep, when I was suddenly aroused by the deep bass voice of my venerable superior, Mr. Catchem.

"Mr. Hopkins," said the voice, "I find that I shall be unable to go down to Dedborough to complete that purchase of Mr. Ponsonby's, and therefore you will have to go. The appointment for completion is at ten o'clock on Thursday morning, so that you must leave town by the 5.15 train to-morrow afternoon, and sleep at Dedborough, ready for the next morning. The purchase-money is paid into the London branch of Messrs. Musgrave's bank at Dedborough; you will therefore only have to take a check with you for the amount, and get it cashed in the morning, ready for the settlement. Come into my room to-morrow about four, and I will give you instructions. I am going across the square to Squeezem & Scrunchem's. Back in half an hour."

Exit Mr. Catchem, and up jumps Mr. Hopkins and executes a war-dance of a jubilant and triumphant description, indicative of his delight at the prospect before him. The sparrow outside my window flew away in great disorder, evidently astonished at the indecorum of my behavior, and only accustomed to the gravity of demeanor becoming an inn of court. Invigorated by this little interlude, I returned to my bill of costs, thinking that, after all, old Catchem was perhaps not quite so black as I had painted him. The point of view is every thing, and seen through the medium of my country excursion, even he appeared to lose several shades of darkness.

Business over for the day, I walked home to my lodgings in Lavender Crescent, Camberwell, still in the same state of exhilaration. "Jane," said I, bursting into the passage, "I am going into the country for a few days; will you come with me?"

"Lor, Mr. Hopkins, Sir," said Jane, "how can I? I couldn't leave missus and the 'ouse, even if you was kind enough to take me. Is any thing the matter, Sir? Oh, don't, Sir, please! You promised me you wouldn't." And Jane leaves my room with her cheeks considerably rouged, and a conviction, I think, that I have been taking something besides exercise.

After tea I packed a carpet-bag ready for my country excursion; and then, in order to get over the intervening time, I lighted the pipe of peace, and sat myself down in my easy-chair to read Lady Sappho Godiva's delightful "Flesh-worms," and to admire the gorgeous upholstery which is therein so minutely described, and, above all, the succulent morbidezza of the female portraits. I certainly found her "carnations," as painters call them, deliciously warm and juicy, and the scene-painting all that could be desired.

In the morning I arrayed myself with a degree of care befitting the importance of the occasion, and departed joyfully for town, having first taken an affectionate leave of Jane, whose faint "Don't!" sounded, I thought, much more like "Do!" The day dragged through at last, and punctually at four P.M. I knocked at Mr. Catchem's green-baize door, and was desired to enter.

"This is the conveyance, Mr. Hopkins," said that gentleman, "which you will see properly executed before you pay the purchase-money; and take care that all the title-deeds shown in the abstract are handed over to you at the same time. The money, as I told you, is at Messrs. Musgrave's bank in Dedborough, and here is a check for the amount, £4060. I can not cross the check, because you will have to pay in cash; so mind, if you please, that you are very careful of the check. The appointment for completion is at Mr. Upton's office, in Dedborough, on Thursday. This £10 note is for your own expenses, for which you will account to me on your return. Be very careful, if you please, and lose no time in getting off. Good-day."

I returned my venerable superior's adieu with great alacrity, and, shaking the dust of the office off my feet and my clothes, I hailed a passing hansom, and was soon gleefully bowling off to the Great Northern Railway. In my private capacity I need hardly say that I did not ride much in cabs; but on occasions like the present I felt that I represented the firm of C. & E., and was determined that their dignity and official status should suffer no abatement at my hands.

"Two bob, captain, please," said the jarvey, when I got out. I observe, by-the-way, that cabmen generally salute gentlemen of doubtful exterior as "captain," which I suppose is intended as a delicate compliment. I paid him at once "like a gentleman," as he was good enough to assure me; for, though I knew it was double his fare, I never haggle about the price when I am spending my employers' money. It is a kind of spoiling the Egyptians, in which, as in all revenge, there is, to use Lord Bacon's phrase, a sort of wild justice.

Acting upon the same principle, I took a first-class ticket to Dedborough, and ensconced myself in the most comfortable carriage I could find. I first paid a visit to the book-stall, to provide myself with some literature for possible contingencies. I made choice of a magazine containing a story called "Gustavus Snooks's Will," which promised some interest to a lawyer, as I have generally observed that such histories contain some very remarkable legal incidents, confirmatory of the old classical axiom that it is wiser in the cobbler to stick to his last. King Solomon's dictum that there is nothing new under the sun is conclusively disproved by the history in question; for in it I find the executors of a will signing the will as well as the testator, which I affirm to be an entire novelty.

I was lost in admiration at the boldness of this innovation, when the door of the carriage was opened, and a lady entered in deep mourning, and seated herself in an opposite division; soon afterward we got under way, and were joyfully rattling out of the smoke and noise of the great Babylon into the pure air of the country. My companion, though still apparently a mere girl, was dressed in widow's weeds, or rather in that most becoming modification of them which is now prevalent, and in which one single beading of white crape edging the black bonnet does duty for the hideous old widow's cap. So much as I could see of her, she was very pretty. Her complexion was perfectly pale, and she had large, deep gray eyes, which darkened in color at the outer edge of the iris, where it merged into the deep black fringe of the eyelash. Her mouth was hidden by the broad band of double crape which edged her veil; but her lovely brown hair was displayed by her mite of a bonnet, and was coiled in massive lustrous wreaths behind her beautiful head. She made no affectation of deep grief; but her eyes had that curious benumbed appearance which you sometimes see in an animal which is stricken with some great pain.

Sorrow always appears to me so sacred a thing that I felt no inclination to make any effort toward the usual acquaintance of fellow-travelers, and accordingly devoted myself to my book. But some trifling courtesy broke the ice between us, and it seemed that my companion was anxious to obtain some information about her journey. Was I going to Dedborough? and what time would the train get there? Could I tell her of any hotel at which she could stay for a short time? Would it be very expensive? She apologized for asking these questions by saying that she had lived for many years in France, and was entirely ignorant of England and its ways. Her beautiful eyes filled with tears as she spoke of France, and I could not help feeling for one so young who had suffered so much.

I gave her all the information I could upon the subject, and in return she told me some particulars of her story. She had lately come from Tours, where she had lost her husband after a year's marriage; and, being left almost penniless, her friends had persuaded her to seek for a situation as governess in England, instead of, as she would have preferred, in France. This place she had at length found, as she hoped, in the family of a gentleman living near Dedborough; she was to sleep at that town for one night, and to be fetched to the Cedars, her new home, in the morning. She feared an English hotel would be very costly after the French ones to which she was accustomed. Would there be a salon in which ladies could sit, or must she take her meal in her bedroom? All this she asked in the most natural, innocent, childish manner imaginable; and I could not help thinking what a very child she was, and how totally unfit to travel in England alone, with her confiding, winning way, and pretty half-foreign accent. I told her in reply that I intended to have a sitting-room for my own use (which, by-the-way, was a very sudden intention on my part), and that if she would brighten it with her presence during her evening meal, it would give me very sincere pleasure. She didn't know. Might she do so? Would it be quite en règle for a lady to do so? If she really might— I assured her that she need not be uneasy on that score; and I felt really glad that it was in my power to act in some sort as her protector. Duty is delightful when it assumes the form of taking a lovely girl-widow under one's protecting wing.

As I stepped on to the platform at Dedborough an inspector on duty inquired if my name were Hopkins. Wondering what prompted the question, I replied that it was; and having farther made me give the address of my firm in London, he handed me a telegram which had passed my train upon the wires, and which told me that the purchase would not be completed till the Friday morning, as the deeds were not ready for delivery to the purchaser. "By all means," said I to myself, "so much the better. I shall be delighted to have another day in the country. I will go over and see this old place which Mr. Ponsonby has bought." I have a special passion for old houses in the country. A good part of my boyhood was passed at one such, in "pleasant Hertfordshire," and in memory of it I love them all. Meanwhile I placed my companion and her traveling-bag in a cab, and drove with her to the Blue Crocodile, which was the house in Dedborough that I had been advised to stay at.

I found the hotel one of the pleasant, old-fashioned, comfortable houses—now, alas, becoming scarcer every year—in which the buxom landlady receives one as an old friend, and caters for one's comfort with kind solicitude. A great contrast to the "lady-manager" of the modern monster hotel, who sits in an inaccessible office, and is far too grand to take any interest in the welfare of the guests, whom she knows only as "No. 537," or whatever the numeral in which their identity is lost may chance to be. My companion would have nothing but tea, and, seated at the tea-table, she looked more beautiful and child-like than ever.

It was a lovely summer evening, soft and balmy, and, sitting at an open window before a garden full of roses and mignonette, the air that filled the room was laden with their fragrance. The sun went down in glorious state—a crimson ball into a purple sea of mist. A river ran below the bottom of the garden, reflecting as in a glass the gorgeous colors of the western sky, while the plash of an occasional boat broke from time to time the stillness of the night. There was a piano in our room, and as I sat musing in the gloaming, my companion seated herself before it, and in absent mood struck a few chords. Gradually she seemed moved to more effort, and in a few minutes the plaintive strains of Mozart's "Pro peccatis" rose upon the air. The melancholy solemnity of the prayer seemed to harmonize with her state of sorrow, and she sang the words with heart-felt pathos. Like Rubini, she appeared to have "tears in her voice," which breathed the very spirit of passionate sorrow. I sat entranced in a dream of bliss. Each element of beauty seemed to heighten and enhance the rest—music never sounds so sweetly as at such a time—and as the voice of the singer—herself almost unseen—trembled forth into a flood of melody, I wished that I could sit and listen to it forever. What a life, I thought, encompassed by such sights and sounds and fragrance, compared to the wretched drudgery of my own!

All too soon it came to an end. My fellow-traveler soon closed the piano, and with a simple "good-night," left me to build what castles I might in her absence. She had left her handkerchief on the ground. I picked it up and pressed it to my lips, and as I did so I saw a beautifully embroidered "Marie" in one corner of it, which I thought a charming name. I kept it as long as I dared, and then rang for the chamber-maid to take it up to her. I sat for some time longer; but the glory was departed, and I was soon glad to follow her example, and to take what remembrance I could of my pleasure into dream-land with me.

In the morning I breakfasted alone, Madame De Fontanges (for that, I found, was her name) sending me her compliments, and saying that she preferred to take her coffee in her own room. I determined to make the most of my day; but first I placed my pocket-book, containing the important check, in my traveling-bag; and having carefully locked it, I locked the bag itself into one of the drawers of the wardrobe in my bedroom, and placed the key in my pocket. I had been debating with myself as to the safest manner of keeping this check, which was rather a cloud upon my happiness, and I deemed this the safest manner of taking care of it. Having got this matter off my mind, I applied myself vigorously to the breakfast before me, reveling in the golden butter and creamy milk of the country, after the manufactured articles of Lavender Crescent, where the butter was made of fat, and the milk chiefly supplied by the cow with the iron tail. Nor did I forget the more substantial items of eggs and bacon, deeming it advisable, with Major Dalgetty, to provender the garrison against possible sieges.

It was a charming morning, and as I started off to walk to "Foxholes," the place which our client had purchased, I couldn't help devoutly wishing that my lines had fallen in such pleasant places as the country around Dedborough. No one enjoys the country like a cockney, who is imprisoned in the smoke and stir of London. Every flower and blade of grass appeals to him with a force and vividness which the rustic never feels; and if he chance to have passed the happy hours of childhood amidst such scenes, they touch a chord in his heart which vibrates with delight. I found Foxholes was six or seven miles from Dedborough; so that I had abundant time to walk leisurely onward, resting from time to time to drink more deeply of the pure joys around me, and wandering from the pathway into any wood which took my fancy by the road-side.

By mid-day I reached the entrance to the house. It was a white gate, under tall, overarching elms, making a deep shade after the glare of the sun. Farther on the entrance road ran under some high pine-trees, whose deep black foliage made a still darker shade, broken and enlivened by the crimson gleams of their boles. Beside this wood spread a large sheet of water, all overgrown with superb water-lilies, whose leaves lay almost blistering in the hot sun, forming a dark green flooring, from which the bloom cups of ivory and gold sprang up in rich luxuriance; while water-spiders skated about on the surface from the beds of jointed reeds which fringed the sides of the lakelet, and great dragon-flies, of bronze and blue and crimson, hung suspended over it on gauzy wings, motionless for a moment, and then darting off with lightning speed. I was speculating upon the capabilities of the place for fishing, when a vain young frog, boastful of his strength, and desiring to exhibit it, sprang from the bank some three feet into the water, and again gathering up his legs, was plunging with glee through the bright green waters, when lo! the reeds by the bank were suddenly cleft asunder, a dark body shot out from the side, there was a flash of a great silver green side under the surface, and a "swirl" upon the top—and poor froggy had performed his last acrobatic feat, and his place would know him no more.

The grass around the water was deep in soft moss, into which my feet sank at every step. Thousands of grasshoppers—dark brown, drab, and pale sea green—were singing their joyful song, leaping high into the air, and falling heels over head in every direction. In the pine-trees was a wood-pigeon uttering "its long love-ditty," most melancholy but most beautiful of country sounds; proclaiming its undying passion for its wife, sitting close by upon her eggs, and stopping from time to time with a frightened sudden "hoo," when I walked upon the odorous pine needles beneath its nest.

The house was an old red brick building, not of the bright red which tells of Dutch William and Sir John Vanbrugh, but of an earlier date, stained with age and lichens, and overgrown with vines and jasmine. The old entrance door looked strong enough to resist a siege, studded all over with thick square iron bosses. I knocked, and was admitted into the great stone-flagged hall, a huge square room with a quadrangular black oaken staircase rising from it. The doors of entrance into the various rooms down stairs were all of dark mahogany, with the handles as high up as one's shoulder, and in the fire-places were the old-fashioned "dogs" for wood fires. A delightful place, I thought. How I should like to spend my days there! I left the house with lingering regret, after staying as long as I decently could, and wandered out again toward the great fruit garden, passing on my way a charming summer pavilion, built of the same red brick, through whose open door swallows were wheeling in and out, to and from their nests built high up the walls against the ceiling, twittering with joy (as well they might), and with their indigo blue backs glistening in the bright sunshine. From the peas in the fruit garden rose a flight of blackbirds and thrushes, while the harsh scream of a brilliant jay resounded through the summer air. What a paradise I thought it! I sat myself down upon a rustic seat close to a pond full of great fat carp, and watched them gasping at the surface of the water, and sucking down any unwary flies that came within their reach.

I was glad to rest after my walk, and I know of no place of rest so delightful as a garden:

"Some flow'rets of Eden we still inherit;"

and I do verily believe, for myself, that these paradisiacal flowers flourish most freely in country gardens. Sitting as I did, breathing the sweet fresh country air, soothed by the comfortable sounds from a rookery which stood behind the house, inhaling the fragrance of the masses of bright flowers, and basking in the blessed sun, my thoughts reverted to that happy time in the history of the world when a garden contained the whole of the human race; before the flaming sword had driven them forth, and the waving of that magic brand had drawn thorns and thistles out of the teeming soil. Having thoroughly rested myself, I set out leisurely upon my return journey, stopping to lunch at a road-side inn, which I had remarked some half mile back, upon the way. I had most thoroughly enjoyed my excursion so far; but such short holidays are clouded rather painfully by a sense of their evanescence.

I got back to Dedborough late in the afternoon, indulging a vague hope that my charming fellow-traveler might not have yet left; but, alas! I was doomed to disappointment, for my friend the waiter informed me, with cheerful alacrity, that Madame De Fontanges had left in her friend's carriage directly after lunch, leaving for me a message of compliments and grateful thanks. Sic transit!

My first care was to adjourn to my bedroom, to see after the safety of the all-important check. All safe I found it, and immediately transferred the pocket-book containing it to the breast pocket of my coat, as I did not intend to leave the house again until I went to attend the appointment for completion of the purchase. My sitting-room, I fancied, looked very desolate; but there was no help for it, and after dinner I was glad to adjourn to the coffee-room to lessen the feeling of loneliness.

Next morning I started off to complete the business which had brought me down; but first I called at Messrs. Musgrave's bank to cash the check, as we could not ask the vendor to take our check. On presenting the check at the counter, I fancied the cashier looked somewhat surprised, but that I attributed to the largeness of the amount for which it was drawn. After asking me one or two questions about it, he took the check into the private room of one of the partners, and in a few moments he returned and requested me to walk into Mr. Musgrave's room, as he wished to speak to me about it. I found the partner holding the check in his hand, and looking rather grave, and I began to fear that the bank was in a bad way, and that they were unable to meet the payment. The banker desired his clerk to leave; and having carefully closed the door, he asked me some questions as to the drawer of the check, where I had received it, and so on; which, of course, I had no difficulty in answering. Still he did not seem satisfied, and continued to question me in a manner which was fast making me angry, when the door opened, and a quiet, gentlemanly looking man of middle age entered the room and wished Mr. Musgrave "good-morning."

"This is the young man," said the banker to him, and proceeded to repeat my answers to the new-comer. By this time I was getting very uneasy, and asked Mr. Musgrave somewhat impatiently what was wrong about the check.

"Well, young man," said the new-comer, quietly, "the fact is, the genuine check was presented yesterday and cashed, and this is a forgery, for which I shall have to detain you until we have communicated with the drawer."

I was utterly stunned at this statement, and declared vehemently that it was impossible; that the check had never left my possession since it was handed over to me; and that the whole story was some villainous conspiracy to ruin me, or to avoid paying the money. The banker seemed somewhat nettled at this remark, and was beginning an angry reply, when the stranger stopped him, saying the less said the better. He then said that he was the superintendent of police at Dedborough, and that I must consider myself in custody; but if I would give my word to go quietly with him, no fuss or scandal need be made about it. I felt like a person in a dream. Could it really be possible that I was arrested on a charge of forgery? My head swam at the thought, and I sank fainting on a chair behind me. Mr. Musgrave, who seemed a humane, fatherly sort of man, appeared to be greatly shocked at the whole affair, and persuaded my custodian to let me have some wine before we left, which brought back my scattered senses. He then told me that the check had been presented about two o'clock on the previous day, and had been paid in notes all but the odd sixty pounds, which was cashed in gold. The person presenting it was a youngish man, with mustache and dark hair, who had answered with perfect correctness several questions about my employers which had been put to him to test his identity.

"And now, young man," said the police officer, "the less you say the better, because, you know, it will only be used against you. I must trouble you to come with me; but first I must take you back to your hotel to search your room."

By this time I was so entirely crushed by the whole affair that I seemed to have lost even the power of speech; and had he proposed to cut off my head there and then, I think I should hardly have offered any objection. I walked mechanically by his side through the streets of Dedborough, but they did not look like the same streets which I had passed through, full of hope and confidence, but a short half hour before. I fancied that every one we met looked askance at me, and that the guilt of the crime which I had not committed was branded like Cain's upon my brow. Was it really only half an hour since I had been free? It seemed an age ago. We passed a beggar—a wretched, half-starved object clad in dirty rags, with pallid face and eyes, out of which all hope had long since died—and how devoutly I longed to change places with him, if I could but have shaken off the incubus which oppressed me! All my old life rose in review before me. Where were the troubles which I had thought so heavy? Could it be possible that I had been unhappy ever before? The office in Spiders Inn seemed to me now to have been the very gate of heaven, and Lavender Crescent a dream of bliss. And Jane—would she, too, hear of me as a forger? My mind pictured her reading the account of my committal in the Standard, which her mistress indulged in, and which generally found its way into the kitchen after Mrs. Johnson had done with it up stairs. The very paragraph swam before my eyes. "The prisoner was a young man of shabby-genteel exterior, and appeared to feel his position very acutely. In answer to the worthy magistrate, he protested his innocence of the charge against him," etc., etc., in the stereotyped phraseology which meets our eyes from day to day, and which enables one half of the world to gloat over the miseries of the other, and to thank their God that they are "not as this publican."

"No. 21, Sir; yes, Sir, certainly. This way, if you please, Mr. Bracelet," said the obsequious chamber-maid of the Crocodile to the great man who had me in his gripe, preceding us up stairs to my bedroom. My bedroom! Where would be my next bedroom? I wondered. "This is the room, if you please, Sir," as she threw open the door of No. 21.

"Thanks, my dear; that 'll do—you needn't stay," to the girl, whose eyes were dilating with wonder to see what was coming next.

"This your bag, young man? Unlock it, please. Ah! clean collar, shaving-tackle, night-gown, socks—quite so. Any thing in this pocket? I thought so; silent matches, wax-candle, skeleton keys, blank checks. Yes, yes; now we shall do. We'll take this handy little bag with us, please."

Was that my bag! Was I dreaming? I rubbed my eyes with a vague hope that I might be in an accursed nightmare; but no! my vision remained the same, and there stood Mr. Superintendent Bracelet, prepared to attend me, with my bag in his hand, and a complacent, comfortable smile upon his face. By this time my faculty of surprise was utterly exhausted; and if he had again thrust his hand into my bag and pulled forth a snake or a dodo, it would have appeared to me the most natural thing in the world.

I begged him to grant me one favor, which was to telegraph to my employers in London before making any charge before a magistrate; and this he agreed to do. Meanwhile he conducted me to the police station in Dedborough, and left me to my own meditations, which were sorrowful enough. I flung myself down on the bench of my cell, hardly caring what should come next. I must have fallen, I suppose, into a troubled sleep, for it was past three o'clock when I was aroused by some one entering the room, and I found myself face to face with Mr. Catchem. His arrival gave me courage to tell my story minutely from the moment of my leaving London; and I was greatly relieved to find that he seemed to give credit to it, and that his anxiety was much more to recover the money than to bring home the crime to me.

He undertook to be responsible for my appearance, if required; and employed Mr. Bracelet to see if he could gain any trace of my too-fascinating fellow-traveler, whom he made me describe most minutely. We could learn nothing of any such person at Dedborough station; but on using the wires, we found that a lady answering to her description, with a gentleman, had taken tickets for Swindon by the 3.5 train of the previous day, from a station on a loop-line ten miles across the country from Dedborough. We, of course, proceeded by the first train to Swindon, and there again we got scent of the supposed fugitive as having alighted there and taken the first train across to Liverpool. This was hopeful news to me, and I breathed a sigh of relief at the possibility of success. No time was lost in following up the trail; and by ten o'clock that night we saw the forests of masts of the great western port tapering skyward out of the smoke and mist.

We learned that the American steamer Albatross had gone out with the flood tide two hours before, and drove in hot haste to the office of the company; but it was past business hours, and the office was closed. On we went still—found the lodgings of the cash clerk, and hunted him from them to a café chantant in the town, where he was vigorously applauding an imitation of Mademoiselle Schneider's Bulotte in "Barbe-Bleu." Rather sulky at first at the interruption, we found means to mollify him, and—

Yes, there were a lady and gentleman, who had secured berths only that morning—didn't seem particular whereabouts in the vessel, so that they could go.

"Widow?"

No, the lady was certainly not a widow. Young, pretty, and dressed in colors—blue, he thought. Gentleman tall, dark, with mustache. The name, he thought, was Colonel and Mrs. White, but couldn't be sure until he saw his book.

"Did they pay in notes?"

No, in gold; because he remembered thinking it strange that they should pay all gold. At nine o'clock in the morning the offices would be open, but he would be there, say, by 8.30.

This payment in gold was what we feared, and I began to suspect that, after all, they would slip through our fingers. The only thing to do was to search all through the hotels of the place, in the vague hope of finding their lair and getting some farther clew; but it was already past twelve, and this must be postponed till the morning. We accordingly adjourned to the Royal Swan for the night, Mr. Bracelet kindly locking me into my room—just for form's sake, as he considerately observed. For hours I could not close my eyes; but at last I fell into a confused sort of slumber, in which I saw that gentleman in widow's weeds singing the Stabat Mater, while the venerable Catchem, in Bulotte's high Norman cap and clanking sabots, danced an outrageous cancan, kicking up before and behind, like Ole Joe, with marvelous agility.

Early in the morning Mr. Bracelet sought the assistance of the local blood-hounds, with whose aid we commenced a systematic visitation of all the hotels in the place, each one taking a certain district. We met at luncheon to report progress—but, alas! there was nothing to report. No trace of our game could be hit upon, and I began to fear that we must have overrun the scent. One coffee-house of doubtful repute near the quay still remained to be explored; and here we found that a lady and gentleman had slept on the night in question.

"Did they pay their bill with a note?"

"Not they—no such luck. The bill were only 7*s.* 6*d.*, and the gent paid that out of a half squid. But what might be the matter, if not making too bold?"

The "matter" was soon explained, and I fancied from the woman's manner she was keeping something back.

"Well, what might it be worth to you to get hold o' some trace on 'em—say such a thing as a handkercher, now?"

"One pound—two— Well, five pounds, if it turned out to be a genuine article."

"Certingly, the lady had left one under her pillow—and a real beauty it was."

A real beauty, indeed! It was the very handkerchief, with the embroidered "Marie" in the corner, which I had seen Madame De Fontanges use at Dedborough. My heart leaped with delight to see that we had again hit the trail. How I blessed the woman for having kept it back as an addendum to her "little bill!"

Mr. Bracelet lost no time in working the wires of the cable, and desiring his brethren in New York to board the steamer before she touched land and secure our friends, sending them back by the first return packet. And the lightning soon flashed back their reply to assure us of their readiness to do so. I went back with my chief to the Royal Swan, worn out with the excitement, and glad to rest my weary limbs; but, before doing so, I humbly thanked the God of all mercy for my escape from the net which had been spread for me.

In less than four weeks' time the fugitives were brought back from New York, and safely deposited in the prison at Dedborough, and then the whole affair was explained.

A clerk of Messrs. C. & E.'s had been leaving their employ just about the time of my ill-fated journey; but, as it was in pursuance of the usual notice, it excited no suspicion. This lad (for he was but eighteen) had seen Marie de Fontanges, whose real name was Mary Fountain, at the Royal Pandemonium Music Hall in —— Street, where she was engaged as a singer, and here the siren had sung away the poor boy's heart and senses. He fell madly in love with her, and wanted to marry her; but Miss Fountain did not exactly see the use of that unless he had something to offer. She allowed him, however, to visit her at her lodgings near Leicester Square, and here she riveted his fetters more tightly, and gradually moulded him to her will. He told her every thing about the office affairs; and she it was who put it into his head to forge a copy of the check, and to supply her with all necessary details for carrying out her little scheme. They were then to have sailed for the New World together; but, of course, she took care to give him the slip, and went away with a former lover of her own class, who, in the intervals of his professional engagements, did also a little burglary; and he it was who had supplied her with the necessary tools for opening my bag, etc., and with the skeleton-keys which she had deposited therein, in order to cast suspicion upon me until she had made good her escape.

All but about £100 of the money was recovered; the three culprits were tried and convicted at the next assizes held at Dedborough, the heaviest sentence falling upon Mary Fountain, as she was the prime mover in the whole affair. My employers treated me with more kindness than I expected; but, of course, I could not expect to remain in their service.

I went back sadly to Lavender Crescent to pack up my effects and seek a cheaper lodging; and there Jane, dear good Jane, womanlike, spread the ægis of her protecting care over me—married me almost in spite of myself, spent all her little hoard in keeping us afloat till better days; and at length by the rhetoric of love persuaded her uncle, who is a market-gardener at Battersea, to try me as his book-keeper and salesman, which I have now been for nearly three years. The fresh air and freedom of the life suits me much better than a lawyer's office; and although my cousin Robert, who is a tallow-chandler's shopman, says I have married beneath me, I never regret the step which I have taken.

POMPEY'S PILLAR AND CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLES.

WITHOUT doubt the finest show in all Alexandria at the present day is Pompey's famous Pillar. I state this, I am aware, at no small risk of challenge from one or other of the army of sight-seekers and relic-hunters who annually swarm over Egypt, as did the locusts of old, and who, having a somewhat exalted opinion of their own estimate of the popular taste, are disposed to regard any difference of opinion which may happen to be entertained by others as little short of presumption. The most remarkable objects in the ancient city are reported to have been the pharos and the library. The former, which was one of the "Seven Wonders of the World," was the well-known tower or light-house, upon the site of which the present light-house stands. It was a square building of white marble, and is said to have cost 800 talents, which in Attic money is equal to £155,000 sterling, or double that sum if computed by the talent of Alexandria. The library, as well as the museum to which it was attached, was established by Ptolemy Soter, and was maintained at the public expense. Ptolemy the Second made important additions to it. At his death it is computed to have contained no less than 100,000 volumes, which number was increased by his successors to 700,000. But both these renowned monuments of ancient Alexandria have long since disappeared. Of all the ancient monuments of the once proud capital, the Pillar and the obelisks are the only ones remaining in good preservation; and of these the Pillar, as before stated, should be, as it invariably is, first visited. It is a magnificent shaft, exquisitely formed, and in a remarkable state of preservation. Less impressive than the Pyramids, it is nevertheless more striking. It stands on an eminence less than 2000 feet from the present city walls, and, towering far above all surrounding objects, is easily seen in approaching the city either by sea or land. We reached it after a few minutes' riding on the back of our favorite donkey Abraham "Linklum," which we had found contentedly chewing his cud just outside the hotel entrance. "Pompey's Pillar!" we cried. "Y'up!" cried the little donkey driver; and in less than a twinkling we were at the base of the mighty shaft.

Though universally called Pompey's Pillar, it is not easy to find upon what authority its title to be so called rests. From a literal translation of the inscription found on the Pillar, and copied by Sir J. Gardner Wilkinson and Mr. Salt, it would appear to have been erected by Publius, a prefect of Egypt, in honor of Diocletian, and intended to record the capture of the city by that monarch during the rebellion of Achilleus, A.D. 296. It consists of a capital, shaft, base, and pedestal, which last reposes on substructures of smaller blocks, once no doubt belonging to older monuments, and probably brought to Alexandria for the purpose.

A few years ago the prying curiosity of Europeans, added to the cupidity of their Arab guides and attendants, had well-nigh brought the grand old pillar down about their ears. By digging and picking out the cement that united these stones they had so weakened the foundation of the Pillar as to seriously endanger its safety. Fortunately the pasha heard of what was going on in time to order the holes to be stopped up, and thus averted the threatened calamity. The shaft is one solid block of granite, seventy-three feet high and thirty feet in circumference. The total height of the pillar is ninety-eight feet nine inches. The capital and pedestal have the appearance of being unfinished and of inferior workmanship, which is accounted for by the supposition that they are of a date subsequent to that of the shaft, and were added to it, at the period of its erection, in honor of the emperor.

My next visit was to the "Needles," and a pitiable plight I found them in. These relics originally stood at Heliopolis, whence they are reported to have been brought to Alexandria by one of the Cæsars; but this probably is only another of the romantic fictions with which all the objects of interest in this ancient and tradition-mongering country are so plentifully surrounded. Only one of these "Needles" is standing now; the other, having been thrown down, was given by Mohammed Ali to the British, who secured it as a record of their success in Egypt. Upon maturer deliberation, however, it was decided to leave it; and it now remains half buried in sand and filth, a melancholy monument of blighted ambition and fallen greatness. The French, more enterprising and more appreciative, not only succeeded in carrying their obelisk away, but in transporting it safely to the Champs Elysées of Paris, where, notwithstanding the recent destruction by the Communists of the neighboring Tuileries, it still forms one of the most splendid monuments of that city.

IN AUGUST.

On the cliff the dying sunlight, gold and crimson,
pales away,
Merging all its rainbow splendor in the purple of the bay;
Lengthening shadows greet the twilight, while the Even's silver star,
Rising on the brow of heaven, shines the beacon-light afar.

Bearded, red with kiss of autumn, yonder waves the August corn;
Sinks the brown lark to his slumber till shall break again the dawn;
'Neath the mallow leaf the beetle drowsy hums in monotone;
On the medlar-tree the linnet sits and tunes his pipe alone.

Ripening nuts hang thick in clusters; lovers stroll beneath the boughs
In the gloaming, ne'er a witness save the glow-worm to their vows.
Ah, the days of youth's sweet spring-tide! ah, the days of Autumn bliss!
Winter hours come all too quickly—seize ye, then,
the joy of this.

Thus it is the glass turns ever—flow the sands of life along:
Changing, changing, changing, changing, is the burden of our song:
Even in birth the wailing infant draws its first faint breath with pain;
Sink in painless sleep the aged—even in dying live again.

HANDWRITING.

OF course hand-writing is meant. Where a man has the exceptional capability of writing with his toes he must be placed in a separate list. One's handwriting is interesting for this among other reasons: that many persons believe in the possibility of judging the mental character of a man from his calligraphy. It was Shenstone, if we remember rightly, who said, "Show me a man's handwriting and I will tell you his character." We can all of us say, each for himself, what kind of answer experience gives to this problem. We know harum-scarum men whose handwriting is small, neat, and careful; and slow, cautious, methodical men who write a large, bold, flowing hand. Ladies can hardly have any characteristic in this particular, seeing that the fashionable angular hand is pretty much alike in all.

Whether or not we can really determine a man's character by his handwriting, we can most certainly identify him by its means to a large degree. Not knowing a particular person, we may be able or unable to judge what sort of a man he is by looking at his handwriting; but knowing both him and his writing, we have a much better chance of determining whether a certain letter or document may safely be attributed to him; or, not knowing him at all, we may judge whether two pieces of writing are by the same hand. Of course the standard of comparison here is good composition expressed in perfect calligraphy; the greater the departure from this standard, the more chance there is of identifying the writer, seeing that the departure may be made in an almost infinite number of ways. Good handwriting is not so much attended to now as in past days. The old writing-masters took so much pride in their work as to claim for it a rank among the fine arts. What they could do in this way may be seen in the title-pages of costly books; a writing-master, or professed penman, wrote out the whole title-page in full size, and a copper-plate engraver then reproduced it.

Watch narrowly the habits of persons whom you know, in regard to peculiarities of calligraphy, and you will acquire much more power of identification than might at first appear attainable. The wits of the last century used to say that Sarah, Dutchess of Marlborough, carried her penuriousness to such a degree as to dispense with dotting her i's and crossing her t's in order to save ink; but this smart bit of scandal comes to nothing when tested by the fact that such omissions are frequent in letter-writing as a result of sheer carelessness. Making one sheet of paper serve for two by crossing the writing up and down as well as from left to right is often adopted in women's gossiping notes, though less frequently by men. It no doubt had its origin in the days when the postage of letters was charged per sheet instead of by weight, and was costly under any circumstances, especially for long distances; but why the plan should be adopted now that postage is so low and paper so cheap those must explain who indulge in it; at any rate, such a habit might tend to identify the writer of a particular letter. The same may be said of the use of the P.S. Jokes and skits without number have been pointed at fair letter-writers for their profuse use of postscripts; and theories have been advanced for explaining how it is that the most important part of a lady's letter often comes when the letter itself has been finished and signed with her name; but whatever fanciful explanations we may adopt, certain it is that some persons are more prone than others to this habit. Again, if one writer be more heedless than another, the fact is likely to show itself in omitted letters, or letters shaped like numerals—vices due to inattention, and not to real ignorance. Hence the well-known story of a merchant who bought up and transmitted no less than a ton of capers, having been misled by the careless way in which the word copper had been written by his correspondent. In proportion as a writer is liable to perpetrate little gaucheries of this kind, so will they form one among many means of guessing whether a particular letter is written by him. Another test is a want of attention to syntax in composition; the spelling and the grammar may be correct, but the arrangement of the phrases and clauses into a sentence may be wrong; and the sense may either become nonsense or be made obscure. The pronouns his, her, its, and their are awkward tools to use unless some circumspection be employed. A farmer, for instance, wrote to say that he and his neighbors were at a certain fair, and he added: "We had a splendid show of horned cattle. They were sorry you were not among them."

The experts, or decipherers, are constantly on the watch for these and other peculiarities, and the results are sometimes very striking. To prove that two documents were written by the same hand, coincidences must be shown to exist which can not be accidental; while, to prove that two documents were written by different hands, discrepancies must be pointed out which can not be accounted for by accident or disguise. Persons who wish to hide their handwriting, to make it seem as if written by some one else, generally resort to one of three methods, or two out of three, or all three—that is, to alter the slope, the size, or the fineness of the letters. But it is more difficult for a writer to maintain a disguise in their form; indeed, our practiced expert declares that he has never met with a writer who could do so and sustain a consistent and complete disguise throughout a piece of writing of moderate length.

The connecting links between the letters of a word, consisting usually of fine strokes either near the top or near the bottom, appear to furnish a great clew to the experts. The down-strokes can be altered or disguised with comparative ease; the fine up-strokes not so easily.

Besides the shape, size, fineness, slope, roundness, angularity, and connecting links of the letters in a word, and the mode of initializing first words and proper names, there is an almost infinite number of points of difference between the handwriting of different persons. Some differ from others in emphasizing their words by numerous capitals—a style which the imitators of Carlyle know something about; a much larger number underline the words to which they wish to draw attention; some make abundant use of single quotation marks, ' ', others of double, " ", although no actual quotation is given; some rely greatly on dashes, —, others on notes of admiration, !, others on parentheses, ( ); a few precise people try to observe the proper gradation of , ; : . in a sentence; some content themselves with commas and full stops alone; while others seem to think that punctuation is a meaningless formality. Other habits which persons more or less acquire, tending to associate them with a particular kind of handwriting, relate to the mode of arranging sentences into paragraphs; the mode of correcting mistakes or supplying omitted words; the tendency to spell certain words in an erroneous way; the abbreviation of words wherever possible, such as don't, won't, couldn't, tho', etc.; a tendency to make short work with all such terminal syllables as ing, ment, ation, ful; a habit of making all the down-strokes of the i, n, u, and m as nearly alike as possible, reducing such a word as minimum to fifteen similar down-strokes, etc. In writing letters, whether of business or friendship, men differ in these among other points: putting the date and place at the bottom instead of the top of the letter; omitting the address of the writer whenever possible; placing the day before the month in the date; writing the names of all the months at full length, and a multitude of others.

One's handwriting is, in fact, a part of one's self to a greater degree than most of us suppose.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

WHILE summer heat is driving thousands to pleasant sea-shore resorts and cool mountain retreats, from across the waters come reports of a conflict between the natives of Corea and the United States expedition sent thither. It was about the middle of May when the United States Asiatic fleet left Nangasaki, Japan, for a cruise in the Corean waters. The six steamers contained about 1400 persons—naval, diplomatic, artistic, and scientific—and they carried seventy-six guns. The main objects of this expedition were to make some treaty with the Corean government securing the humane treatment of American seamen who might be wrecked upon the shores of that country, to survey the Corean waters, and, if possible, to open peaceful intercourse with the people. Our fleet met with hostile demonstrations, and defended itself, as it was prepared to do—and the end is not yet. Corea, a vast peninsula northeast of China, is almost an unknown land, as intercourse with other countries has been interdicted to a very great extent by the Corean government, and the people appear to have no desire to form amicable relations with other nations. The population of Corea is estimated at ten millions. The country is divided into eight provinces, and is supposed to contain about three hundred and sixty towns and cities. The government is despotic. The natives have at various times barbarously treated sailors shipwrecked upon their shores, and the interests of humanity seemed to demand that some effort be made toward establishing friendly relations. The Coreans are believed to be intelligent and ingenious, and the country to possess valuable undeveloped resources.

The women of Germany have not been behind their fathers, husbands, and sons in rendering services to their country during the war. Three hundred and forty-nine women have received medals of honor from the Emperor William I. for valuable services rendered in the military hospitals during the war.

South Carolina has made a mistake in the management of its school funds. The children of the public schools of Charleston were dismissed a few weeks ago indefinitely. There was no money in the school treasury, and the hard-worked teachers were six months behind in receiving their pay.

Croquet meekly falls into the background, since fashionable ladies at Long Branch have been attacked by the "billiard mania." The disease rages fearfully; billiard parties are the style; from seven to nine o'clock the most approved time, after which come supper and dancing.

"Picking huckleberries" is an important and profitable business in Orange, Sullivan, and Ulster counties in this State, and in Pike and Monroe counties in Pennsylvania. The New York market is chiefly supplied from these localities, and thousands of bushels are shipped West. In some places the annual crop is so abundant that, notwithstanding the immense quantities gathered for the markets and for private use, hundreds of bushels are left upon the bushes to serve as food for the wild pigeons or to perish.

Our government is evidently determined to assist Captain Hall's expedition to the utmost. The United States ship Congress has sailed to the arctic regions with supplies for the Polaris. Her destination is the island of Disco, Greenland, where she will meet the Polaris with one thousand packages of supplies—coffee, sugar, flour, preserved meats, and vegetables; also a quantity of coal. The chaplain of the Senate of the United States, Rev. J. P. Newman, and his wife, have embraced this opportunity to make a summer excursion to Greenland.

Official statistics show that there are annually carried on the horse-railroads of this city over one hundred and thirty-six millions of passengers. In addition to this very many millions are carried in omnibuses and upon the Harlem, New Haven, and Hudson River railroads by steam-power, and by the five Harlem steamboats, which run continually throughout the day.

The Exhibition of Women's Work, opened last April in Florence under the patronage of the Princess Marguerite, has proved a very successful experiment. One interesting incident in connection with this exhibition was the giving of one of the prizes for lace to Madame Andri Bersani, a poor Venetian work-woman, who has discovered the stitch of the old Venetian point lace, which had been lost since the thirteenth century. This woman earned her living by mending old lace. After many trials in picking to pieces bits of the ancient fabric she found the lost stitch, and immediately she began to put it into practice, first in her mending, and afterward in making new pieces of the precious stuff. For the patterns she went to various artists, but none of them could assist her in imitating the old designs; and, alone and unaided, by infinite perseverance she at last succeeded in drawing the ancient patterns for herself. The Italian government has granted her the exclusive right of working in her discovery for fifteen years.

A genealogical maniac has just published in London "The Heraldry of Smith," a stately quarto, containing over two hundred and fifty distinct coats of arms borne by Smiths in Great Britain and Germany.

The Medical College of the New York Infirmary opens to women a thorough course of instruction in medical science. No woman who desires to fit herself to minister to the sick and suffering will fail, at this institution, to have the best opportunities and advantages which can be given to students. The plan of instruction designs to secure a gradation of studies through a three years' course. Lectures on hygiene, physiology, anatomy, and kindred subjects form an essential part of the course; clinical instruction is made prominent. The college, being connected with the infirmary, enables practice among several thousand patients, under proper regulations, to be used for the benefit of the students. Opportunity is also given to senior students to reside for a certain length of time in the infirmary, and to take part in the practical medical work. The liberal sentiment of New York has opened to women the lectures given in many of the city hospitals and dispensaries; so that those who desire to pursue special branches will find excellent opportunities. The fall term commences the 1st of October.

We may obtain some idea of the number of stitches now considered necessary to be put into garments from the fact that last year there were over half a million of sewing-machines manufactured in the United States.

France has busied itself in forming a vast society for the purpose of discouraging the purchase of articles manufactured in Germany.

Passing through Fulton Market any morning about this season, one is surprised at the immense quantity of water-melons exposed for sale. Some are of huge size, not a few are divided into sections or slices, and dealt out to passers-by for a trifling sum. The crop this year is larger than usual. The early melons come chiefly from the vicinity of Aiken, South Carolina, and Augusta, Georgia, whence they are sent to Savannah and Charleston for shipment. Later in the season Virginia and Maryland send in their crop, and finally New Jersey and Delaware increase the supply so much that the market is really overstocked.

The Emperor of Brazil is an early riser, and starts on his sight-seeing tour over London before most of the citizens are out of their beds. During the first ten days of his stay in London he probably saw more of that vast metropolis and its environs than the majority of its inhabitants have seen in their lives.

Parliament has taken up the condition of the children employed in the brick-yards of England, and proposes to extend to them the protection of the Factory acts. The moral and physical condition of the 30,000 young people, from the age of three and a half to seventeen, who toil in the brick-yards, is distressing. Some—even very young children—labor from fourteen to sixteen hours a day, carrying heavy loads on their heads. The English Factory acts now forbid the employment in regular mechanical labor of any child under eight years of age, and limit the number of hours which older children may work. A proposition has been made in Parliament to introduce a clause providing that no girl under the age of sixteen, and no boy under ten, should be employed in a brick-yard under any circumstances.

A Boston paper, devoted to the interests of dumb animals, became so enthusiastic upon the subject during the recent "heated term," that it called upon all humane truckmen to provide sun-bonnets for their horses.

An immense raft, 2200 feet long, containing 120,000 cubic feet of timber, recently passed through the draw-bridge at Rouse's Point, New York, and entered Lake Champlain. With the tow-line and steam tug-boat, it stretched along the water for half a mile. The timber was on its way to New York city from Ottawa, Canada.

Paris seems to be almost as gay as ever. Nearly all of the principal theatres are now open, and they are nightly crowded. The Parisians evidently desire to relax the strain on the nerves which they have undergone during the past months by a little innocent amusement. Amusement, however, is returning into its old familiar track—not always a good one. A London journal remarks, "The latest evidence shows that Paris under the republic is no more moral than Paris under the empire."

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.

VERY FAR GONE.

IT was a little after six when they came to the gate-way of the Court, at which point Mr. Tillott made his adieux. Mr. Granger would have been very glad to ask him to dinner, had he not promised Mr. Lovel that they would be quite alone; so he made up for any apparent inhospitality toward the curate by a hearty invitation for the following Sunday.

There was nearly an hour and a half before dinner; but Sophia carried off her guest to her own rooms at once, for the revision of her toilette, and detained her in those upper regions until just before the ringing of the second bell, very much to the aggravation of Mr. Granger, who paced the long drawing-room in a dismal solitude, waiting for Mr. Lovel's arrival.

In her own rooms Miss Granger became a shade more gracious to Clarissa. The exhibition of her sanctum sanctorum was always pleasing to her. It was the primmest of apartments, half study, half office; and Sophia, one of whose proudest boasts was of her methodical habits, here displayed herself in full force. It seemed as if she had inherited all the commercial faculties of her father, and having no other outlet for this mercantile genius, was fain to expend her gifts upon the petty details of a woman's life. Never had Clarissa seen such a writing-table, with so many pigeon-holes for the classification of documents, and such ranges of drawers with Brahma locks. Miss Granger might have carried on a small banking business with less paraphernalia than she employed in the conduct of her housekeeping and philanthropy.

"I am my own housekeeper," she told Clarissa, triumphantly, "and know the consumption of this large establishment to an ounce. There is no stint of any thing, of course. The diet in the servants' hall is on the most liberal scale, but there is no waste. Every cinder produced in the house is sifted; every candle we burn has been in stock a twelvemonth. I could not pretend to teach my cottagers economy if I did not practice it myself. I rule every thing by the doctrine of averages—so much consumed in one month, so much necessarily required in another; and I reduce every thing to figures. Figures can not deceive, as I tell Mrs. Plumtree, my cook, when she shows me a result that I can not understand or accept. And there are my books."

Miss Granger waved her hand toward a row of most uncompromising-looking volumes of the ledger or day-book species. The delight which she displayed in these things was something curious to behold. Every small charity Miss Granger performed, every short-coming of the recipients thereof, was recorded in those inexorable volumes. She had a book for the record of the church-going, a book for the plain needle-work, and was wont to freeze the young blood of her school-children by telling them at the end of the year how many inches of cambric frilling they had hemmed, and how many times they had missed afternoon service. To them she appeared an awful supernatural creature—a kind of prophetess sent forth upon earth for their correction and abasement.

On a solid ecclesiastical-looking oak table in one of the windows Miss Granger had a row of brass-bound money-boxes, inscribed, "For the Home Mission," "For the Extra Curate Society," and so on—boxes into which Miss Granger's friends and visitors were expected to drop their mite. Clarissa felt that if she had been laden down with shillings she could not for her very life have approached those formidable boxes to drop one in under Miss Granger's ken; but, of course, this was a morbid fancy. On another table there were little piles of material for plain work, so prim, so square, so geometrically precise, that Clarissa thought the flannel itself looked cold—a hard, fibrous, cruel fabric, that could never be of use to mortal flesh except as an irritant.

Miss Granger's bedroom and dressing-room were like Miss Granger's morning-room. No frivolous medievalism here, no dainty upholsterer's work in many-colored woods, but solid mahogany, relieved by solemn draperies of drab damask in a style that the wise Sophia called unpretentious. The chief feature in one room was a sewing-machine that looked like a small church organ, and in the other a monster medicine chest, from the contents of which Miss Granger dealt out doses of her own concoction to her parishioners. Both of these objects she showed to Clarissa with pride, but the medicine chest was evidently the favorite.

Having improved the time after this manner till twenty minutes past seven, with a very brief interval devoted to the duties of the toilette, the two young ladies went down to the drawing-room, where the lamps were lighted, and Mr. Lovel just arrived.

That gentleman had the honor of taking Miss Granger in to dinner, and did his utmost to render himself agreeable to her in a quiet, undemonstrative way, and to take the gauge of her mental powers. She received his attentions graciously enough—indeed, it would not have been easy for any one to be ungracious to Marmaduke Lovel when he cared to please—but he could see very clearly that she suspected the state of affairs, and would be, to the last degree, antagonistic to his own and his daughter's interests. He saw how close a watch she kept upon her father all through the dinner, and how her attention was distracted every now and then when he was talking to Clarissa.

"It is only natural that she should set her face against the business," he said to himself: "no woman in her position could be expected to act otherwise; but it strikes me that Granger is not a man likely to be influenced by domestic opposition. He is the kind of man to take his own way, I fancy, in defiance of an opposing universe—a very difficult man to govern. He seems over head and ears in love, however, and it will be Clarissa's own fault if she doesn't do what she likes with him. Heaven grant she may prove reasonable! Most women would be enchanted with such an opportunity, but with a raw schoolgirl there is no knowing. And that fellow Fairfax's influence may work against us, in spite of her protestations last night."

This was the gist of Mr. Lovel's disjointed musings during the progress of the dinner; but he took care not to neglect Miss Granger even for a moment, and he gave her very little time to listen to her father's conversation with Clarissa.

The dinner ceremonial was performed in a manner which seemed perfection even to the fastidious taste of Marmaduke Lovel. There was not the faintest indication of ostentation. Daniel Granger's father had been rich before him; he had been born in the commercial purple, as it were, and none of these things were new to him. Before the Arden Court days he had occupied a handsome modern country house southward, near Doncaster. He had only expanded his style of living after the purchase of the Court—that was all. He had good taste, too, and a keen sense of the incongruous. He did not affect the orchids and frivolous floral decorations, the fragile fairy-like glass, with which Lady Laura Armstrong brightened her dinner-table; but, on the other hand, his plate, of which he exhibited no vulgar profusion, was in the highest art, the old Indian china dinner service scarcely less costly than solid silver, and the heavy diamond-cut glass, with gold emblazonment of crest and monogram, worthy to be exhibited behind the glazed doors of a cabinet. There was no such abomination as gas in the state chambers of Arden Court. Innumerable candles, in antique silver candelabra, gave a subdued brightness to the dining-room. More candles, in sconces against the walls, and two pairs of noble moderator lamps, on bronze and ormolu pedestals six feet high, lighted the drawing-room. In the halls and corridors there was the same soft glow of lamp-light. Only in kitchens and out-offices and stables was the gas permitted to blaze merrily for the illumination of cooks and scullions, grooms and helpers.

Miss Granger only lingered long enough to trifle with a cluster of purple hot-house grapes before giving the signal for withdrawal. Her father started up to open the dining-room door, with a little sudden sigh. He had had Clarissa all to himself throughout the dinner, and had been very happy, talking about things that were commonplace enough in themselves, but finding a perfect contentment in the fact that he was talking to her, that she listened to him and smiled upon him graciously, with a sweet self-possession that put him quite at his ease. She had recovered from that awkward scene of the morning, and had settled in her own mind that the business was rather absurd than serious. She had only to take care that Mr. Granger never had any second opportunity for indulging in such folly.

He held the door open as Clarissa and his daughter went out of the room—held it till that slim girlish figure had vanished at the end of the corridor—and then came back to his seat with another sigh.

"Very far gone!" Mr. Lovel thought, smiling ever so little, as he bent over his claret-glass, pretending to admire the color of the wine.

It was really wonderful. That vague dream which had grown out of Lady Laura's womanly hints, that pleasant phantom which she had conjured up in Mr. Lovel's mental vision a month or two ago, in the midsummer afternoon, had made itself into a reality so quickly as to astound a man too Horatian in his philosophy to be easily surprised. The fish was such a big one to be caught so easily—without any exercise of those subtle manœuvres and Machiavelian artifices in which the skillful angler delights—nay, to pounce open-eyed upon the hook, and swallow it bodily.

Mr. Granger filled his glass with such a nervous hand that half the claret he poured out ran upon the shining oak table. He wiped up the spilled wine clumsily enough, with a muttered denunciation of his own folly, and then made a feeble effort to talk about indifferent things.

It was no use; with every appearance of courtesy and interest, Mr. Lovel contrived not to help him. One subject after another fell flat: the state of the conservative party, the probability of a war—there is always the probability of war somewhere, according to after-dinner politicians—the aspect of the country politically and agriculturally, and so on. No, it was no use; Daniel Granger broke down altogether at last, and thought it best to unbosom himself.

"There is something that I think you have a right to know, Mr. Lovel," he said, in an awkward, hesitating way; "something which I should scarcely like you to learn from your daughter's lips, should she think it worth her while to mention it, before you have heard it from mine. The fact is, in plain English"—he was playing with his dessert-knife as he spoke, and seemed to be debating within himself whereabout upon the dining-table he should begin the carving of his name—"the fact is, I made an abject fool of myself this morning. I love your daughter—and told her so."

Mr. Lovel gave a slight start, the faintest perceptible movement, expressive of a gentle astonishment.

"I need hardly tell you that you have taken me entirely by surprise," he said, in his quietest tone.

"Of course not. People always are surprised when a man of my age presumes to fall in love with a beautiful girl of eighteen or twenty. If I were to marry some worn-out woman of fashion, some battered widow, steeped to the lips in the worst worldly experience, every one would call the match the most suitable thing possible. But if a man of fifty ventures to dream a brighter dream, he is condemned at once for a fool."

"Pardon me, my dear Granger; I have no idea of looking at things in that light. I only remark that you surprise me, as you no doubt surprised my daughter by any avowal you may have made this morning."

"Yes, and, I fear, disgusted her still more. I dare say I did my cause all the harm that it was possible to do it."

"I must own that you were precipitate," Mr. Lovel answered, with his quiet smile. He felt as if he had been talking to a school-boy. In his own words the man was so "very far gone."

"I shall know how to be more careful in future, if not wiser; but I suffered myself to be carried away by impulse this morning. It was altogether unworthy of—of my time of life." This was said rather bitterly. "Frankly, now, Mr. Lovel: if in the future I were able to gain some hold upon your daughter's affection—without that I would do nothing, no, so help me Heaven, however passionately I might love her; if I could—if, in spite of the difference of our ages, I could win her heart—would you be in any way antagonistic to such a marriage?"

"On the contrary, my dear Granger." Mr. Lovel had already something of the tone of a father-in-law. "Slight as our actual acquaintance has been, I think I know the estimable qualities of your character well enough from other sources to be able to say that such a marriage would be eminently pleasing to me. Nor is this all. I mean to be perfectly candid with you, Granger. My daughter and myself have both an almost romantic attachment to this place, and I freely own that it would be very delightful to me to see her mistress of her old home. But, at the same time, I give you my honor that nothing would induce me to govern her choice by the smallest exercise of parental influence. If you can win her, win her, and my best wishes shall go with your wooing; but I will utter no word to persuade her to be your wife."

"I respect you for that resolution. I think I should have asked you to be neutral, if you hadn't said as much. I couldn't stand the idea of a wife driven into my arms by fatherly coercion. I suppose such things are done in modern society. No; I must win my treasure myself, or not at all. I have every thing against me, no doubt, except a rival. There is no fear of that, is there, Lovel?"

"Not the slightest. Clarissa is a mere schoolgirl. Her visit to Lady Laura Armstrong was her first glimpse of the world. No, Granger, you have the field all before you. It must go hard with you if you do not emerge from the struggle as a conqueror. And you strike me as a man not given to succumb."

"I never yet set myself to do a thing which I didn't accomplish in the long run," answered Mr. Granger; "but then I never set myself to win a woman's heart. My wife and I came together easily enough—in the way of business, as I may say—and liked each other well enough, and I regretted her honestly when she was gone, poor soul! but that was all. I was never 'in love' till I knew your daughter; never understood the meaning of the phrase. Of all the accidents that might have happened to me, this is the most surprising to myself, believe me. I can never make an end of wondering at my own folly."

"I do not know why you should call it a folly. You are only in the very middle of a man's life; you have a fortune that exempts you from all care and labor, and, of course, at the same time, leaves you more or less without occupation. Your daughter will marry and leave you in a year or two, no doubt. Without some new tie, your future existence must needs be very empty."

"I have felt that; but only since I have loved your daughter."

This was all. The men came in with coffee, and put an end to all confidential converse; after which Mr. Granger seemed very glad to go back to the drawing-room, where Clarissa was playing a mazurka, while Sophia sat before a great frame, upon which some splendid achievement in Berlin wool work, that was to be the glory of an approaching charity bazar, was rapidly advancing toward completion. The design was a group of dogs, after Landseer, and Miss Granger was putting in the pert black nose of a Skye terrier as the gentlemen entered. The two ladies were as far apart as they well could be in the spacious room, and had altogether an inharmonious air, Mr. Granger thought; but then he was nervously anxious that these two should become friends.

He went straight to the piano, and seated himself near Clarissa, almost with the air of having a right to take that place.

"Pray, go on playing," he said; "that seems very pretty music. I am no judge, and I don't pretend to care for that classical music which every one talks about nowadays, but I know what pleases me."

The evening was not an especially gay one; but it seemed pleasant enough to Mr. Granger, and he found himself wondering at its brevity. He showed Clarissa some of his favorite pictures. His collection of modern art was a fine one—not large, but very perfect in its way, and he was delighted to see her appreciation of his treasures. Here at least was a point upon which they might sympathize. He had been a good deal worried by Sophia's obtuseness upon all artistic matters.

Mr. Lovel was not very sorry when the fly from the Arden inn was announced, and it was time to go home. The pictures were fine, no doubt, and the old house was beautiful in its restored splendor; but the whole business jarred upon Marmaduke Lovel's sensitive nerves just a little in spite of the sudden realization of that vague dream of his. This place might be his daughter's home, and he return to it, but not as its master. The day of his glory was gone. He was doubtful if he should even care to inhabit that house as his daughter's guest. He had to remind himself of the desperate condition of his own circumstances before he could feel duly grateful to Providence for his daughter's subjugation of Daniel Granger.

He was careful to utter no word about her conquest on the way home, or during the quarter of an hour Clarissa spent with him before going to her room.

"You look pale and tired, my child," he said, with a sympathetic air, turning over the leaves of a book as he spoke.

"The day was rather fatiguing, papa," his daughter answered, listlessly, "and Miss Granger is a tiring person. She is so strong-minded that she makes one feel weak and helpless by the mere force of contrast."

"Yes, she is a tiring person, certainly; but I think I had the worst of her at dinner and in the evening."

"But there was all the time before dinner, papa. She showed us her cottages—oh, how I pitied the poor people! though I dare say she is kind to them, in her way; but imagine any one coming in here and opening all our cupboards, and spying out cobwebs, and giving a little shriek at the discovery of a new loaf in our larder. She found out that one of her model cottagers had been eating new bread. She said it gave her quite a revulsion of feeling. And then when we went home she showed me her account-books and her medicine chest. It was very tiring."

"Poor child! and this young woman will have Arden Court some day—unless her father should marry again."

Clarissa's pale face flamed with sudden crimson.

"Which he is pretty sure to do, sooner or later," continued Mr. Lovel, with an absent, meditative air, as of a man who discusses the most indifferent subject possible. "I hope he may. It would be a pity for such a place to fall into such hands. She would make it a phalanstery, a nest for Dorcas societies and callow curates."

"But if she does good with her money, papa, what more could one wish?"

"I don't believe that she would do much good. There is a pinched, hard look about the lower part of her face which makes me fancy she is mean. I believe she would hoard her money, and make a great talk and fuss about nothing. Yes, I hope Granger will marry again. The house is very fine, isn't it, since its renovation?"

"It is superb, papa. Dearly as I loved the place, I did not think it could be made so beautiful."

"Yes, and every thing has been done in good taste, too," Mr. Lovel went on, in rather a querulous tone. "I did not expect to see that. But, of course, a man of that kind has only to put himself into the hands of a first-class architect, and if he is lucky enough to select an architect with an artistic mind, the thing is done. All the rest is merely a question of money. Good Heavens, what a shabby sordid hole this room looks, after the place we have come from!"

The room was not so bad as to merit that look of angry disgust with which Mr. Lovel surveyed it. Curtains and carpet were something the worse for wear, the old-fashioned furniture was a little sombre; but the rich binding of the books and a rare old bronze here and there redeemed it from commonness—poor jetsam and flotsam from the wreck of the great house, but enough to give some touch of elegance to meaner things.

"Oh, papa," Clarissa cried, reproachfully, "the room is very nice, and we have been peaceful and happy in it. I don't suppose all the splendor of Arden would have made us much happier. Those external things make so little difference."

She thought of those evenings at Hale Castle, when George Fairfax had abandoned her to pay duty to his betrothed, and of the desolation of spirit that had come upon her in the midst of those brilliant surroundings.

Her father paced the little room as if it had been a den, and answered her philosophic remonstrance with an exclamation of contempt.

"That's rank nonsense, Clarissa—copy-book morality, which nobody in his heart ever believes. External things make all the difference, except when a man is writhing in physical pain, perhaps. External things make the difference between a king and a beggar. Do you suppose that man Granger is no happier for the possession of Arden Court—of those pictures of his? Why, every time he looks at a Frith or a Millais he feels a little thrill of triumph, as he says to himself, 'And that is mine.' There is a sensuous delight in beautiful surroundings which will remain to a man whose heart is dead to every other form of pleasure. I suppose that is why the popes were such patrons of art in days gone by. It was the one legitimate delight left to them. Do you imagine it is no pleasure to dine every night as that man dines? no happiness to feel the sense of security about the future which he feels every morning? Great God, when I think of his position and of mine!"

Never before had he spoken so freely to his daughter; never had he so completely revealed the weakness of his mind.

She was sorry for him, and forbore to utter any of those feminine commonplaces by which she might have attempted to bring him to a better frame of mind. She had tact enough to divine that he was best left to himself—left to struggle out of this groveling state by some effort of his own, rather than to be dragged from the slough of despond by moral violence of hers.

He dismissed her presently with a brief goodnight; but lying awake nearly two hours afterward, she heard him pass her door on the way to his room. He too was wakeful, therefore, and full of care.

CHAPTER XXII.

TAKING THE PLEDGE.

CLARISSA had a visitor next day. She was clipping and trimming the late roses in the bright autumnal afternoon, when Lady Laura Armstrong's close carriage drove up to the gate, with my lady inside it, in deep mourning. The visit was unexpected, and startled Clarissa a little with a sensation that was not all pleasure. She could scarcely be otherwise than glad to see so kind a friend; but there were reasons why the advent of any one from Hale Castle should be somewhat painful to her. That meeting with George Fairfax by the church-yard had never been quite out of her mind since it happened. His looks and his words had haunted her perpetually, and now she was inclined to ascribe Lady Laura's coming to some influence of his. She had a guilty feeling, as if she had indeed tried to steal Lady Geraldine's lover.

Lady Laura greeted her with all the old cordiality, and there was a relief in that; and Clarissa's face, which had been very pale when she opened the gate to admit her visitor, brightened a little as my lady kissed her.

"My dear child, I am so glad to see you again!" exclaimed my lady. "I am not supposed to stir outside the Castle in all this dreary week. Poor papa is to be buried to-morrow. But I wanted so much to see you on a most important business; so I ordered the brougham and drove here, with the blinds down all the way, so that no one might see me; and I'm sure, Clary, you won't think that I feel papa's loss any less because I come to see you just now. But, I declare, you are looking as pale and wan as any of us at Hale. You have not recovered that dreadful shock yet."

"It was indeed a dreadful shock, dear Lady Laura," said Clarissa; and then in a less steady tone she went on: "Lady Geraldine is better, I hope?"

"Geraldine is what she always is, Clary—a marvel of calmness. And yet I know she feels this affliction very deeply. She was papa's favorite, you know, and had a most extraordinary influence over him. He was so proud of her, poor dear!"

"Won't you come into the house, Lady Laura?"

"By-and-by, just to pay my respects to your papa. But we'll stay in the garden for the present, please, dear. I have something most particular to say to you."

Clarissa's heart beat a little quicker. This most particular something was about George Fairfax; she felt very sure of that.

"I am going to be quite candid with you, Clary," Lady Laura began, presently, when they were in a narrow walk sheltered by hazel-bushes—the most secluded bit of the garden. "I shall treat you just as if you were a younger sister of my own. I think I have almost a right to do that, for I'm sure I love you as much as if you were my sister."

And here Lady Laura's plump little black-gloved hand squeezed Clarissa's tenderly.

"You have been all goodness to me," the girl answered; "I can never be too grateful to you."

"Nonsense, Clary; I will not have that word gratitude spoken between us. I only want you to understand that I am sincerely attached to you, and that I am the last person in the world to hold your happiness lightly. And now, dearest child, tell me the truth—you have seen George Fairfax since you left Hale?"

Clarissa flushed crimson. To be asked for the truth, as if, under any circumstances, she would have spoken any thing less than truth about George Fairfax! And yet that unwonted guilty feeling clung to her, and she was not a little ashamed to confess that she had seen him.

"Yes, Lady Laura."

"I thought so; I was sure of it. He came here on the very day you left—the day which was to have been his wedding-day."

"It was on that evening I saw him; but he did not come to this house. I was sitting outside the church-yard, sketching, when I saw him."

"He did not come to the house—no; but he came to Arden on purpose to see you," Lady Laura answered, eagerly. "I am sure of that."

Unhappily Clarissa could not deny the fact. He had told her only too plainly that he had come to Arden determined to see her.

"Now, Clary, let us be perfectly frank. Before my sister Geraldine came to Hale I told you that the attachment between her and George Fairfax was one of long standing, that I was sure her happiness was involved in the matter, and how rejoiced I was at the turn things had taken. I told you all this, Clary; but I did not tell you that in the years we had known him Mr. Fairfax had been wild and unsteady; that, while always more or less devoted to Geraldine, he had had attachments elsewhere—unacknowledged attachments of no very creditable nature; such affairs as one only hears of by a side-wind, as it were. How much Geraldine may have known of this I can not tell. I heard the scandals, naturally enough, through Fred; but she may have heard very little. I said nothing of this to you, Clarissa; it was not necessary that I should say any thing to depreciate the character of my future brother-in-law, and of a man I really liked."

"Of course not," faltered Clarissa.

"Of course not. I was only too happy to find that George had become a reformed person, and that he had declared himself so soon after the change in his fortunes. I was convinced that Geraldine loved him, and that she could only be really happy as his wife. I am convinced of that still; but I know that nothing on earth could induce her to marry him if she had the faintest doubt of his thorough devotion to herself."

"I hope that she may never have occasion to doubt that, Lady Laura," answered Clarissa. It was really all she could find to say under the circumstances.

"I hope not, and I think not, Clary. He has been attached to my sister so long—he proposed to her in such a deliberate manner—that I can scarcely imagine he would prove really inconstant. But I know that he is a slave to a pretty face, and fatally apt to be ruled by the impulse of the moment. It would be very hard now, Clary, if some transient fancy of that kind were to ruin the happiness of two lives—would it not, my dear?"

"It would be very hard."

"Oh, Clarissa, do pray be candid. You must understand what I mean. That wretched man has been making love to you?"

"You ought not to ask me such a question, Lady Laura," answered Clarissa, sorely perplexed by this straight attack. "You must know that I should respect Lady Geraldine's position—that I should be incapable of forgetting her claims upon Mr. Fairfax. Whatever he may have said to me has been the merest folly. He knows that I consider it in that light, and I have refused ever to see him again if I can possibly help it."

"That's right, dear!" cried Lady Laura, with a pleased look. "I knew that you would come out of this business well, in spite of every thing. Of course you can care nothing for this foolish fellow; but I know Geraldine's sensitive nature so well, and that if she had an inkling of this conduct of George's, the whole thing would be off forever—an attachment of many years' standing—think of that, Clary! Now I want you to promise me that, come what may, you will give Mr. Fairfax no encouragement. Without encouragement, this foolish fancy will die out very quickly. Of course, if it were possible you could care for him, I would not come here to ask you such a thing as this. You would have a right to consider your own happiness before my sister's. But as that is out of the question, and the man is almost a stranger to you—"

"Out of the question—almost a stranger." Clarissa remembered that night in the railway carriage, and it seemed to her as if she and George Fairfax had never been strangers.

"It is so easy for you to give me this promise. Tell me now, Clary dear, that you will not have any thing to say to him, if he should contrive to see you again."

"I will not, Lady Laura."

"Is that a promise, now, Clarissa?"

"A most sacred promise."

Laura Armstrong kissed her young friend in ratification of the vow.

"You are a dear, generous-minded girl," she said, "and I feel as if I had saved my sister's happiness by this bold course. And now tell me what you have been doing since you left us. Have you seen any thing more of the Grangers?"

Questioned thus, Clarissa was fain to give her friend some slight account of her day at Arden.

"It must have affected you very much to see the old place. Ah, Clary, it is you who ought to be mistress there, instead of Miss Granger!"

Clarissa blushed, remembering that awkward avowal of Daniel Granger's.

"I am not fit to be mistress of such a place," she said. "I could never manage things as Miss Granger does."

"Not in that petty way, perhaps. I should not care to see you keeping accounts and prying into grocery lists as she does. You would govern your house on a grander scale. I should like to see you the owner of a great house."

"That is a thing you are never likely to see, Lady Laura."

"I am not so sure of that. I have an idea that there is a great fortune lying at your feet, if you would only stoop to pick it up. But girls are so foolish; they never know what is really for their happiness; and if by any chance there should happen to be some passing folly, some fancy of the moment, to come between them and good fortune, every thing is lost."

She looked at Clarissa closely as she said this. The girl's face had been changing from red to pale throughout the interview. She was very pale now, but quite self-possessed, and had left off blushing. Had she not given her promise—pledged away her freedom of action with regard to George Fairfax—and thus made an end of every thing between them? She felt very calm, but she felt as if she had made a sacrifice. As for Daniel Granger, any reference to him and his admiration for her touched upon the regions of the absurd. Nothing—no friendly manœuvring of Lady Laura's, no selfish desires of her father's—could ever induce her to listen for a moment to any proposition from that quarter.

She asked her visitor to go into the house presently, in order to put an end to the conversation; and Lady Laura went in to say a few words to Mr. Lovel. They were very melancholy words—all about the dead and his innumerable virtues, which seemed really at this stage of his history to have been alloyed by no human frailty or short-coming. Mr. Lovel was sympathetic to the last degree, sighed in unison with his visitor, and brushed some stray drops of moisture from his own eyelids when Lady Laura wept. And then he went out to the carriage with my lady, and saw her drive away, with the blinds discreetly lowered as before.

"What did she come about, Clarissa?" he asked his daughter while they were going back to the house.

"Only to see me, papa."

"Only to see you! She must have had something very important to say to you, I should think, or she would scarcely have come at such a time."

He glanced at his daughter sharply as he said this, but did not question her farther, though he would have liked to do so. He had a shrewd suspicion that this visit of Lady Laura's bore some reference to George Fairfax. Had there been a row at the Castle, he wondered? and had my lady come to bully her protégée?

"I don't suppose they would show her much mercy if she stood in the way of their schemes," he said to himself. "His brother's death makes this young Fairfax a very decent match. The property must be worth five or six thousand a year—five or six thousand. I wonder what Daniel Granger's income is? Nearer fifty thousand than five, if I may believe what I have been told."

Mr. Granger and his daughter called at Mill Cottage next day; the fair Sophia with a somewhat unwilling aspect, though she was decently civil to Mr. and Miss Lovel. Her father had brought her to look at some of Clarissa's sketches, he told his friends.

"I want her to take more interest in landscape art, Mr. Lovel," he said, "and I think your daughter's example may inspire her. Miss Lovel seems to me to have a real genius for landscape. I saw some studies of ferns and under-wood that she had done at Hale—full of freedom and of feeling. Sophia doesn't draw badly, but she wants feeling."

The young lady thus coldly commended gave her head rather a supercilious toss as she replied.

"You must remember that I have higher duties than sketching, papa," she said; "I can not devote all my existence to ferns and blackberry-bushes."

"Oh yes, of course; you've your schools, and that kind of thing; but you might give more time to art than you do, especially if you left the management of the house more to Mrs. Plumtree. I think you waste time and energy upon details."

"I hope I know my duty as mistress of a large establishment, papa, and that I shall never feel the responsibility of administering a large income any less than I do at present. It would be a bad thing for you if I became careless of your interests in order to roam about sketching toad-stools and blackberry-bushes."

Mr. Granger looked as if he were rather doubtful upon this point, but it was evidently wisest not to push the discussion too far.

"A MOST SACRED PROMISE."

"Will you be so kind as to show us your portfolio, Miss Lovel?" he asked.

"Of course she will," answered her father, promptly; "she will only be too happy to exhibit her humble performances to Miss Granger. Bring your drawing-book, Clary."

Clarissa would have given the world to refuse. A drawing-book is in some measure a silent confidante. She did not know how far her random sketches—some of them mere vagabondage of the pencil, jotted down half unconsciously—might betray the secrets of her inner life to the cold eyes of Miss Granger.

"I'd better bring down my finished drawings, papa; those that were mounted for you at Belfôret," she said.

"Nonsense, child; Mr. Granger wants to see your rough sketches, not those stiff school-girl things, which I suppose were finished by your drawing-master. Bring that book you are always scribbling in. The girl has a kind of passion for art," said Mr. Lovel, rather fretfully; "she is seldom without a pencil in her hand. What are you looking for, Clarissa, in that owlish way? There's your book on that table."

He pointed to the volume—Clarissa's other self and perpetual companion—the very book she had been sketching in when George Fairfax surprised her by the church-yard wall. There was no help for it, no disobeying that imperious finger of her father's; so she brought the book and laid it meekly open before Sophia Granger.

The father and daughter turned over the leaves together. It was a book of "bits:" masses of foliage, bramble, and bird's nest: here the head of an animal, there the profile of a friend; anon a bit of still-life; a vase of flowers, with the arabesqued drapery of a curtain for a background; every where the evidence of artistic feeling and a practiced hand—every where a something much above a school-girl's art.

Miss Granger looked through the leaves with an icy air. She was obliged to say "Very pretty," or "Very clever," once in a way; but this cold phrase evidently cost her a severe effort. Not so her father. He was interested in every page, and criticised every thing with a real knowledge of what he was talking about, which made Clarissa feel that he was at least no pretender as to the love of art; that he was not a man who bought pictures merely because he was rich and it was the right thing to do.

They came presently to the pages Clarissa had covered at Hale Castle—bits of familiar landscape, glimpses of still-life in the Castle rooms, and lightly touched portraits of the Castle guests. There was one head that appeared very much oftener than others, and Clarissa felt herself blushing a deeper red every time Mr. Granger paused to contemplate this particular likeness.

He lingered longer over each of these sketches, with rather a puzzled air, and though the execution of these heads was very spirited, he forbore to praise.

"There is one face here that I see a good deal of, Miss Lovel," he said at last. "I think it is Mr. Fairfax, is it not?"

Clarissa looked at the profile of George Fairfax dubiously.

"Yes, I believe I meant that for Mr. Fairfax; his is a very easy face to draw; much easier than Lady Geraldine's, though her features are so regular. All my portraits of her are failures."

"I have only seen one attempt at Lady Geraldine's portrait in this book, Miss Lovel," said Sophia.

"I have some more on loose sheets of paper, somewhere; and then I generally destroy my failures if they are quite hopeless."

"Mr. Fairfax would be quite flattered if he could see how often you have sketched him," Sophia continued, blandly.

Clarissa thought of the leaf George Fairfax had cut out of her drawing-book; a recollection which did not serve to diminish her embarrassment.

"I dare say Mr. Fairfax is quite vain enough without any flattery of that kind," said Mr. Lovel. "And now that you have exhibited your rough sketches, you can bring those mounted drawings, if you like, Clarissa."

This was a signal for the closing of the book, which Clarissa felt was intended for her relief. She put the volume back upon the little side-table from which she had taken it, and ran up stairs to fetch her landscapes. These Miss Granger surveyed in the same cold, tolerant manner with which she had surveyed the sketch-book—the manner of a person who could have done much better in that line herself if she had cared to do any thing so frivolous.

After this Mr. Lovel and his daughter called at the Court; and the acquaintance between the two families being thus formally inaugurated by a dinner and a couple of morning calls, Mr. Granger came very often to the Cottage, unaccompanied by the inflexible Sophia, who began to feel that her father's infatuation was not to be lessened by any influence of hers, and that she might just as well let him take his own way. It was an odious, unexpected turn which events had taken; but there was no help for it. Her confidential maid, Hannah Warman, reminded her of that solemn truth whenever she ventured to touch upon this critical subject.

"If your pa was a young man, miss, or a man that had admired a great many ladies in his time, it would be quite different," said the astute Warman; "but never having took notice of any one before, and taking such particular notice of this young lady, makes it clear to any one that's got eyes. Depend upon it, miss, it won't be long before he'll make her an offer; and it isn't likely she'll refuse him—not with a ruined pa to urge her on!"

"I suppose not," said Sophia, disconsolately.

"And after all, miss, he might have made a worse choice. If he were to marry one of those manœuvring middle-aged widows we've met so often out visiting, you'd have had a regular step-mother, that would have taken every bit of power out of your hands, and treated you like a child. But Miss Lovel seems a very nice young lady, and, being so near your own age, will be quite a companion for you."

"I don't want such a companion. There is no sympathy between Miss Lovel and me; you ought to know that, Warman. Her tastes are the very reverse of mine in every way. It's not possible we can ever get on well together; and if papa marries her, I shall feel that he is quite lost to me. Besides, how could I ever have any feeling but contempt for a girl who would marry for money? and of course Miss Lovel could only marry papa for the sake of his money."

"It's done so often nowadays. And sometimes those matches turn out very well—better than some of the love-matches, I've heard say."

"It's no use discussing this hateful business, Warman," Miss Granger answered, haughtily. "Nothing could change my opinion."

And in this inflexible manner did Daniel Granger's daughter set her face against the woman he had chosen from among all other women for his wife. He felt that it was so, and that there would be a hard battle for him to fight in the future between these two influences; but no silent opposition of his daughter's could weaken his determination to win Clarissa Lovel, if she was to be won by him.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

FLORA MAY.—The book you mention is a burlesque account of a real voyage. "Will Carleton" is not a nom de plume. George Sand is the literary name of Madame Dudevant. Gift weddings are gotten up by the couple whose anniversary is celebrated. They issue invitations engraved on wood, tin, etc., and courtesy requires that they should add, "No presents received," as the custom now is.—White waists, basques, and over-skirts are worn over dresses, or merely skirts, of any color. Black silk polonaises, not mere basques, are worn with colored skirts. Side curls are not worn. We can not tell you how to make your straight switch curl permanently.

CONSTANT READER OF BAZAR.—Your lace is a coarse imitation, not good enough to use on lingerie. The guipure square-meshed lace curtains in stripes, or else dotted Swiss muslin curtains with fluted ruffles, are both preferable to Nottingham lace curtains, though very fine Nottingham will answer for your well-furnished rooms.

DILEMMA.—Get dark gray mohair, trimmed with black silk bands, for a mourning traveling dress. Silk-faced gray serge is apt to cockle. Your grenadine, ruffled to the waist, and worn with a long basque or polonaise, will be very stylish.

ELSIE.—Perpendicular tucking is more used than bias tucking. Over-skirts and polonaise skirts of grenadine are not lined, but grenadine waists and sleeves are lined with silk. Tight basques of Victoria lawn are not lined.

MADGE AND ETTA.—The best thing to do with your last summer's poplin is to leave it as it is, and wear it draped over a black or brown silk skirt. Make coat or half-flowing or shirt sleeves for your percale dress. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 28, Vol. IV.

W. L. A.—Your pale blue silk will make a pretty carriage suit combined with darker blue or with gray. Polonaises with high lining are the style for organdy dresses.

MRS. JANE WALTON.—The Bazar is not a warm advocate of corsets, and can not advise you which to get to lace tightly.—To reduce your flesh without doing great harm get Banting's book, and follow its directions.

ALICE, JOE U., AND OTHERS.—All inquiries about treatment of the skin, cosmetics, etc., have been answered at length in the "Ugly Girl" papers, and we have not room for further replies on these subjects. Bazars containing those articles will be furnished for ten cents each number.

FRANCESCA.—Most elaborate vignettes are used to mark gentlemen's handkerchiefs, and are not thought effeminate. We do not furnish individual monograms.

BLONDE.—Read about white alpaca in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 31, Vol. IV. Make your black silk with demi-train and Worth basque and over-skirt. Trim with flounces and with lace over white muslin pleatings.

L. A. S.—Black-walnut mantels upholstered with reps require an experienced upholsterer to fashion them prettily, and this, we fear, would be too much expense for you. This upholstering is, however, sometimes done by housewives who have seen the mantels, but you would scarcely make a nice job of it from a description.

INTEREST.—Victoria lawn is the most stylish fabric for white suits. Rain spots Japanese silk and makes it flimsy.—A mantel clock, an easy-chair embroidered by the donor, a toilette set, a drop light, a work-table, a china tea set, a useful piece of silver, vases, spoons, a pretty chromo, a majolica pitcher—all these are useful gifts to a bride of moderate means.

MRS. J. M. S.—All the costumes lately given among our cut paper patterns are appropriate alike for the present and the fall season. Blue, gray, and white are the colors most worn by boys.

SUBSCRIBER.—Get bombazine and tamise cloth for mourning suits for fall. Trim the bombazine with folds of English crape; the tamise with folds of itself. Your alpaca would be more suitable trimmed with folds of dead black silk, but may be worn as it is. Plain jet or rubber jewelry is preferable to that of enamel for dress mourning. Wear white nansook dresses with box-pleated waists, black ribbon sash, and jet jewelry in the house in summer. Get a long English crape veil, and gather one end over your bonnet.

CLEVELAND.—Your sample is a light quality of black cashmere. Put kilt pleatings on the skirt, and make a polonaise trimmed with fringe and braiding, or else bias bands of black silk.

MRS. JONES.—Trim your green and white silk with bias green silk bands and fringe, or else Swiss muslin pleatings. Your ideas of making are very good, though court trains are not so fashionable as formerly. Get a white English straw or a chip bonnet with lavender ribbon and white daisies.

GAILIE.—We have said repeatedly that we will not recommend depilatories. To pluck out your superfluous hair, continuing to do so when it re-appears, is a tedious plan, but the only one we think safe.

VIC.—You could make a stylish suit by putting two bias scant flounces of dark brown silk on your skirt, and wearing it with a buff over dress of linen or pongee. Get nine yards of buff linen at twenty-five cents a yard, and make a box-pleated blouse and over-skirt by directions given for cambric dresses in Bazar No. 28, Vol. IV. Put merely a bias fold around the over-skirt, or else add buff lace or fringe. Your sample is entirely out of fashion.—For visiting cards read Bazar No. 31, Vol. IV. The name should not be written diagonally on the card, but horizontally.

MATTIE.—Silk like your sample is not much worn, but would look very pretty with a long Swiss muslin over-skirt. A wide flounce on the silk skirt, headed by black velvet, would also improve it.

OHIO.—The Worth basque dress, or else the Apron-Polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., would be pretty made in embroidered organdy. Use straight ruffles, hemmed and scant. Knots or bows of black velvet ribbon.

G.—The only address necessary for letters to be answered in this column is Harper's Bazar, New York city.

A. F. K.—Cadet midshipmen at the Naval Academy are officers of the government, and receive $500 and a ration per annum. It costs a successful candidate about $350 to procure the necessary outfit of uniform, etc., on entering the institution. The pay is sufficient to support the cadet during the full course, and to leave a small surplus at the expiration of the four years to procure the outfit necessary for an officer going to sea.

MISS C. S. M.—The Bazar in which the pattern sent you is illustrated contains the amount of goods necessary for the suit sent. About eighteen or twenty yards of ordinary width material are bought for a suit; but this depends, of course, on the trimming.

F. A. S.—We advise you not to line over-skirts. A large tournure should make the dress bouffant, and the fabric of the over-skirt should fall in graceful drapery, not stand out stiff with lining.

CAROLINE E.—Trim your Marseilles with white fringe and braid, or else with embroidered jaconet ruffles.

A. K.—The blue parasol will not be incongruous with pink and white or gray toilettes. Large blue umbrellas are worn by ladies with almost any costume. Your gray sample of crape barége will look prettiest beneath a white Swiss muslin polonaise; but one of black lace will also answer.

MAGGIE.—Use bias bands of green silk and knotted fringe of green and white for trimming the green dress, and ruffles of the fabric for the gray one.

OWYHEE.—Black twisted silk fringe, in thick bullion cords, will be prettier than llama fringe on your waterproof.

FRIEND.—From your description we think your grenadine is stylishly made, and not old-looking. Satin is not used for trimming, and passementerie and lace are often dispensed with, ruffles alone being used.

SIMPLE SIMON.—Tulle fichus are worn in the evening; Swiss muslin blouses in the afternoon. A pale rose-colored suit is pretty for country walks. Wear flowers in your hair in the house at any time of day, but they are not often worn at church or out-of-doors. Trained street suits should only be worn in a carriage.—A lady should thank a gentleman for the pleasure he has given her by escorting her to any place of amusement. It is possible for a lady to inform a gentleman without offense that she keeps early hours, and can not entertain him longer, as it is her hour for retiring.

MRS. M. F.—With the assistance of a copying wheel the patterns are easily taken from the Supplement.

DAB AT FASHION.—Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 31, Vol. IV. The chatelaine braids will continue the prevailing style for some time.

MULTITUDES of people require an alterative, to restore the healthy action of their systems and correct the derangements that creep into it. Sarsaparillas were used and valued until several impositions were palmed off upon the public under this name. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA is no imposition.—[Com.]

HALL'S Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer prevents the hair from turning gray, and restores hair to its natural color.—[Com.]

To have elegant, light Biscuits, Rolls, Buckwheat Cakes, Fruit Dumplings, etc., you should use Dooley's Yeast Powder. Ask your Grocer for it.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

HOTTENTOTS SEEN GATHERING BUCHU LEAVES AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE FOR H. T. HELMBOLD.

BUCHU.

[From Dispensatory of the United States.]

DIOSMA CRENATA—BUCHU LEAVES.

PROPERTIES.—Their odor is strong, diffusive, and somewhat aromatic; their taste bitterish and analogous to mint.

MEDICAL PROPERTIES AND USES.—Buchu leaves are gently stimulant, with a peculiar tendency to the Urinary Organs.

They are given in complaints of the Urinary Organs, such as Gravel, Chronic Catarrh of the Bladder, Morbid Irritation of the Bladder and Urethra, Disease of the Prostate Gland, and Retention or Incontinence of Urine, from a loss of tone in the parts concerned in its evacuation. The remedy has also been recommended in Dyspepsia, Chronic Rheumatism, Cutaneous Affections, and Dropsy.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Harper's Bazar at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

FACETIÆ.

WHY is a man searching for the philosopher's stone like Neptune?—Because he is a sea-king what never did exist.

ECONOMY FOR LADIES.—If you want a morning wrapper to last forever never wear it out.

If you're asked to take an egg, and won't, is that an egg-ative reply?

THE POOR MAN'S STORY—The garret.

Some lawyers can't sleep. They lie on one side, and turn over and lie on the other.

The sailor who knew for a fact that there was a man in the moon had been to sea.

FRUITY AND POINTED.—The epicurean who made a dessert of the fruits of an enterprise picked his teeth with the point of a joke.

It is a queer woman who asks no questions, but the woman who does is the querist.

An old Indian who had witnessed the effect of whisky for many years said a barrel labeled "whisky" contained a thousand songs and fifty fights.

THE BEST BAND TO ACCOMPANY A LADY VOCALIST—A hus-band.

Women do not talk more than men. They're listened to more, that is all.

Most people are glad to give their opinion. Lawyers usually sell theirs.

AN OBJECT OF INTEREST—Your deposit in a savings-bank.

Curious to say, most horse-owners, when in difficulties, prefer their grays to their duns.

A young swell of our acquaintance is so dreadfully fastidious that he is even measured for his umbrella.

Ballet-girls and geese are the animals that can stand the longest on one leg.

ADVICE TO FARMERS.—Thresh your corn as much as you think necessary, but don't pull its ears off—that's brutal.

Why is it that Mount Vesuvius never sleeps?—Because it is always yawning.

Lots of young ladies don't know the names of their best friends; some do not even know what their own names may be a year hence.

MAXIMS FOR THE PRUDENT.—Never throw a stone at any one until you have looked to see whether there is a window behind, or you may pay dearly for your revenge. Never leave your hat in the passage unless it is a bad one. Never be executor to a will, as it is all liability, great trouble, and no profit. Never quarrel with your wife, as you will only have to make it up, and pay for the reconciliation. Never mention you have received a legacy, or some impertinent fellow will be asking you to stand a dinner. Never pay to see a balloon go up, as you can see it much better by remaining outside.

1. Philosophy.
2. Natural Philosophy.
3. Want of philosophy. "Drat it! missed him!"
4. The wild animal at bay.
5. "Got him!—No!"
6. The vigorous onslaught.
7. A struggle for life.
8. The overthrow. The escape!
9. Philosophy worsted by a fly. Wisdom smiles.

A Boston grocer, who excited the ire of one of his customers by presenting at his house his bill for goods rendered, was waited upon soon after by a daughter of the debtor, who said, "I wish you wouldn't come with that bill when father's at home; it makes him nervous to be dunned." The grocer apologized.

Young ladies suffering from a pane in the side may relieve it by wearing a sash.

A WRIT OF ATTACHMENT—A marriage-certificate.

THE FUTURE STATE—San Domingo.

GOOD ADVICE.

Treat the injuries you receive as if they were borrowed umbrellas. Do not think of returning them. Revenge is not a paying game.

Should the wife of your bosom fly into a rage (as ladies will occasionally), and hurl a torrent of vituperative eloquence at you, light a cigar, take a pinch of snuff, trim your nails, glance over the advertisements in yesterday's paper, sit still and smile—do any thing but reply to her. You will be pleased with the result, even though she should faint.

"Honesty is the best policy," as a general rule; but there are exceptions to every rule, and, when you can do so without fear of detection, you make exceptions to that one.

Never speak ill of any one who may be of the slightest service to you, no matter how much you may dislike him. He might hear of it.

Buy in the cheapest market. Sell in the dearest. The number of children the workmen employed by you may have is nothing to you. The number you have yourself is.

HOW TO KEEP YOUR HEAD CLEAR—Shave every hair off.

What part of speech is kissing?—A conjunction.

If Eve was not a Fenian, she was at least the first rib on man.

"Where are you going?" said a Scotch gentleman to a thief, whom he observed crawling through a hole in the hedge into his garden. "Back again," replied the thief, as he hurriedly retreated.

One of the boys at our printer's is a sad character. When at work he does nothing but make pie; when he's at home he makes away with it.

Some of those women who are most afraid of lightning have hearts of steel.

When a wife reigns, it seems natural that she should storm too. She generally does.

It's your tall fellows who are luckiest in love. The ladies are all in favor of Hy-men.

THE WAY TO COMMAND RESPECT AND PLENTY OF ROOM IN A CROWD—Carry a pot of paint in each hand.

The following is the copy of a bill posted on a wall in a country village, "A lecture on total abstinence will be delivered in the open air, and a collection will be taken at the door to defray expenses."

While a vendor of greens in Boston, last week, was endeavoring to dispose of his stock in trade, his poor old nag balked, and refused to budge an inch. The driver finally commenced belaboring the animal with a stick, when an old lady thrust her head out of a window and exclaimed, "Have you no mercy?"

"No, ma'am," replied the peddler; "nothing but greens."

PASTE FOR WALL-PAPER.

A NEW form of paste for attaching paper-hangings to walls, and one which, besides possessing the merit of cheapness, has the advantage of preventing the paper from separating or peeling off, is prepared by first softening eighteen pounds of finely powdered bole in water, and then draining off the surplus water from the mass. One and a quarter pounds of glue are next to be boiled into glue-water, and the bole and two pounds of gypsum are then stirred in, and the whole mass forced through a sieve by means of a brush. This is afterward diluted with water to the condition of a thin paste or dressing, when it is ready for use. This paste is not only much cheaper than the ordinary flour paste, but it has the advantage of adhering better to whitewashed surfaces, especially to walls that have been coated over several times, and

CROQUET.

BY JOHN G. NICOLAY.

How I rue the day when I played croquet!
That game with the traps of wire,
With the fancy mauls, and the rolling balls,
Lost me my heart's desire.
I'm beat by a blonde, that festive Hal
Called witching Jenny Lake,
Who wore more stripes on her balmoral
Than shone on the painted stake.

She played croquet with a winning way,
This damsel young and fair;
With a smile so cute, and a high-heeled boot,
And a rose in her floating hair;
Such trills of song, and such bursts of mirth,
All for my own sweet sake,
Till I thought a rainbow touched the earth
Where she stood by the painted stake.

I fell in love like a turtle-dove,
And cooed and wooed her well;
But I fell in hate at her croquet mate,
And called him a cheeky swell.
If he had not been, what did he mean
Such a liberty to take
As to steal a kiss, and insult the miss
Till she blushed like the painted stake?

Ah! the game's all up, and my bitter cup
Is filled by a frowning fate;
For at church to-day, so the papers say,
She married the man I hate.
For that beaming blonde in the balmoral,
For treacherous Jenny Lake,
With a heart of ire in a martyr-fire
I burn at the painted stake.

A NEW STORY BY WILKIE COLLINS.

In a few days we shall commence the publication, in HARPER'S WEEKLY, of the new serial story,

"POOR MISS FINCH,"

BY

WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "The Moonstone," "Man and Wife," etc.

Mr. COLLINS stands in the foremost rank of living novelists, and the present story, which will be printed from advance sheets, is one of the most brilliant and fascinating efforts of his genius.

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of an Infant's Wardrobe, consisting of Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke, Slip, Night-Gown, Petticoat, and Shirt, will be published with our next Number. For full list of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 543 of this Number.

THE CRIMP.

IS the crimp destroying our civilization? The question, which at the first instant sounds so simply absurd, was asked the other day, in a lively conversation, with great earnestness; and the answer was then and there declared so emphatically to be in the affirmative that a pitiful vision rose before the eye of those maidens at their sea-side and mountain resorts who invite each other into their rooms for a social crimp and a gossip of the day's events before retiring to the world of dreams, as unconscious of the great civic undermining of which they are guilty as are those ants who eat out the foundations of the South American cities.

The crimp, be it known to any pardonably ignorant reader, is the result of a curious compressing machine, a thing of night and mystery, consisting of long, pointed steel pins, round which the front hair is tightly wound close to the head and confined by a sliding clasp. The wearer of this little machine endures a broken sleep until she has discovered which phrenological development accommodates the pressure least painfully; she becomes a dangerous, not to say murderous, bedfellow; she is usually invisible to her acquaintances in the morning, or if seen then she is an unknown quantity at noon, and is supposed upon damp days to have no existence at all; she tears out by the roots the greater part of the tress committed to the steel embrace, and breaks off the remainder at a bristly length, which it takes the growth of a year or two to remedy. But she is in the fashion; and, when her toilette is made, her forehead is by daylight and lamp-light surrounded by a nimbus of threaded gold or a shadow of raveled darkness, so to say, that gives her whole face, be it ever so plain, an inexpressible softness almost amounting to beauty in itself, and well worth the sacrifice, if that were all the sacrifice. Indeed, nothing can be lovelier than any of these blooming young creatures in the blending and shadowing and other worshipful effect of the crimp, that, robbing all harshness from the outlines underneath that haze of hair, is to the flush of the cheek what the bloom is to the grape or the moss to the rose—

> "One shade the more, one ray the less,
> Had half impaired the nameless grace
> Which waves in every raven tress
> Or softly lightens o'er her face."

But when we see the same deific chevelure on the married matron, though its personal effect may be quite as charming, we are, nevertheless, conscious that a disenchanted husband has celebrated the oblation of his illusions and idealities with the awful rites and incantations of this new Medean process which has given his wife her lovely appearance of youth; and we are fain to remember the matrons of certain Eastern tribes, who, with the marriage-ring, are invested also with a horn and veil, or undergo a shortening and blackening of the teeth, or some other disfigurement or mutilation that shall kill vanity and self-seeking in the bud; and recalling, moreover, the legend of one of King Arthur's knights, who had the choice of his wife's seeming a beldam to himself by night and a beauty to the world by day, or the contrary, we might almost think the golden days had come again, and all the knights now had that privilege.

But in all seriousness, and apart from any extravagance, it is just here that the question of the crimp widens into one of broad domestic interest — one affecting not only the happiness of homes, but the existence of homes. Lucretia, a matron of that great middle class which makes our population, independently of the excrescences of the very rich or the very poor, must crimp her hair because Tarpeia crimps hers, and then because it is so beautifying. Beautifying to whose gaze? we might ask. Certainly not to her husband's, must be replied; for he is obliged to see a creature horned and knobbed as the sacred cow confront him during the greater part of his hours at home. Those hideous protuberances over each temple were the last things he saw ere turning down the light at night; they are the first that catch his eye at sunrise; they are stamped upon his departing retina as he leaves the house for his daily task. He must have his breakfast before he goes, of course; most likely there is no one but Lucretia to prepare it—Lucretia, whose culinary skill is doubtless all it should be. Tarquin's wife breakfasts in her room alone, or has some dainty device of lace and muslin to bind over her hair and hide its condition, or has a maid to crimp it freshly when needed, or wears her hat to table with false crimps sewed in; but Lucretia's lot in life is different. If Lucretia takes down her hair, and goes about her hot work, the hair will be as straight as flax in half an hour; besides, she has no time to take it down, to pick it out thread by thread, to shake it into place, to bind it with its necessary combs and ribbons. But then, if she is going to pour coffee with her head looking like a "hooraw's nest," a clean collar or any collar would be but a burlesque upon it. A sense of the eternal fitness of things restrains her from putting on a collar. If she had put on a collar she would have been ashamed of a soiled gown. As it is, you see, the crimp has reached down its filaments like the fibres of some subtile disease, and has corrupted all the economy of her household. If it were not for the crimp her hair would be smoothly brushed; she would have a bit of linen at her throat; her gown would be as clean as circumstances allowed; the children would be inviting, even if they made themselves so by scrubbing a polish on their rosy cheeks. But it would be ridiculous for Lucretia, in the light of her own example, to insist that the little ones should have neat pinafores, and faces or heads like any thing but mops and door-mats; and if the table is too well set, will it not be a travesty on those around it? Such household gods, we must needs confess, are unlikely to be so sacred as to prevent the bicker and quarrel, or so enticing that their proprietor should hasten home to them at night; and if he does not feel sick at heart and disgusted with his experience of domestic life, it is because the poverty of his imagination suggests nothing better. In how much he does his share of duty is not at present a subject of consideration. Something has always to be taken for granted.

Too much familiarity breeds contempt, runs the old maxim. Lucretia wrote it in her copy-book at school till its up strokes and down strokes should have been engraved upon her heart; but, neglecting the lesson, a stern teacher is to make her master it now. When the ugly chrysalis of the morning—which she was—becomes the brilliant butterfly of the afternoon, the processes are still too fresh in her husband's mind to be enrapturing. By-and-by, with the corroding work of days and months, he finds that the name of wife has lost its old spell. The girl he wooed is a memory; the woman he has won is something to make the best of. He misses all the romance out of marriage. If he is one sort of man he turns to the ale-shop and politics; if another, he finds a charmer in some place where he is never admitted except to find it charming, a place whose mistress never sees him in her crimping-pins.

But, after all, the crimp, be it said, is a mere figure of speech for the morning slattern, and the morning slattern is too frequent an apparition to be overlooked—is becoming, in fact, an element of our social being. Is it true that modern civilization demands so much from a woman that she can not keep herself attractive, her children clean, her house pleasant, and her food properly prepared unless there should be twenty-five hours in the twenty-four? In order to make home what it should be, and to keep husbands out of mischief, must the multitude of women settle into mere drudges, discontented and tired, indifferent to personal appearances, with minds vacant of improvement from book or newspaper, till, harassed and worn down and ungratified, they sink into their welcome graves? If this be so, it is time for a new crusade and a new emancipation of slaves. And in the light of certain statistics which tell us that the majority of young men no longer marry, see no attraction in the homes they come from to encourage them to assume the responsibilities of new ones, but content themselves with establishments where the rose-colored side is all they ever see, and from which, when grown distasteful, they can at any moment set themselves free — in this melancholy light, the sooner the deliverance comes the better, whether the slavery be that of men's appetites or women's follies.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Sea Bathing.

MY DEAR JOB,—So you were surprised and a little pained that I could go to the sea-side and remember only Sam Borax and certain petty annoyances when I returned. But who told you that I remembered only what I mentioned? I said, indeed, that there were groups of children bathing in the surf, but there were others who were not children who bathed also. But I confess there is something awful in sea bathing. The sense of committing yourself to that illimitable power even upon its mere edges is overwhelming. It seems as alive along the edges as any where. Those swelling breakers that plunge and slide sparkling up the beach, then draw back again with that hurrying, confused rattle of the shingle, as if the secret, monstrous force of the sea were striving to suck the earth into its depths, have sometimes an uncanny life to my eye and mind. The undertow that tugs at my venerable legs touches my imagination also. Good Heavens! whither? Mysterious and mighty force that pluckest so sturdily at my nether extremities, to what dim, dreadful, slimy abysses of sea-snakes and jellied monsters wouldst thou hale this puny victim?

The evil fancy passes, and then as the huge breakers roll upon me and rush far beyond, so that I seem swiftly drifting out to sea, it is the very benediction of health that I feel, and the strength and sweetness and coolness of the very brine permeates my frame. As I stand half submerged, shining, dripping, gasping, I jump up and down, I shout aloud. The exclamation is unintelligible, but if you were walking on the cliff and beheld what would seem to you a probably demented and certainly rather ridiculous elderly gentleman in the surf, and if for a moment you were the Finecar of fairy, you would hear him saying, "The ocean purifies me; I shall emerge a cleaner and a better man." Yet as I jump and shout and turn my eyes seaward I am confounded by reflecting that it is the same water which bears those distant ships that condescends to exhilarate me, and that the very element in which I stand stretches unchanged and without barrier to the isles of Greece, and softly laves the Polynesian shores.

My bath is inconceivably stimulating and invigorating. Heart, mind, and soul, as well as body, have shared in the inspiration, and as again I gaze shoreward, while breaker after breaker slides over my rounded opposing back, I observe a jaded citizen, whom I have often seen in the streets busily making his living, standing clad in his garments of the sea at the door of the bathing-house, and contemplating the water. How much of himself a man takes off with his clothes!—how much, at least, of the self that we know! Do you remember Thackeray's droll drawing of Louis the Fourteenth, the Grand Monarque, with his wig and lace and padding removed? What a tribute to the power of the human imagination, that a little embroidery and stuffing should be made by it the symbol of greatness! If Canute had sat upon the beach on one of those chairs from the bathing-house, and in the simple royal robes that Nature supplies to all of us, do you think the courtiers could possibly have suggested that the sea would retire at his bidding? Why, my dear Job, King Canute in extreme undress looked as I did when I was jumping and rejoicing in the water; and was I, or is my friend the jaded citizen in his garments of the sea at the door of his bathing-house yonder, an imposing figure?

But see! he is descending like a merman to his element. What would Broadway think of him now? And do you observe that, as he has always an air of owning the whole city when you meet him upon the pavement, he now steps across the gravel and the sand as if he were the proprietor of the ocean, and just about dipping into his private bath-tub? And now, lo! he quickens his pace, he runs; the inspiration seizes him also, and swiftly advancing, he joyfully plunges his head into the enormous billow, and emerges, beyond, a new creature. I have seen him often and often, but never before did he seem to me really to enjoy. He throws himself upon the water, and strikes out as if he were heading for the Azores or Madagascar. There is nothing except the shining plain between him and those far shores. The little bald-headed citizen, who came so tired from the city, seems the master of this awful force, which tugged mysteriously at my venerable legs, but which yields submissive to his lusty arms. And when he abandons the voyage to Madagascar, and turns once more to the nearer coast, how easily he reaches out his arms alternately, as if pulling himself ashore! He is refreshed and renewed. He is plainly the Antæus of the sea, and needs but to touch it to be restored to every power. I watch him with admiration, and I think with gratitude of the kind care that provides the ocean to quicken the weary sons of earth.

And do you see, my dear Job, this terrible ocean, which tears armadas to pieces and swallows vast hosts of men, which in its storms is the most pitiless and powerful of giants, now touches with gentle kisses the feet of those little children, who shout and dance as they feel its cool, moist lips, but who can not trust it despite its innocent play? They run in to their knees, and as the water slips up the sand they, too, seem to be slipping outward, and they hurry, gasping and terrified, to the shore. They meet the returning water, retiring under their feet and leaving them standing, bewildered, upon the firm black beach. They chase the retiring water-line, and once more fly as it turns to play with them. I am sure that I do not know how long I should have staid in the sea watching and thinking, fascinated and awe-struck, if I had not observed that the tide was rapidly falling. So I, too, emerged from my bath, and presently climbed the cliff, but did not walk away. I seated myself in one of the little houses, where I could still see the surf and yield to the power which still inthralled me.

The citizen was already gone, but from that moment I observed him wherever we met, and he was a new man. If he had arranged his affairs, and made his will, and packed his trunk, and, with many fond farewells, had gone at great expense to Europe, and after a tour of enchantments had returned, he could not have been more wholly renewed in health and spirits than he was by his daily ocean bath. His eye brightened, his cheek was ruddy-hued, his step was light, his blood was electrified, he seemed, as all people in good health seem, happy.

"What a pity," said his cousin to me, "that he can not take his ocean bath with him to town!"

"It would be a great pity if he could not," I answered.

"Yes," replied his cousin; "but Congress-water in bottles is not Congress-water from the spring."

The band struck up, and his cousin walked away. But I was very sure that we could all take the sea with us if we chose, and by no means in pails or in jugs. If that busy citizen, when his daily duties are done, would ask, as Goethe asked, for a great thought, if he would read only the great books which are the works of great genius, and if during the day he would trust himself to great and generous emotions and principles, he would be so perpetually refreshed that it would not occur to him to go to the sea-side, because he would feel as if he lived there, and dipped daily in the ocean. You see, my dear Job, that puddles of brackish and tepid water are never refreshing nor inspiring. But the books that so many of us read, and the range of thoughts and feelings to which we accustom ourselves, are, in comparison with the great books and the noble emotions, what the puddles are to the ocean. It is a very pitiful truth, but it is a truth, that what passes for worldly wisdom is suspicion and a mean opinion of other men. The counsel of the world to the young man is, "My son, believe that every body is selfish and wishes to get the better of you." Now a man could as reasonably live upon a diet of choke-cherries and expect to be well as live in such a faith and expect to be morally fresh and sound. Men are very much what you make them—that is to say, what you expect them to be, as Mr. Fiske says in his paper upon were-wolves, that those who acted like beasts came to believe that they were so. If you expect a man to be mean, he will probably seem to you to be so. For however generous he may really be, through your mask of mean expectation you can not discover it.

Now, my dear boy, if you will accustom your mind to liberal and lofty ideas, to a habit of seeing the best and not the worst in other people, in one word, to that mood which thinketh no evil, you will be sea-born every day. You will emerge from night and sleep as my citizen came from his bath, sweet and invigorated. Believe me, there is something very much worse than being cheated, and that is the feeling that every body wants to cheat you. And if you observe closely you will find that the happiest people of your acquaintance are not those who always make the sharpest bargains, and who always expect to be taken in if they are not on the alert, but those who deal unsuspiciously, and who care more for their own self-respect than for the kind of respectability that riches buy.

As there are books that we can never read without a sense of the limitless ocean, a feeling of infinite depth and power, an impression of entire refreshment and renewal, as if the cool salt billows had gone over us, so there are persons whose presence and influence are no less invigorating and inspiring. Like Venus, flower of the sea-spray, goddess of beauty and of love, so are they, in force and freshness, ocean-born. They bring with them the renewing breath, the odors blown from the spicy isles, the thought of strange and awful powers, the splendor and the calm, and the Gulf Stream pouring through the colder depths of sea a current of warmth as from the heart of the universe. Contact with them, my dear Job, is the best kind of sea bathing, for it makes us more and more like themselves. It was of such influences, open to all of us on every side, that I was thinking when I said that the citizen might carry his sea bathing to town. Try it, Job, and justify

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FALL IMPORTATIONS.

FAILLE.

THE great warehouses down town are receiving new goods. Lyons silk imported for fall and winter is called faille. It is simply gros grain, soft and lustreless, with smaller cords than that of last year. Thick reps are objected to, as they break when folded, catch the dust easily, and soon become rusty. Black faille has rather less blue tinge than has been used of late, but is not yet a full deep black, and its lustre is very slight. The effort to bring glossy taffeta silk into fashion has again failed. For day dresses there are "cloth colors" so dark that they barely escape being black, while evening silks are as pale as possible without being white. In rich fabrics a sheet of solid color, clear, pure, and admirably brought out, is preferred to any design of figures. Silks of three tones of a color are imported for a single costume. Nicest gradations of shades are obtained by color artists in French manufactories by submitting the three pieces of silk to the same dye. The darkest silk is dyed first, then the color bath is weakened for the second shade, and still further weakened for the third. The tones then harmonize, and there is no danger of thrusting together a rosy brown and a yellow-brown, a bluish-gray and one with pink tints, the beauty of each being destroyed by the other.

Among the richest failles the first dark hue quoted for costumes is marine blue, of which three shades are furnished: the darkest is for the under-skirt of the costume, the lightest for the polonaise, and the intermediate shade will appear in the trimming. Then comes noyer, or walnut-color, rich sombre brown tints that will blend beautifully in winter suits; cendres, more severe than the soft ashes-of-rose shade formerly seen, is also in three tones; Russian gray, refined blue-gray shades—the first exceedingly dark, and the third as light as French gray; tourterelle, the familiar dove grays; feutre, or felt, a series of drab shades; cinéraire, lovely red-purple hues—the lightest like Humboldt purple, the darkest almost wine-color; Van Dyck, the dark oil brown beloved by the great artist; cypress, three darkest green shades, scarcely removed from black; of lie, well named for the lees of wine, there are but two shades (as the lighter verges on crimson, a third tint would be too red to be acceptable); prune blue, in favor with blondes, is mazarine tinged with gray; scabieuse is the rich dahlia-color introduced last winter; fumée is London smoke, the deepest gray, very sérieux, as the French say. There is no brilliancy to these shades, as they are made only in rich fabrics. Noyer and cendres are the colors that we fancy will best please fastidious tastes.

The pale tints for evening dresses are also brought out in harmonious shades, though seldom more than two tints are seen. Indienne is the delicate blue seen in Oriental fabrics; sylphide is faint gray without pearl shading; azalea is a pink lilac, so pale that it is almost white; rose-frais is like the inner petals of blush roses; the cool pink lavender, called peach-blow, is a most acceptable shade; newest lavenders are fairly tinged with blue; water green is as pale as the Nile shade without being overshadowed with gray; faille for wedding toilettes is a rich creamy white, instead of that made poor-looking by blue shading; tea-rose, pearl, and Frou Frou are repeated from last year.

Poult de soie antique, an unwatered moiré of rich double chain, far heavier than faille, is brought out in all the evening colors.

BROCADED FAILLE.

An elegant novelty is brocaded faille for over dresses to be worn with trains of plain faille. The evening colors just mentioned are brought out in this beautiful material. The ground matches the train in color, and the brocade is a Pompadour bouquet of many colors, or else shaded buds of one color. Two tints blend charmingly in this way. An India blue figure is most artistically wrought on a pearl ground; wood brown on Isabelle, a sort of flesh tint; lilac is on clear silver, and water green is on Isly, a new darker green. It is a matter of caprice about arranging broché costumes, as the train may be brocaded and the casaque plain, or the order may be reversed, but it is necessary that one hue prevails throughout.

LOW-PRICED SILKS.

Low-priced silks, to be sold as nearly as possible to a dollar a yard, have black grounds with double-shaded stripes in satin reps. Of these it is predicted that the brown stripes will be most fashionable, and the range of shades is very wide, beginning with pale blondine, salmon, maize, and continuing through bronze and marron (chestnut) to the Bismarck that met the eye every where a few seasons ago.

ARMURE SILKS.

Very rich armure silks are stylishly worn in Europe, but have not met with favor here. New patterns, called Renaissance armure, of intricate curved designs, may make it more popular. Elegant suits are fashioned of this in bronze, dove gray, and marine blue shades. Diamond armures, the pattern in tiniest diamonds, is shown in a few evening colors, rich rose-frais, water green, cerise, and batiste, the last a pale buff, the color of unbleached raw silk. For costumes there are armure reps of one color for the skirt, and striped armure of two harmonizing shades for the over dress.

CHEVIOTTES.

The novelty perhaps most worthy of notice is Cheviotte, a soft silk with heavy twill, like the diagonal ribs of the Scotch Cheviots worn by gentlemen. It is all pure silk, not highly dressed, drapes gracefully, and will doubtless make a most serviceable costume. It is designed for street suits, and rivals armure in popular favor abroad. Chocolate, wood, and bronze shades are brought out.

PEKIN.

Another novelty in expensive goods is called pékin. It has a satin ground of light shade, with darker stripes of velvet of very heavy pile. It costs $12 a yard, and is for parts of costumes, skirts probably, and for trimming. It is in the cloth shades only. A simpler fabric, also called pékin, a soft silk with satin stripes, is for overskirts of dinner dresses. The colors are Mexico blue, mouse gray, peach-blossom, lilac, and pale eglantine.

FAILLE CASHMERE.

The Oriental fabric called faille cashmere was mentioned last week. It is a thick repped stuff, silk alone appearing on the surface, but the cord is fine wool. It is too heavy for entire costumes, but will be used as upper skirts and polonaises over brocades and plain faille. The price is $10 a yard, the width fifty-six inches. It is imported in shades to match the other new goods, and in black and white.

LÉVANTINE.

The fancy for soft goods that drape gracefully has restored lévantine, a fabric dear to Quakers, and well known to fastidious ladies of the olden time. It is extremely soft, is all silk, of light quality, and has beneath its smooth surface an almost invisible twill. It is for entire costumes, and is in quiet dark colors, such as prune, deep-sea blue, myrtles, acanthe (like olive), and ours, or bear-color. Repped lévantine, the reps up and down like those of empress cloth, is also shown in dark colors.

MOSCOVITE.

Among corded fabrics is Moscovite, wide flat cords of satin surface on silk. This is highly appreciated abroad. Another is velvetine grisaille, alternate cords of black and white, forming a gray mixture. It is twenty-four inches wide, and will make elegant suits.

A new stuff for trimming wool costumes is a heavy reps of cotton and silk, the latter all thrown on the surface. It is black, with a ray of color matching the costume on which it appears.

PRICES.

All silks, and especially black silks, have advanced in price abroad, but there will probably be very little increase of price here, as most of next season's silks were ordered at war prices.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

A RACY correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, writing about past and present "goings on" at "MOON'S" at Saratoga, in answer to the question, "Who has given the biggest dinner here in twenty years?" replied: "Well, WATTS SHERMAN, of DUNCAN, SHERMAN, & Co.; thirty-six in the party, and cost $3000. Madame RUSH was one of the party. My wife was in her prime then, and, Lord! you ought to have seen that dinner—hot-house grapes, Johannisberger, Roman punch!—and MOON held up both hands like a great V, while his eyes hung out in a state of wondering bewilderment."

—Prince SCHEMIDZN INGOI arrived in this city on the 27th ult., having in charge twenty-nine young Japanese nobles, who came here to learn how to do it before endeavoring to do it in the State Department of Japan. The prince was educated in this country, is about thirty, speaks English perfectly, and enjoys in a high degree the confidence of the emperor.

—Among those who have recently deceased in this vicinity may be mentioned Mr. CHARLES DYKE, at East New York. Mr. DYKE was well known sixty-four years ago as assistant-engineer on FULTON'S steamer, the Clermont, which first steamed on the Hudson, from New York to Albany.

—A young American, Master WILLIS SHELTON, of New Haven, Connecticut, son of a gentleman of fortune, is now in England for the purpose of improving himself on the organ. His extraordinary ability has quite stirred up the people of Brighton, and he was about to proceed to London to show the pretenders in that metropolis what the capabilities of the instrument really are.

—The will of the late Marquis of Hertford, soon to be submitted for probate, excites a flutter of anxiety among the haut ton of London and Paris. It is known that the marquis bequeathed his personalty and his Irish estates, valued at $250,000 a year, to Mr. WALLACE, whose recent deeds of benevolence in Paris are worthy to be placed by those of PEABODY in London and the United States. Why this fortune should have been given to Mr. WALLACE is a mystery. Some say he is the marquis's son; others that he is the son of the late marquis's father, the Lord Steyne of THACKERAY'S "Vanity Fair." As heir of the personalty he comes into possession of many of the rarest pictures in Europe.

—President LINCOLN'S valuable gold-headed cane, given to him in 1851 by JOHN A. M'CLERNAND, and by Mr. LINCOLN'S family to the late Rev. Dr. SMITH, of Springfield, Illinois, has, in accordance with Mr. LINCOLN'S wishes, been given to JOHN BRIGHT. In Dr. SMITH'S will the following clause was inserted: "I give, devise, and bequeath unto JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., member of the British House of Commons, and to his heirs, the gold-mounted staff, or cane, which belonged to the deceased President LINCOLN of the United States, and presented to me by the deceased's widow and family as a mark of the President's respect, which staff is to be kept and used as an heir-loom in the family of the said JOHN BRIGHT, as a token of the esteem which the late President felt for him because of his unwearied zeal and defense of the United States in suppressing the civil rebellion of the Southern States."

—Mrs. D. P. BOWERS, the tragedienne, having refused $75,000 for her property on Drexel Boulevard, Chicago, proposes to buy a cottage at Long Branch, which is the home of many actors and actresses—some wealthy, others "well off," none poor. LESTER WALLACK, EDWIN BOOTH, Mr. M'VICKAR, and the husband of Mrs. HOEY are quite rich. JAMES W. WALLACK has a fine old mansion and seventy acres of land, worth at any moment $150,000 cash. F. S. CHANFRAU and EDWIN ADAMS have fine places, and are "forehanded" and thrifty. Also pleasant.

—Lord BROUGHAM, writing of his maternal grandmother, said he owed to her all his success in life; and he adds: "Remarkable for beauty, but far more for a masculine intellect and clear understanding, she instilled into me from my cradle the strongest desire for information, and the first principles of that persevering energy in the pursuit of every kind of knowledge which, more than any natural talents I may possess, has enabled me to stick to and to accomplish every task I ever undertook." So much for the worth and work of one strong-minded woman.

—The present legal adviser of the French legation at Washington is the Marquis of Chambrun, whose wife is a granddaughter of LAFAYETTE. He is soon coming North for a vacation, and if he will run up to Mount Vernon, Westchester County, on the New York and New Haven Railroad, he can be shown the house where his wife's patriotic grandpapa was introduced to the noble G. WASHINGTON.

—M. CAPOUL, who is to be the tenor of the NILSSON opera troupe, is said to have a voice very rich and well trained. He is, moreover, very handsome, and parts his hair in the middle, but his style is not effeminate. He has made a great sensation in "Faust" and in "Rigoletto." Since MARIO and TAMBERLIK have gone out CAPOUL promises to become the operatic tenor of Europe. He comes here in his early prime, not when his powers have begun to fade. Another new tenor for the NILSSON troupe is Mr. CHARLES LYALL, who has sung in Italian opera here with good success. Besides being a clever singer, Mr. LYALL is very skillful with his pencil. He has recently made a series of inimitably droll caricatures of all the leading singers of the day, giving their peculiarities of appearance in a pronounced but by no means offensive manner. PATTI is taken in her part of Caterina in "L'Etoile du Nord." LUCCA is a wonderful success in this series; and NILSSON'S sentimentality of style is so humorously exaggerated that its effect is irresistibly comic.

—Owing to the nefarious proceedings of his business manager, LISZT, the pianist, proposes to give concerts again in the various countries of Europe, and may, perhaps, come to the United States.

—We doubt if ever there was a more eccentric person than that man FARQUHAR M'KENZIE, a Scotchman, who died recently in Castleton, near Thurso. More than thirty years ago he took to his bed through religious excitement, and in course of time his body assumed such an abnormal condition that the slightest cold affected him in a most painful manner. The air had as far as possible to be excluded from his bed, his hands had to be kept gloved, and his only communication with friends who visited him was through a pane of glass fastened in the curtains. With all this he appeared to be quite in possession of his senses, and by many persons was regarded as a kind of oracle.

—The world at large may expect to hear from Newport often during the present season, judging from the number of newspaper writers and literary people at that resort. Fanny Fern (Mrs. PARTON) is boarding at friend MITCHELL'S, overlooking the sea, and sending pretty things about the "Emerald Isle" in her own inimitable style to the Ledger. Miss TUCKER, who writes about art in New York in the winter, is at the Ocean House for the summer, sending spicy things to the New York papers. Colonel HIGGINSON, that most petted of all authors by the ladies, puts his enthusiasm on paper, and does much for Newport. BRET HARTE saunters about town, evidently "laying off" at present. LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON is down by the sea, occasionally contributing something about Newport to the city press. "H. H." (HELEN HUNT), of Atlantic fame, is in a quiet boarding-house, seeking rest and retirement. "Margery Deane" (Mrs. PITMAN) is doing the report for the Evening Post, and is seen daily on the avenue, driving a spirited pair of little black ponies. JULIA WARD HOWE is in a cottage of her own a few miles from the city. CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN, Miss NILSSON, MARY CLEMMER AMES, and other lights, are spending August at that watering-place.

—The Princess FREDERICK CHARLES, of Prussia, laments the death of her parent, the late Duke of Anhalt. But she was not left indigent. Four million two hundred thousand dollars was the sum he bequeathed to her.

—It is worth while to "come of age" when one can do it as has just been done the other day in England, when the young Earl of Pembroke attained his majority. The earl represents the ancient and very distinguished Saxon family of the HERBERTS. He is quite delicate, having passed several years in Australia for the benefit of his health. No Earl of Pembroke has ever enjoyed such wealth as this young man, since, in addition to his broad acres—worth some $200,000 a year—in England, and the accumulations of his minority, he has a princely income from Ireland. This came about in a somewhat remarkable way. About forty years ago there lived at Mount Merrion, near Dublin, a certain eccentric Viscount Fitzwilliam. He had but one near relation, and this person unluckily offended him by some very trivial act—coming down late for dinner, or something as slight. Lord Fitzwilliam had, however, a distant cousin in the person of Lord Pembroke, grandfather of the present peer, and one day Lord Pembroke received a letter stating that his kinsman was ill, and besought his presence. Lord Pembroke replied that he could not then immediately leave England, but would come as soon as possible. Presently there came another letter from Ireland. Lord Fitzwilliam was dead, and had bequeathed to Lord Pembroke his estate, with remainder to the son of his (second) marriage, to the daughter of WORONZOW, the Russian embassador. This property comprises the Merrion Square and the most fashionable part of Dublin, and is worth $250,000 a year, without any fear of being shot.

—Note the energy with which Mrs. A. J. DUMWAY seizes her pen to write her introductory editorial in The New Northwest, an organ of public opinion which she has set in motion in Portland, Oregon:

"We have served a regular apprenticeship at working—washing, scrubbing, patching, darning, ironing, plain sewing, raising babies, milking, churning, and poultry-raising. We have kept boarders, taught school, taught music, written for the newspapers, made speeches, and carried on an extensive millinery and dress-making business. We can prove by the public that this work has been well done. Now, having reached the age of thirty-six, and having brought up a family of boys to set type, and a daughter to run the millinery store, we propose to edit and publish a newspaper; and we intend to establish it as one of the permanent institutions of the country."

—And in this wise did Mr. OLIVER JOHNSON, formerly of the Independent, comb out the "dander" from the brethren of the orthodox church in Peacham, Vermont. Last summer Mr. J. visited that home of his boyhood, and found a quarrel brewing among the elect. This pained Mr. J., and he resolved to bring about a reconciliation. Accordingly, he sought an opportunity to say a few kindly words to the congregation at the close of the afternoon service, in which he told them of his sorrow at the differences that had arisen, and promised them that if they would make an end of their strife, agree in employing a minister, and prepare their meeting-house to receive it, he would make them a present of a good organ. The proffer was received in the spirit in which it was made, the quarrel ceased, the church edifice has been repaired, the people have united in the choice of a minister, and an excellent organ, costing $1350, and abundantly answering the needs of the little church, will be put in the place prepared for it on the 1st of September. By this graceful and generous act Mr. JOHNSON has helped to preserve a Christian church from division and shame.

—Speaking of ladies whose thorough breeding and charm of manner impresses one at first sight, a recent writer says: "'Do what you will, you never can be so thorough a lady as I am,' was the impression made upon me by the sweet humility, the plain dress, the almost forlorn surroundings, of Mrs. CUSTIS, the former mistress of Arlington. It was more what she did not do, the absence of effort coupled with the desire to make you happy, the thorough breeding, the self-abnegation, the graceful dignity, that made this lady a duchess in her faded realm. Such breeding and such manners as hers are not within the reach of every one—they are partly natural gifts—but the virtues which led to them are to be cultivated by every body with some hope of success. Miss SEDGWICK was one of these wonderfully well-bred women. No woman in America was more famous than she in her prime, and she had much of the grace, with little of the formality, of those 'old-school' manners in which she must have been trained. Flattery never turned her head; she was humble and modest as a village girl, graceful and courtly as Madame De Sévigné. Her manner of introducing two persons has never been surpassed; she made them both feel honored and distinguished. Her attitude of listening was in itself a compliment, and to the very last she maintained a charm beyond beauty—the charm of perfect manners."

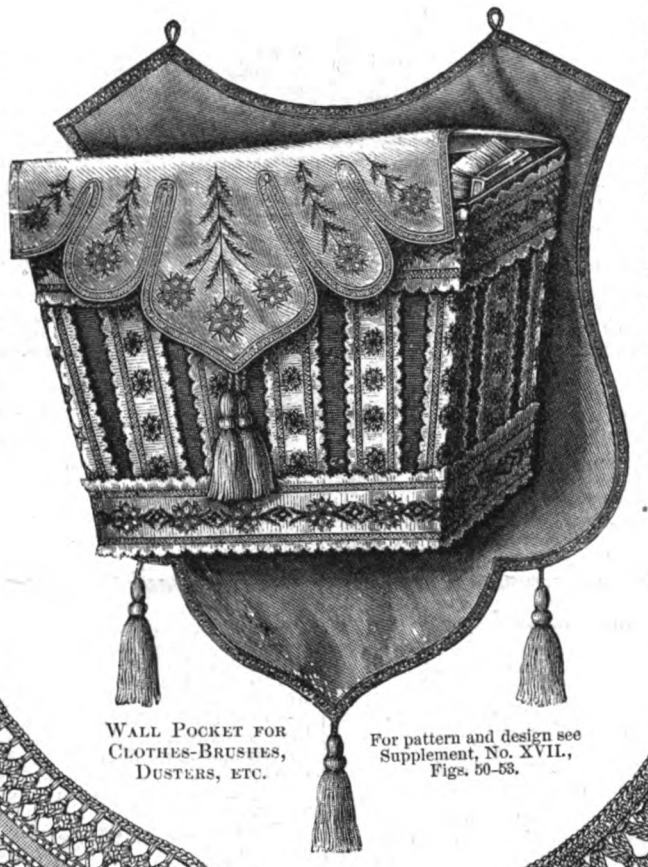
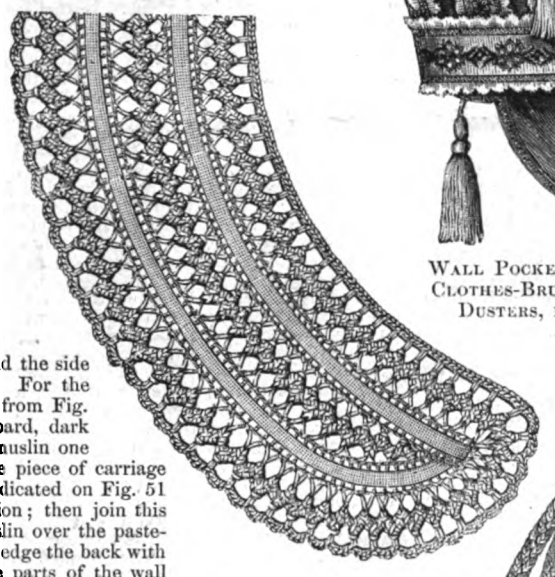
Wall Pocket for Clothes-Brushes, Dusters, etc.

THIS wall pocket will be found useful as a receptacle for clothes-brushes, dusters, ironing utensils, and various articles needed for daily family use. The material for the cover and the embroidery is chosen according to the purpose for which the wall pocket is designed. The original is made of pasteboard covered with carriage leather in two shades of gray, and ornamented in point Russe embroidery with Saxony wool of various colors. Cut, first, of pasteboard two four-cornered pieces each nine inches and three-quarters high, thirteen inches and a quarter wide at the top, and ten inches and three-quarters wide at the bottom; then two pieces for the sides each nine inches and three-quarters high and four inches and a half wide; and, finally, for the bottom one piece ten inches and three-quarters long and four inches and a half wide. These pieces are covered on the outside with dark gray carriage leather, and on the other side with gray muslin, and are then sewed together. Next ornament the front and the side pieces of the wall pocket, as shown by the illustration, with narrow strips of light gray carriage leather, which are pinked on both sides and ornamented with embroidery. Fig. 52, Supplement, gives part of a strip with design. The length of the strips is regulated to suit the depth of the wall pocket; the latter is ornamented at the upper and under edge with a wider strip; Fig. 53, Supplement, gives part of this strip. For the flap of the wall pocket cut of light gray carriage leather one piece from Fig. 51, Supplement, work the design indicated on the pattern on this piece, line it with muslin, and border the under scalloped edge and the side edges with fine gray cord. For the back of the wall pocket cut from Fig. 50, Supplement, of pasteboard, dark gray carriage leather, and muslin one piece each. Embroider the piece of carriage leather in point Russe as indicated on Fig. 51 and shown by the illustration; then join this piece with the piece of muslin over the pasteboard interlining. Finally, edge the back with fine gray cord, and sew the parts of the wall pocket previously joined on the back as partly indicated and shown by the illustration. Sew cord loops on the wall pocket to hang it up, and finish it with gray worsted tassels.



WALL POCKET FOR CLOTHES-BRUSHES, DUSTERS, ETC.

For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 50–53.



SECTION OF CHILD'S CROCHET GIMP AND POINT LACE COLLAR.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XX., Fig. 56.

Child's Crochet Gimp and Point Lace Collar.

THIS collar is made of crochet gimp and point lace braid. The gimp is crocheted with tatting cotton, No. 60, like the gimp shown by Fig. 8, page 500, Harper's Bazar, No. 32, Vol. III. To make the collar, draw its shape, one half of which is given by Fig. 56, Supplement, in full size on paper; baste gimp on the latter around the outer edge and along the middle as shown by the illustration, baste point lace braid between the rows of gimp, and overseam the gimp and braid together with fine white cotton. Separate the collar from the foundation, and crochet around the collar one round of single crochet with tatting cotton, No. 80, working three single crochet each on every loop at the neck of the collar, and five single crochet each on the loops at the crosswise edges and at the under edge of the collar.

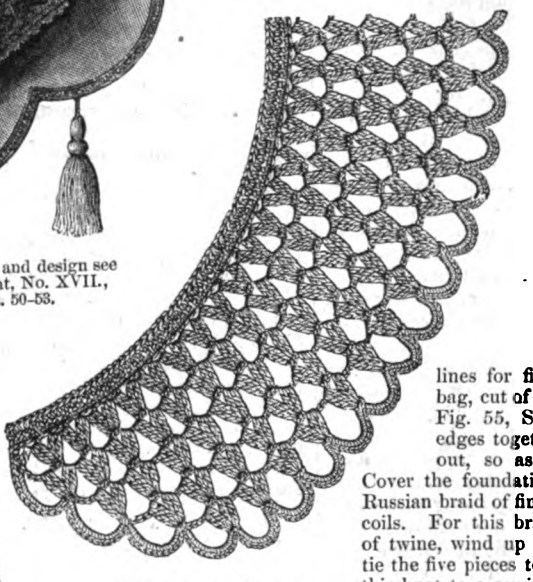
Fig. 1.—SECTION OF KNOTTED CLOTHES-LINE OF HEMPEN CORD AND TWINE.

Child's Crochet Collar.

THIS collar, of which the illustration shows a full-sized section, is crocheted lengthwise with tatting cotton, No. 80. Begin at the upper edge with a foundation divisible by four, which must suit the width of the neck, and, going back on this foundation, work the 1st round.—1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the fourth following foundation st. (stitch), * 5 ch. (chain stitch), 2 stc. on the same foundation st. on which the preceding stc. has been worked, and 2 stc. on the fourth following foundation st.; these 4 stc. are not worked off separately but together. Repeat from *. The end of this, as of every following round, must always correspond to the beginning of the round; besides this, the thread must be cut off at the end of each round. 2d round.—2 stc. on the first, * 2 stc. on the following ch. scallop of the preceding round; these 4 stc. are not worked off separately, but together; 7 ch., 2 stc. on the same ch. scallop on which the preceding 2 stc. have been worked, and repeat from *. 3d–5th rounds.—Like the 2d round; but instead of every 7 ch. of the 2d round, work always 9 ch. in the 3d round, 11 ch. in the 4th round, and 13 ch. in the 5th round. On the slanting crosswise sides of the collar (the projecting ends of thread at the crosswise sides must first be fastened) crochet 4 ch. scallops each as follows: 1 sc. (single crochet) on the first foundation st. at one end of the collar, 11 ch., 1 sc. on the first ch. scallop of the 2d round, 11 ch., 1 sc. on the first ch. scallop of the 3d round, 11 ch., 1 sc. on the first ch. scallop of the 4th round, 11 ch., 1 sc. on the st. with which the first 4 stc. of the 5th round are held together. Fasten the thread and cut it off. The ch. scallops having been commenced at the upper edge at both sides of the collar, the right side of the ch. scallops comes on the outside at one crosswise side of the collar, and the left side of the ch. scallops comes on the outside at the other crosswise side of the collar. Work closely in sc. on the ch. scallops at the ends and at the under edge of the collar, and on the upper edge of the collar (foundation st.) work two rounds of sc., going backward and forward. In the 2d round always pass the needle through both upper veins of each st. of the preceding round.

CLOTHES-LINE BAG.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XIX., Fig. 55.



SECTION OF CHILD'S CROCHET COLLAR.

Clothes-line Bag.

THIS bag is intended to hold fancy clothes-lines for fine linen. To make the bag, cut of stiff paper one piece from Fig. 55, Supplement, and sew the edges together along each piece cut out, so as to make a half globe. Cover the foundation thus prepared with a Russian braid of fine gray twine, sewed on in coils. For this braid take five long pieces of twine, wind up each piece in a ball, and tie the five pieces together at one end. Pin this knot to a sewing-weight, spread out the pieces of twine flat side by side, and work the braid, always alternately laying the outer piece of twine at the left once over the two next pieces of twine, then the outer piece of twine at the right once over the two next pieces of twine. Overseam this braid together in coils with fine gray thread on the paper foundation previously cut from Fig. 55, Supplement, beginning at the middle, and without passing the needle through the paper. When the part made of braid is of the exact shape of Fig. 55, cut off the braid, fasten the ends carefully, and draw the paper foundation out of the work. Now work a second piece with braid in a similar manner; this piece, however, must have a round hole at the middle four-fifths of an inch in diameter. To make this hole, lay the braid at the beginning of the work in a loop of the requisite size, and continue in the usual manner. Ornament each of these two pieces, in the design shown by the illustration, with red Saxony wool in twisted stitch; then join both pieces by a ring-shaped strip, two inches wide, of twine braids sewed together; the circumference of this strip must suit the outer edge of the hemispherical pieces. Cover the joining seams between the pieces each with a row of lace of red Saxony wool, which is crocheted in the following manner: On a foundation of red Saxony wool corresponding to the circumference of the hoop, and divisible by nine, work * one single crochet on the next foundation stitch, one chain stitch, pass over four foundation stitches, on the following foundation stitch seven times alternately one short treble crochet, one chain stitch, pass over four foundation stitches, and repeat from *. It is to be observed also that a slit nine inches and three-quarters long must be formed at the middle of the ring-shaped strip. In order to do this the two middle braids must not be joined at the relative place. Finally, furnish the bag with the two handles as shown by the illustration; each of these consists of three Russian braids braided together. The seams made by setting on these handles are covered each by a dot-like figure, which is worked with red Saxony wool. For this figure make a foundation of ten stitches, pass over the last of the stitches, and on the remaining nine foundation stitches crochet as follows: 1 sdc. (short double crochet) and 1 dc. (double crochet) on the next stitch, 2 dc. on the following stitch, 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the next stitch, 2 stc. on the following st. (stitch), 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the following st., 2 stc. on the next st., 1 stc. on the following st., 2 dc. on the next st., 1 dc. and 1 sdc. on the last foundation st. At the middle of the slit fasten two pieces of red worsted ribbon, which serve to close the bag. The illustration shows one end of the clothes-line passed through the hole at the middle of one half of the bag. Two illustrations on the same page show two clothes-lines suitable for the bag.

Fancy Clothes-Lines for Fine Linen, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 532.

THE illustrations, Figs. 1 and 2, show each a section of two different lines for fine linen and the manner in which they are made.

Fig. 1.—This line consists of a piece of coarse hempen cord or fine rope, which is covered with fine gray twine. To make the line, wind a piece of fine twine several times around one end of the cord referred to, work four button-hole stitches far apart on these windings with twine which has been passed through a darning-needle or bodkin, and, going forward, work one button-hole stitch on each of the button-hole stitches previously worked, always passing the needle through the joining thread between every two button-hole stitches (see illustration). Continue in this manner until all of the cord is covered. Instead of making the line of hempen cord and twine, it can be made of coarse or fine white cotton cord.

Fig. 2.—To make this clothes-line, take a coarse strand of white knitting cotton of the requisite length, which is obtained by ripping up old knitted articles. Fasten the end of this strand to a sewing-weight, and then wind new coarse white knitting cotton several times around the end; in doing this it is to be observed that both ends of the cotton thread must hang down in even lengths from the place around which they are wound. Then cover the strand with the two projecting ends of thread as shown by the illustration. * To do this, lay the thread end at the left side from left to right over the foundation, so that it forms a loop at the left side of the foundation. Lay the other end of thread at the right side over the projecting end at the right of the foundation, then pass it on underneath the foundation through the thread loop at the left, and draw tight both threads. Repeat from * until the foundation is covered closely. When the foundation and knotting threads are used up, lay on a new foundation strand as well as a new piece of knotting thread.

Tatted and Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 532.

THIS edging is worked with tatting cotton, No. 80, partly in tatting and partly in crochet.

Fig. 1.—Work this edging with two threads (shuttles) as follows: First tie both threads together, then, with one thread only, work a ring of 4 ds. (double stitch; that is, one stitch right and one stitch left), six times alternately 1 p. (picot), 2 ds., then 1 more p. and 4 ds., * close to this ring work a scallop of 4 ds. on the foundation thread, fasten to the last p. of the ring previously worked, 2 ds., seven times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then 1 more p., 4 ds. In connection with this scallop work with one thread only one ring as before, which, however, instead of forming the first p., is fastened to the last p. of the scallop previously worked. Repeat from *. This completes one-half of the edging, which is now held so that the rings and scallops are turned downward; then fasten the two working threads previously tied together to the last ring where the row of stitches are closed, and * work with one thread close to the ring mentioned one ring of 8 ds., twice alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then 1 more p. and 8 ds., close on this ring follows one ring of 4 ds., six times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., and 1 more p., 8 ds. After finishing this ring, fasten the working thread first to the ring to which it had been fastened before working the last three rings, and also where the row of stitches is closed; then fasten the working threads to the thread between the second and third of the three rings previously worked, and on the foundation thread work one scallop of 4 ds., fasten to the last p. of the second of the three rings mentioned, 2 ds., seven times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then 1 more p. and 4 ds. Now fasten the working threads to the next ring of the completed half where the row of stitches is closed, and repeat from *. In working the first of every 3 rings, however, instead of forming the middle p., fasten to the middle p. of the last of the three rings previously worked (see illustration); besides this, instead of forming the first p. in working the second of every three rings, fasten to the last p. of the scallop previously worked. On one lengthwise edge of the edging thus far completed crochet two rounds as follows: 1st round.—On the 3 middle p. of each ring and each scallop work 1 slip stitch each, after the first and second of every 3 slip stitches always 1 chain stitch, after every third slip stitch always 4 chain stitches. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 double crochet, 1 chain stitch, with the latter pass over one stitch of the preceding round.

Fig. 2.—To make this edging, work with one thread, first, a row of tatting rings as follows: 6 ds., twice alternately 1 p., 3 ds., then 1 more p., 6 ds. This row of stitches is closed in a ring to a thread interval of three-tenths of an inch; work a similar ring after an interval of thread of one-tenth of an inch, and so on. On one side of the work now crochet the 1st round.—* On the middle p. of the next ring 1 single crochet, 1 double crochet, 1 short treble crochet, 1 p. of 3 chain stitches and 1 single crochet on the first of the 3 chain stitches, 1 short treble crochet, 1 double crochet, 1 single crochet. Now work 1 p. as before, 1 single crochet on the next p. of the same ring and on the following p. of the next ring, so that these p. are held together, 1 p. as before, and repeat from . 2d round.— 1 single crochet on the middle of the next p. between 2 short treble crochet, 2 chain stitches, 1 p., 2 chain stitches, and repeat from *. Work closely in single crochet on the thread interval of every scallop and on the joining thread between every two scallops.

Tapestry Foundations for Slippers, Bags, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 532.

BOTH of these foundations are worked with double zephyr or tapestry worsted and filling silk on canvas; the foundation, Fig. 1, is ornamented also with beads.

Fig. 1.—This foundation is worked with double zephyr worsted and filling silk in three shades of green; the lightest stitches are worked with silk, the darker and darkest stitches with double zephyr worsted. Each foundation figure consists of two longer and two shorter stitches (each of the latter forms a kind of thread loop), and is worked on six lengthwise and six crosswise threads of the canvas. To make each figure, pass the working thread up through the canvas from the under side, then in a slanting direction from right to left, and at the same time from the upper side of the canvas to the under, so that the slanting stitch covers six lengthwise and six crosswise threads of the canvas. Now pass the thread in a straight direction through the canvas from the under side at a distance of six canvas threads from the canvas hole just mentioned; the hole through which the thread has just been passed must be in the same line with the canvas hole first mentioned of the foundation figure, but at a distance of six canvas threads from the same. Now pass the working thread through underneath the slanting stitch, and from the upper to the under side back through the same hole through which it has previously been passed. (The thread now must not be drawn tight, so that the thread loop just formed remains loose.) Then work another slanting stitch as before, in doing which pass the needle through the same holes as in working the preceding slanting stitch. Surround this stitch also with a thread loop, in order to form which pass the working thread through the canvas hole that lies in a slanting direction opposite the canvas hole of the preceding thread loop at a distance of six lengthwise and six crosswise threads from the latter hole (see the unfinished foundation figure shown by Fig. 1). Work all the figures of the foundation like this figure in slanting rows, always alternately working one figure with the lightest, the following figure with the darker, the third figure with the darkest working thread. It is also to be observed that the rows alternate as shown by the illustration. The beads (crystal beads in the original) are sewed on the embroidered foundation as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—This foundation is worked with red, white, and black double zephyr worsted. Work with red zephyr worsted first small diamonds of four cross stitches each (every cross stitch covers two lengthwise and two crosswise threads of the canvas). These diamonds are worked in rows, and are separated each by four crosswise and four lengthwise threads of the canvas (see illustration). Work foundation figures with black and white zephyr worsted between the diamonds. Each figure consists of four long stitches, which are worked as shown by the illustration (see the two unfinished foundation figures shown by the illustration); work for each foundation figure one slanting stitch from the right side at the top to the left side at the bottom over six crosswise and six lengthwise threads of the canvas; then a similar stitch from the left side at the top to the right side at the bottom; now one stitch from the right side at the top to the left side at the bottom, as shown by the illustration. The ● next to the dark unfinished foundation figure shown by the illustration indicates the canvas hole through which the working thread must be passed from the upper to the under side in order to complete the third stitch; the × indicates the place where the working thread is passed from the under to the upper side of the canvas for the fourth stitch. Complete the fourth stitch, observing the unfinished light foundation figure shown by the illustration. To do this the thread must be passed over the third and under the first stitch; then through the relative canvas hole to the under side. The illustration plainly shows which foundation figures are worked with white, and which foundation figures are worked with black worsted.

Mignardise and Crochet Square for Tidies, Toilette Cushions, etc.

See illustration on page 532.

THIS square is worked in crochet and mignardise of the fineness shown by the pattern. Begin with the four points of the middle figure at the point marked a in the illustration. Work as follows: 1 sc. (single crochet) fastening together three loops of the mignardise, * 9 ch. (chain stitches), four times alternately 1 sc. in the next three loops and 5 ch., again 1 sc. in the following three loops, 3 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet), with which fasten the following five loops, 3 ch., 1 sc. in the next three loops, 5 ch., 1 sc. in the following three loops, 4 ch., fasten to the opposite sc., in doing which take the needle out of the stitch, put it through the opposite sc., and draw the dropped stitch through, after which crochet back over the row, excepting the first stitch, 3 sc., and after this 1 sc. in the sc. before the 4 ch., thus forming one of the small cross-bars within a point of the middle figure. Work after every 5 ch. and 1 sc. which join three loops of the mignardise three other such bars in the same manner, of which, however, the first must count six, the second eight, and the third eleven chain stitches, and the same number of single crochet stitches. This done, repeat from * three times; in making the last cross-bar crochet back on the chain stitch row only 5 ch., and work from here the middle star of the figure as follows: 18 ch., * fasten to the middle stitch of the next chain stitch scallop at the right, passing over the last stitch work back on the next 6 sc., then 7 ch., fasten to the next right-hand cross-bar, work back on the chain stitches 6 sc., work 7 ch., from * repeat twice, then work back on the last chain stitch row 6 sc., 6 sc. also in the remaining stitches of the 18 ch., and 5 sc. in the free chain stitches of the cross-bar from which the central star was begun. Sew the mignardise together and fasten the thread. Now form the Greek figure on the outer edge of the square, in doing which crochet a round on each side of the mignardise, in connection with which work the figures which form the ground between the line. We describe first the round which forms the outer edge. The beginning of this is designated by b. Work 1 sc. in a loop of the mignardise, 3 ch., 1 sc. in the next loop, nine times alternately 1 ch., 1 sc. in the following loop, twice 2 ch., after this 1 sc. in the next loop, nine times alternately 1 ch. and 1 sc. in the next following loop, then 1 sc., with which fasten the next two loops, 1 ch., twice alternately 1 sc. in the following loop, and 1 ch. We have now reached the corner marked c on the illustration, after which crochet for the star 4 ch., * 1 p. (picot) composed of 5 ch. and 1 sc. in the first of these 5 ch., 4 ch., fasten to the fifth chain between two loops of the mignardise at the right, 2 ch., 1 sc. in the second of the 4 ch., 1 ch., 1 p., + 6 ch., repeat once from * to +, in doing which, however, fasten to the fourth following ch. between two loops of the mignardise, then twice alternately 3 ch., 1 p., after this 1 ch., 1 sl. (slip stitch) in the fifth of the 6 ch., 2 ch., 1 sl. in the second of the 6 ch., 1 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 p., 1 ch., 1 sl. in the third of the 4 ch. crocheted at the beginning of the star, 2 ch., 1 sl. in the sc. worked in the loop of the mignardise before these 4 ch. The principal part of two stars are now ended; crochet next 1 ch., then 3 sc. each separated by a ch. in the next three loops of the mignardise, and after this work the two other stars in precisely the same manner as the first two, except that they must be joined at the proper place to the middle one of the 3 ch. between two picots; after the sl. which terminates the last star work 1 ch., 3 sc. each separated by a ch. in the next two loops of the mignardise, after this 9 ch., fastening to the middle one of the 3 ch. between two picots, 2 ch., 1 sl. in the seventh of the 9 ch., 11 ch., fasten to the middle one of the 3 ch. between two picots of the next star, 2 ch., 1 sl. in the ninth of the 11 ch., 13 ch., fasten to the middle one of the 3 ch. between the picots of the next star, 2 ch., 1 sl. in the eleventh of the 13 ch., 11 ch., fasten between the two picots of the next star, 2 ch., 1 sl. in the ninth of the 11 ch., 6 ch., 2 sl. in the 2 ch. on the next corner of the Greek figure, after this 2 ch. Now work back on the chain stitch row dc. (double crochet stitches) each separated by a ch., and begin anew from b, continuing till the requisite number of squares is completed, but in the middle square, after the stars are finished, instead of working the first 9, 11, and 13 ch., work the corner with ch. and sc., and fasten the stars while working on the mignardise. Next crochet on the other side of the mignardise from the point marked d to the point marked e in the illustration, always 1 ch. alternating with 1 sc. in a loop of the mignardise, in doing which work the corners in the same manner as before. From here work the figures within the square as follows: passing from left to right, * 11 ch., 1 sl. in the fifth from the last of these 11 ch., this forms a picot, 2 ch., fasten to the sc. in the sixth loop to the right, 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sl. in the fifth of the 11 ch., + again 11 ch., fasten to the third ch. between the loops to the right, returning on the last six of the 11 ch. work 2 1 sl., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 2 dc., 2 tc. (treble crochet), repeat once from * to +, in doing which fasten between the two picots in the manner shown by the illustration, then 4 ch., fasten as shown by the illustration, next returning from right to left 19 sc. which are worked partly in the chain stitches and partly around the veins of the last treble crochet stitches of the little point. After this crochet three times alternately 1 ch., 1 sl. in the next loop of the mignardise, and complete the figures of this square in the same manner as the preceding with the help of the pattern. Work also the other squares in the same manner. In working the last row of single crochet of each square fasten to the points of the middle figure of the square as shown by the illustration. Now work the close triangles which join the middle of each side of the border in ribbed crochet stitch with nine back and forward rounds single crochet. The first of these rounds counts twenty-one single crochet; at the last of each round always work three stitches in one. It now remains to join the central star with these triangles as follows: commence with 1 sl. at the point marked f, 2 ch., fasten to the first free mignardise loop of the central star, 1 ch., fasten to the next loop, 1 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., passing over two loops fasten the next two together with 1 sl., 1 ch., 1 sl. in the middle of the 3 ch., 1 p., 6 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., passing over two loops fasten the following two loops with 1 sl., and continue in the manner shown by the illustration. Having reached the next point of the star, work back on the row of chain stitches and picots just finished, fastening to the close ribbed triangle as shown by the pattern.

A RONDEAU.

At my last ball became I bounden thrall
To Love, and by Love's tender hands and small
Was taken, ere my heart was well aware,
In toils of gray eyes and warm golden hair,
Which graced a woman most divinely tall.

Nay, though I see a hundred times the fall
Of hopeful corn, and hear the cuckoo call,
I shall see none as her I saw so fair
At my last ball!
Who fills long nights with bitterness and gall—
Have I not cause, good cause, since all things pall
Before her beauty, for sad dreams and care?
Such sour fruit that sweet kiss from soft lips bare
For me, without one thought of harm at all,
At my last ball!

BONNIE PRINCE CHARLIE.

IT would be a very sweet and touching picture, I do not doubt, could I bring before your eyes my beloved and myself in the soft autumn haze of our tranquil life, sitting side by side, hand in hand, heart to heart, each bound to each by a strong and tender chord unknown in the hot and restless summer days when love was young. But, unfortunately for the truth of the picture, the lord of my existence, deplorably mussing the new dressing-gown our careful Olivia made for him with so much taste and forethought at Christmas time, is at this present writing stretched his full length upon the lounge at the far end of the room, puffing clouds of smoke, between the chapters of a very dull new novel, into the face of poor, patient Fido, who wags his tail and tries to look as if he liked it; and I have grown so stout of late—such a dumpling of a little mother, as my girls say in their impatience, when they, slender as young elms, with dresses very long behind and very short in front, tower over me, and moan that mamma is not more imposing in her happy maternity—so stout and fond of my chair by the fire, that you must e'en pardon us that sentiment has succumbed to comfort.

Yet the sentiment is not all lost, I think, or perhaps it is only the new light in my stately Olivia's deep eyes—of which eyes, I am fain to confess, I am myself half afraid—and all it tells that has set me to think of the old, old days when I was young as she, and my gray-bearded king over there was my own bonnie Prince Charlie—my bonnie Prince Charlie that I never half deserved, and to this day hardly know how I came to own.

If Olivia had known me in those old days, how she would have despised me! I heard her last night, with half a dozen words, one turn of her head—Olivia has such a well-set head, though I do say it!—and a motion of her hand, sweep all weak-minded, doll-baby women into outer darkness. She moved calmly on as if she had brushed all knowledge of such from her; but I winced a little, for I was a doll-baby girl, a kitteny little creature of the most condemned order five-and-twenty years ago. I was a little pretty, and if a little knowledge is a dangerous thing, what shall be said of a little prettiness? I was a very little pretty, and people petted me half unconsciously, while they looked at some grand face or some beautiful picture, forgetting me the instant after. But I did not know that they forgot me. I was a Dora, a Dot, a Ruth, a dear little angel in my own imagination, or would have been had I analyzed my fancies. I think I was born wicked, like Topsy, for I couldn't help purring just as I was about to scratch; but, not to be hard upon myself, I may say I did not often scratch, and when I did it was only a skin-breaker.

There was my dear and intimate friend Réné: she walked openly up to one who roused her anger, drew her sword in broad daylight, and struck so hard and pierced so deep I do not think the wounds she made were ever healed. Réné laughed at me, and I was dreadfully afraid of her, but we got on nicely together; you could always trust Réné to be honest and above-board; and I—well, mine were only scratches after all.

There were two cousins whose names, in law and by baptism, were the same, Charles Horton, but one was always called Charles and the other Charlie, until Réné and I one day named the first Don Carlos—I don't know why, unless that to us the name contained all grandeur and iciness, which was the way the bearer inclined—and the other Prince Charlie. Ah! it is easy to explain that! It was not that we were furious little Cavaliers, and followed the fortunes of the "ill-fated" but adorable Stuarts with all the ardor which romance has ever aroused in warm young hearts, making us sigh that we were not Flora—what was her name? I was never much of a reader, I don't like to disturb Prince Charlie, and Olivia would be so surprised at my ignorance—that Flora who guided the Chevalier, was it not, when he was obliged to return to France? But because, to one of us at least, he was all that a prince should be, and the "fated fairy prince" besides.

I knew Don Carlos first, and he was my first lover. The wickedness that was born in me might never have shown itself, or, at all events, come to such maturity, had it not been for him. To pretty much any very young girl, at all animated, lively, or inclined to sentiment, a tall man with dark eyes, heavy mustache, few words, and a deep voice to say them in, is a king, a hero, a conqueror; to a little woman eaten up with vanity and love of admiration, as many a little body had been before her, Don Carlos—that is, Charles Horton, Esquire—was a Julius Cæsar, an Alexander, a Rochester, all in one. He spoke to no one of us girls besides myself, and very little even to me, but therein, perhaps, lay his great charm; he may have been the first, he certainly was not the last, whom silence has made eloquent, and who was the most convincing when most reticent. He and Réné would salute each other with a grave solemnity which always made me think of the Middle Ages; and it was, I think, with an intuitive sense of the artistic that I would take the one little spark of intelligence which niggard nature had bestowed upon me out of my face, would pout my lips, and turn up my eyes—and a long way it was from them to his—with a fearlessness and a childishness that I am sure I thought irresistible, and, to show Réné how strong I was in the consciousness of power, I would rattle whatever came uppermost—or seemed to—until his gracious majesty, who was only gracious by comparison with himself, would so far unbend as to let his eyes rest on mine, or permit a word, perhaps, to drop from his dark mustache. Having achieved so great a triumph, my spirits would rise to their zenith, and a hundred new airs and graces seemed at my command.

Every day I gained courage, and oh! shall I ever forget the thrill of delight which came when once, in the presence of a dozen, I openly called him a "tease, a perfect plague, a horrid old nuisance;" and instead of the earth opening at our feet, as by the scared looks of all seemed to be expected, he, Don Carlos, bent his grim visage toward me, and—smiled? That smile was the seal of his abdication and my coronation. I was every thing to him after that which my natural wickedness, my inborn coquetry—which is a compound of vanity and deceit in a nature not sensitive, high-toned or much given to appreciate the nobility of others—my inordinate vanity, or the last novel I had read suggested: now grave and cold, now gently superior to all the sins of this wicked world; now a mere child, now a serious folly-rebuking woman; at one time sweetly exhorting, again teasingly obstinate; sometimes passionately loving, sometimes coldly unapproachable, and always conqueror; for if Don Carlos should remonstrate, which seldom occurred, for my lover's head was in the clouds, and he believed in all women, I could put my lips up to be kissed after the manner of a spoiled child, or I could walk abroad gently, softly, uncomplainingly, until the atmosphere was full of injured innocence, and my lover was at my feet again.

Bonnie Prince Charlie over there, shall I ask you if you remember when you came and drew me backward from the precipice over which I was bending—bending with the almost irresistible desire to spring over it to the running brook below?

But it was Prince Charlie who did it. I had Don Carlos's ring on my engagement finger, and Don Carlos in chains of love and bonds of honor that he would no more have dreamed of breaking than of moving the earth from its axis or the stars from their course, when he brought Prince Charlie to see me, and I saw and recognized, for the first time in my life, a man. Only this and nothing more. That which little boys dream they shall be when they grow up, and build castles on the hope; that which little girls are taught to reverence as the future of their rougher playfellows; that which thousands on thousands of all but inspired tongues and thousands on thousands of gifted pens have tried to describe; that which all the world so looks for that if it finds but one small portion, it exalts it to the skies, and crowns it with its laurel wreath of grandest words—KING, HERO, CONQUEROR!

We four naturally fell together. Réné and I were bosom friends, and they were cousins. It was Réné who first called him Prince Charlie, as I had called my lover Don Carlos. I don't think it would have occurred to me to name him any thing. Réné was a brilliant woman—a very brilliant woman, even when so young. Sometimes, when dear Olivia is happy, and has no care on her mind, she reminds me very much of my old friend; but with the same firm principles, with the same devotion to the right, Olivia and Réné are very unlike; my girl has a perfectly well-regulated mind, into which no thought of wrong-doing could ever enter an argument or excuse; but Réné was of hotter blood, and was less even-tempered. I should be pained, scared, to see on the face of one of my girls the proud, almost fierce expression I have seen on Réné's.

One such expression comes before me now. We four had been for a long time constantly in parties together, and naturally, as Don Carlos considered me his own rightful property, whom he was never for one instant to leave, it came about that Prince Charlie and Réné invariably made one couple. But he was not in love with her. I never thought that for an instant. I did not think he knew what love was in those days. How I did wish to bring the light, the real light, the lover's look, you know, into those deep blue eyes! Into how many expressionless faces—expressionless as stone walls as far as that was concerned—I had brought the living, loving fire, and they so surprised at themselves and its existence! And I did so want to try it on this grave, simple, brave, courteous man, who day after day quietly took my hand, gently named my name, smiled pleasantly at my words, but no more! I think I was bewitched to flirt with him, just one little, little hour, and half mad at Réné that she had not the power to do so. But something kept back my will. I could not really make up my mind to do it. I knew not why; and the one or two little arts I essayed as a sort of scout did not meet with any encouragement to try more; and yet he liked me, thoroughly liked me; I was sure of that. And, as I was saying, he was no more in love with Réné than with me; he might have been her pet brother, and my older, graver one. But it was of Réné's anger I was going to tell you which came toward the end of that merry summer, and was the beginning of our estrangement.

We were all acting in tableaux. I for peasants, shepherdesses, and the like; Réné for queens, Judiths, Junos, and such characters; Don Carlos grimly taking part, when he was not required to appear out of his natural character and usual dress; Prince Charlie every thing that was desired from a shepherd boy to a Spanish inquisitor: nothing ever came amiss to bonnie Prince Charlie. Don Carlos thought it all folly and childishness, but endured it for my sake. Prince Charlie enjoyed it all for its own sake, and the good and loveliness he drew from every thing. Réné and I were to be in one together as "The Rivals," and had spent hours of preparation together in order to carry out our parts with perfect success. Réné, you know, was not so very tall, though considerably higher up in the world than I, but she was not slender, and so gave the idea of being much larger than she really was. No one could be more imposing. Réné planned my dress, I hers; and, of course, my color was delicate blue, and hers glowing scarlet; her jewelry diamonds, mine pearls.

"The dress is easy enough," said Réné; "but I can never get the expression. You look so deliciously innocent that I have to look amused."

"Oh, the expression is not much," I said, "and it is sure to come at the last moment."

And so it did. "I think I shall have to put in some gentlemen," said Mrs. Gaines, who arranged us, just as we were in place waiting for the curtain to rise; and as our two gentlemen were standing near, she called to them, "I must put in some gentlemen; it will make more show, and help you to have more expression. Mr. Charlie, come and be Miss Carrie's lover."

"Shall I be her favored or her rejected lover?" he answered, coming to my side with his usual readiness to do all that was asked of him. Mrs. Gaines did not hear him, for she was placing Don Carlos in an attitude of earnest devotion, which his natural gravity made almost dejection and despair, beside Réné.

"Now throw your head a little back," said Mrs. Gaines to Réné, "and look up tenderly, as if you were saying something hard, yet loving too—

'I could not love you, dear, so much, Loved I not honor more'— or some such thing. Do you understand, dear?"

For answer Réné instinctively obeyed, and the expression of her face the instant it became fixed would have been sublimely tender. But it did not become fixed; just as her eyes should have met his her face flushed, and she said, rather petulantly, "I don't see how my sending away my lover, because honor will not let him be mine, carries out the idea of 'The Rivals.' And, besides, Mr. Horton is dark, and so am I; he ought to be on Carrie's side, and Mr. Charlie with me."

"Oh, never mind," said Mrs. Gaines; "it doesn't make any difference about the meaning, if the picture has expression; and you can put so much feeling in your face. I saw it all, and I must have it just so. There is a romance in three volumes in such a glance as that would have been."

"Fix me," I said; "Réné will be ready by that time."

"You must be smiling; it will be such a pretty contrast, and I can call the whole picture something else—'Tragedy and Comedy,' perhaps, if Miss Réné looks so vexed. Here, Mr. Charlie, kneel at her feet. You, Miss Carrie, are about to give him the flower he has begged for so long; so you must look happy, Mr. Charlie; and you smiling and gracious, Miss Carrie."

We obeyed, and then, as we held our positions, I saw that he could look a little like a lover. Réné and I were standing side by side, our heads turned from each other toward the gentlemen, when I moved a little, surprised to hear Réné say, "I can not put on such a look!"

and, not thinking that my words had meaning, I said, lightly, "No, one can not act what one feels." And then it was that, quicker than the lightning's flash, Réné turned her face to me with a look that, if it had not held me, turned me into stone almost, would have made me faint, so questioning, so proud, so denying, so defiant it was. Mrs. Gaines caught it, and before either could breathe the curtain went up, and we were compelled to remain so, our eyes riveted upon each other. Shouts of applause greeted this picture. Mrs. Gaines was in ecstasies. "You are perfect, Miss Réné," she said. "Had I not known it was acting, I should have been as frightened as poor little Miss Carrie looked. And you, gentlemen, your look of maze was delightful."

But Réné would take no more parts that night, nor would she speak to Don Carlos or me. I was surprised and bewildered; Prince Charlie alone seemed unaffected. I think, though, if any change was in him, he was a trifle sterner with Réné, more gentle to me, than ever before. I almost began to feel as if I had been wronged and he were protecting me, so gentle he became from that time out.

If, sometimes, my perfectly true Olivia tries me, as weak mortals sometimes are tried, by her manifold perfections, I forget all annoyances when I recall the time that followed this tableau party; and my heart rises up in praise and thanks that no struggle, no question even, of right or wrong can disturb the peaceful equanimity of her calm breast. Day after day, hour after hour, I was as one possessed to try my power upon Prince Charlie. I forgot to tease Don Carlos; my little arts seemed tame and silly; I would sit long hours almost, if I dare tell the truth, pretending that I was free, that I was not yet engaged to Don Carlos, that Prince Charlie was with me, and that I was trying my best to please him, and gradually I would succeed. Oftener and oftener, so it pleased my fancy to say, I would find his eyes resting on mine, and the love-light drawn nearer and nearer to the surface, until at last, in one broad glow of tenderness, it would make my own fall, and win the shy blushes of consent into my face. I seemed to know just how he would look and speak, although I had never seen, in reality, one glimmer of love in his eyes, nor heard one tender word from his lips. I seemed to know just how my own eyes would fall, my own face flush, and the broken words fall from my lips, eagerly seized by him, although no such scene had ever happened. For when Don Carlos said, "Miss Carrie, will you be my wife?" I had not lost my self-possession, and only acted shyness. I felt it was wrong for me to think of such things, and yet I thought of them. Réné was cross with me, and would not go with us, and the days were sultry, and, somehow, our party was duller than it had been when she was with us; then, too, as lovers are dull company to a third party, Prince Charlie began to stay away. I could not help being cross to grim Don Carlos when he turned up the lane alone; and, alas! I am afraid I watched oftener for Prince Charlie than for my plighted lover. I could not help noticing it myself, and was vexed at myself for it; but my heart rose to see him, and sank when he did not come, all the same. Réné was colder and colder every time we met, and I was sorely hurt, when one day Mrs. Gaines gave me a new light.

"Splendid girl, that Réné," she said, "but artful. Beware of her, you dear little unsuspecting thing! I hate to make trouble, but I do think some one should stand up for you; you are too sweet yourself to believe wrong of any one. Let me tell you a secret, Carrie, but you must never, never breathe a word of it—will you, dear? Least of all to Réné; she would persecute me to the ends of the earth. Listen, dear, do not be too shocked: it was no acting that night of the tableaux. There!"

"Do you mean she was really angry? I know she was."

"Do you know why?"

"Because I doubted her acting, I suppose. Réné likes to think she can do any thing she tries. But I did not mean any thing."

"Of course you did not, little pet. 'You builded better than you knew.' Why would Réné not send away Mr. Horton, because honor would not let him be hers? Why? Because she was not true and strong. I had seen from the first how it was with Réné, and I made her that opportunity that she might show Mr. Horton in play what she would do in reality, and she would not show him."

"Do you mean that Réné cares for Mr. Horton?"

"Yes, dear. There! it is out!"

I felt very magnanimous. "I will not stand in the way of her happiness," I said; "I will break my engagement this very night, if it pleases her."

"You noble, noble creature! You will do nothing of the kind. An engagement is an engagement. Mr. Horton is not the man to be turned from one girl to another. And you shall never break your heart for an intriguer like her!"

And so on. Then I threw Don Carlos and Réné together in spite of themselves; I watched as patiently as a cat for a mouse for one stolen glance, one equivocal word, but none came—not one. I was tenderness itself to Réné. I gave her a thousand hints that I would give my life, or whatever life contained for me, if only she wished it; and she heard me coldly, almost with contempt. I talked to Don Carlos of her womanly virtues as compared with my caprices. I spoke of ill-assorted marriages; how wrong it was to marry with a doubt on one's mind. I assured him a thousand times that I was unworthy of him, and he assured me that I was a thousand times too good for him, and called me noble and generous, and held me all the firmer. Yet he did not love me; not with the love I longed for, not with the love there was under the calm eyes of bonnie Prince Charlie.

So the hope—yes, it had grown to that—that I should be freed by others' act passed away, and I never contemplated doing it by my own. All the world knew how long Don Carlos had been my lover, and all the world would cry out against me if I broke our engagement. What could I answer? And then, to be an old maid perhaps—for I would marry no one but Prince Charlie, and he, of course, would side with his cousin; Réné would triumph; all the world would be against me! I could not do it, and yet my heart was like stone against Don Carlos. I got to hate his grim face, his slow, measured voice, his expressionless eyes; the touch of his hand sent cold shivers through all my frame, and his caresses, rare as they were, made me feel as if I were a maniac in chains.

All my world, that had been enthusiastic admirers of my "little ways," now lauded me to the skies for my quieter manners. "So womanly as you are growing every day!" they would exclaim. "Ah! we knew there was the true stuff in you for all your nonsense." And bonnie Prince Charlie gravely, in a deeper voice than ever he had used to me before, said much the same thing one day, and more: "My cousin will have the sweetest wife in the world," he said. "I may come to your home when I need to have my belief in all things brave and true renewed. One look at your face will be all I shall need."

And when he said this I felt what a miserable sham I was, and I could bear it no longer. I told Don Carlos I could not marry him. "Call me false, fickle, what you will; I can not keep my word," I said.

He did not call me false. It has been my punishment all through my life to be praised when I should be censured. "I think," said he, "you are truer than any of us, and braver than those of twice your pretension." His words humbled me still more. Réné and Prince Charlie both tried to make it up; but, once done, I was a new person, and loved my freedom as only a freed woman can. Prince Charlie, as I supposed, took Mr. Horton's part, and went away somewhere—nor ever even so much as sent a message to me for two long years. Of course Réné and Don Carlos, who were made for each other, drifted together, but rather shamefacedly. Réné struggled long, but at last came to me to implore forgiveness. "Yes," she murmured; "you say you did not love him—that is your generosity, to spare me. Forgive me, darling; you know I never showed it, though I was drawn to him from the very first; only I never dreamed what it meant until that night of the tableaux. But I can not be as generous as you, and deny it." So the world judges!

When Réné was married Prince Charlie came back. I was free to try to raise the love-light in his eyes, as I had longed to do of old; but I never used my freedom. I felt I needed all my strength to keep it out of my own. It came to his without effort of mine; and, just as I had dreamed in my dreams, when I had no right to dream, the glow of his love enveloped me around, and his eager lips gathered up my broken words.

"But Don Carlos was a far better fellow than I," Prince Charlie often says, "and if I had not come between you nothing would. I did not go away because I took sides with him, but because with the news of your act hope came, and with hope love sprang into life. If I had staid I should have tried to win you, and that would not have been fair to poor Charles."

"Poor Charles has the best of it, notwithstanding," I answer. "Réné is worth a dozen of me, a hundred of me."

"Nonsense! All the world says you were most noble to Réné, and that you are the most generous creature in the world."

And that the world may know the truth I have told my little story, for nothing frets me so much as the censure given to Réné and Don Carlos, and the idea that I was her innocent victim. The world does not always get things straight. Dear old Prince Charlie! My gray-bearded king is shaking off his drowsiness, and Olivia tells me it is time to dress for dinner. Olivia knows just when to tell us that; she is prompt to the minute. I was always a sad laggard. People say I have Olivia under excellent discipline.

CONFIDENCE IN PARENTS.

SOME fathers seem to think that when they have given their children a fine education and a good start in life they have fully done their duty, and nothing more is to be required of them. This is a mistake fertile in sorrowful consequences. There is no time so anxious and critical as those years of unwisdom and inexperience, as the few which precede the indiscreet time when we come to years of discretion. To the young man out in the world you must make home and holidays as cheerful and beloved as possible; that such should be the case is to a young woman the very life of her life. I like it not that the young man should settle all his plans in life, and do his wooing with his future bride, before he says one word to his father, and that the maiden should yield her assent unknown to her mother. Yet this will assuredly be the case unless you have won your son's confidence and intimacy and love. And these feelings will not come unless they are sought for and elicited. There is such a width of years between you, something so authoritative and magisterial about the parental character, that there is often a great shyness between father and son; but still that blessed relationship of fatherhood is something infinitely grander and deeper than all harsher and more formal associations. Where there are tried tenderness and sympathy there will be truest, deepest friendship between parent and child. It is this prudent, loving guidance that will give the son help in the most hazardous years of life, and which will come back on the father's heart in a flood of love and comfort.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE accounts which have recently come to us of the earthquake which visited the Philippine Islands last May indicate a most violent and extraordinary convulsion of nature. It will be remembered that these islands are situated in the Indian Archipelago, and are about twelve hundred in number, most of them being very small. For some months there had been indications of a severe earthquake in a succession of shocks, which opened large crevices in the earth. About the 1st of May a level plain near a small village on the island of Camiguin began gradually to subside, until the tops of the houses were level with the surface of the earth. This curious phenomenon attracted a great crowd of people. While they were watching it, suddenly terrific shocks shook the whole island; the earth was rent asunder; the plain fell in, ingulfing in a fiery grave one hundred and fifty persons; the plain became the crater of a volcano 1500 feet wide, from which issued smoke, ashes, stones, lava, and jets of fire. The forest took fire, and men and cattle fled in terror before the flames. According to the accounts, a more frightful spectacle has seldom been witnessed. Until lately Camiguin contained a population of about 26,000; now all the inhabitants have left the island. A range of mountains runs through the entire Philippine group, and these are mostly of volcanic formation. Manilla is the capital; a city of some importance, Manilla hemp taking its name from this place.

One of the most remarkable wills on record is that of Narcisse Pierrot, an eccentric Parisian, who must have been in a very cheerful state of mind when he executed the document. It reads as follows:

"It is my will that any one of my relatives who shall presume to shed tears at my funeral shall be disinherited. He, on the other hand, who laughs the most heartily shall be sole heir. I order that neither the church nor my hearse shall be hung with black cloth; but that, on the day of my burial, the hearse and church shall be decorated with flowers and green boughs. Instead of the tolling of bells, I will have drums, fiddles, and fifes. All the musicians of Montgaillard and its environs shall attend the funeral. Fifty of them shall open the procession with hunting tunes, waltzes, and minuets."

The number of adhesive stamps issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, was 411,663,888, representing in value $15,019,074.

The house in which the astronomer Kepler lived for many years is still standing in Grätz. Arrangements are now being made at Grätz for celebrating the three-hundredth anniversary of Kepler's birth, which occurred on December 27, 1571. He was professor at the endowed Protestant school of Grätz from 1594 till 1600.

A correspondent at Newport seems to find there a charming state of society, and a pleasant, genial mode of life attainable. Yet he says that an abstract of the daily programme would read something like this: Dress, breakfast, promenade, undress, dress, bathe, dress, nap, dress, dinner, drive, dress, supper, promenade, undress, bed. Moreover, that this programme is rather paradoxical, as dress often means undress, and undress means dress. So a definition of the verb "to bathe" would often read, to scream, to make a loud noise, to shout aloud—the essential element of going into the water being deemed superfluous.

What a vast amount of money is smoked or chewed up! In Great Britain it is estimated that 41,000,000 pounds of tobacco were consumed in 1869, the latest year for which there are official returns. This gives an average consumption of about one pound and one-third for each inhabitant of the British Islands in a year. As women and children do not generally smoke or chew, the men who are addicted to these habits must divide the amount among themselves. In this city, during 1870, nearly 13,000,000 pounds of tobacco were sold, and more than 6,000,000 pounds besides were shipped to foreign ports—making a total of nearly 20,000,000 pounds as the transactions of one year in New York alone.

The sad record of deaths by accidental drowning which comes every summer has commenced. Pleasure parties in row-boats, and especially in sail-boats, might well learn lessons of carefulness from the records of the past.

Never, perhaps, has a more appalling tragedy burst upon our city than that which broke the stillness of a peaceful Sabbath on the 30th of July. The details of the explosion of the boiler of the Staten Island ferry-boat Westfield have gone throughout the country; yet none but eye-witnesses can have any thing but a faint conception of the horror of the scenes—at the boat, in the streets, in houses and hospitals, where mangled, scalded masses of humanity writhed in unutterable agony. It was a sad sight to see the pallid dead, but infinitely more pitiful to see the anguish of men, women, and little children, who but a few moments before were in the height of joyous health and happiness. Some instances were heart-rending. Mothers, seriously injured, seemed to care nothing for themselves, but were suffering acutely in the pain of their little ones. A lady who had received a severe cut and burn on the face, when asked how she felt, said "it was nothing," but pointed to a pallet by her side, saying simply, "I suffer there." Lying on the pallet were two fine children, a boy and a girl, aged respectively six and eight years. They were scalded badly about the face and eyes. One of them was sleeping under the influence of an opiate, but the other seemed to suffer intense pain, and filled the room with his cries. Another mother could not find her child of four years old, and her boy, aged two, lay on the bed at the hospital, near her, badly scalded. Of her own injuries, which were severe, she thought little. There was no mother to be found for a little one a year old, who was burned, though not severely. It is impossible to even allude to some of the fearful events of that Sabbath afternoon; some particulars are too terrible to detail. Perhaps there are no injuries that give such agonizing suffering as those caused by scalding steam. Such a dreadful lesson as this has been would seem to insure the public against accidents from carelessness or negligence in the future. But who can tell?

Children imitate their elders, as is well known. It is not so clear that birds and beasts copy the virtues and vices of the human race, but there are indications enough pointing in this direction to render the subject an interesting one for naturalists to investigate. A while ago a brood of young goldfinches was found in a garden in Bedfordshire, England, and confined in a cage while still in the nest. The parent birds supplied food for their young, and they were thriving well. When nearly ready to fly the old birds discovered that their little ones were not to be allowed their freedom—that they were prisoners in the cage. Whether they considered death to be preferred to slavery, or whether they committed the crime from less worthy motives, is yet a problem; but one night the parents brought the young birds some poisonous seeds, and every one died.

A hair-dresser in this city takes some pride in exhibiting a double braid of pure white hair, weighing six ounces, and about twenty-six inches in length. It is really a curiosity, and the pretty little sum he asks for it makes one fancy it might be worth while to cultivate a similar article for the market. He is willing to part with this treasure for the modest sum of three thousand dollars. Gray hair has long been considered stylish; now it will be "all the rage."

The city is full of peaches—that luscious fruit, whose only fault is that it will not keep nice but a brief time. Hence we can not send from our abundance to distant friends, as we would gladly do, that they might taste and see how delicious is the flavor of a peach just in the prime of its ripeness. Even before the New Jersey peaches were sent in any quantities to the market, one morning ninety thousand baskets arrived in this city from Delaware. Estimate how many peaches this would give to each citizen of New York city, ye who bear in mind the result of the recent census, and then consider, with regret, how many basketfuls might remain over! Peach-dealers, however, are wary and skillful. They do not suffer the fruit to decay on their hands without an effort to dispose of it. Immense quantities are sent to Boston, as a glimpse into the hold of any Eastern steamer which takes freight will abundantly testify. From Boston they go still farther East, when the condition of the fruit admits of a longer journey.

Among curious inventions of the period is an apparatus by which the head and hair can be washed without wetting the face, neck or clothes. The process consists in adjusting a bottomless bath-tub with an India rubber rim to the head of a person sitting at ease in an arm-chair, so that the head forms the bottom of the bath. Another part of the apparatus is a ladies' hair-dryer, whereby the hair can be very speedily dried by means of air being fanned around it.

The monument to the late Secretary Stanton, which has just been erected in Oak Hill Cemetery, is made of silver-fringed granite from quarries near Concord, New Hampshire, and bears the simple inscription, "Edwin M. Stanton, born August 10, 1814, died December 24, 1869."

It is curious to contrast the present postal service, the extent of the routes, number of offices and postmasters, and the magnitude of the mail contracts with the scale on which the Post-office Department was originally organized in 1775. The first Postmaster-General (Benjamin Franklin) was directed by the act authorizing his appointment to form a line of posts from Falmouth (now Portland), Maine, to Savannah, Georgia, with cross posts where needful. To carry the mails riders were appointed for every twenty-five miles, to deliver from one to the other, and return to their starting-places, "they to travel day and night, and to be faithful men and true." The Postmaster-General originally received $1000 per annum, and a secretary and controller received $340 each. In November, 1776, authority was given to employ extra post-riders between the armies from their head-quarters to Philadelphia. In 1779 the salary of the Postmaster-General was increased to $2000. The entire force of the department at Washington, as late as 1799, consisted of the Postmaster-General, the Controller, the Surveyor, and a clerk.

On the finest site on the Bosphorus, two hundred and fifty feet above the water, and four hundred feet from it, stands the Robert College of Constantinople. This institution was chartered several years ago by the Legislature of this State, and a site was purchased in 1861, with assurances from the Turkish authorities that a building might be erected immediately. Obstacles, however, were interposed by the Turkish government, which have taken years to overcome. It was not until near the close of 1868 that permission to build was obtained; and on the following Fourth of July the corner-stone was laid by the American minister resident in Constantinople. The building was finished last May. It has a frontage on the Bosphorus of one hundred and thirteen feet, with sides one hundred and three feet deep, surrounding a spacious court. It is three stories above a high basement, surmounted by a Mansard roof and towers, and is built of blue limestone and light-colored sandstone. Nearly one hundred boys now lodge and board in the college, and there are thirty day scholars. From the applications which have been received, it is supposed that at the opening of the next term in September there will be about two hundred boarders, with a corresponding number of day scholars. Six American and seven or eight native teachers will be attached to this institution, whose design is to give a thorough collegiate education under Christian influences. The building cost about $60,000 in gold; and the property of the institution amounts to about $140,000, most of which was furnished through the liberality of C. R. Robert, of this city.

Various Riding Habits, Figs. 1–3.

See illustrations on page 537.

THE riding habits shown in the illustrations on page 537 may be made of heavy material—such as cloth, ladies' cloth, etc., or of lighter fabric, such as mohair, piqué, or gray or buff linen. The skirts of riding dresses are worn much shorter now than formerly; they are a yard and a half long, and from three yards and three-quarters to four yards wide. The front and side breadths are gored toward the top, so that the skirt hangs as smoothly as possible in the front. The back breadths are straight, and are arranged in deep pleats at the top, which are turned toward the back. The front and side breadths of the skirt, however, may also be cut straight at the sides. Face the bottom of the skirt with a strip of the material four inches wide, in which leaden bullets are sewed to weigh it down.

EMBROIDERED VELVET JACKET. FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 38–40.

Fig. 1.—CLOTH RIDING HABIT. This riding habit is made of dark blue cloth. The fronts of the waist, which overlap as shown by the illustration, are folded over in revers, the back of the waist is furnished with small basques. For the waist cut of cloth and shirting lining two pieces each from Figs. 16 and 17, Supplement. Cut the collar of cloth from Fig. 18, Supplement. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 22, No. V., of the present Supplement. First baste the material on the lining, sew up the darts in the fronts, and join them with the back according to the corresponding figures, having first sewed up the back from 33 to 34. Face the under side of the basques with cloth, and fold them over in revers along the dotted lines given. Join the collar with the neck of the waist according to the corresponding figures, face the under side of the collar in one piece with the fronts, an inch and a quarter beyond the dotted line, with cloth, and also face the fronts with the same material. Fold the fronts and the collar over on the outside along the dotted line, bind the outer edge of the waist narrowly with black silk braid, and furnish it with buttons and button-holes. Fasten the basque revers by means of a button. Sew up the sleeves in the usual manner, face the bottom with a strip of silk an inch and three-quarters wide, and trim them as shown by the illustration, and sew them into the corded armholes after gathering each from * to :. Fine linen chemisette with collar. High hat of black silk felt, trimmed with a gray gauze veil.

LADIES'-CLOTH JACKET WITH CAPE.—FRONT.
For description see Supplement.

VELVET JACKET WITH BASQUE.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 35–37.

Fig. 2.—BRAIDED CLOTH RIDING HABIT. This riding habit is made of dark green cloth, braided with black woolen cord and furnished with jet buttons. Cut the waist from Figs. 10–18, No. V., Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 32, Vol. IV.; the basques, however, are without the points indicated there. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 22, No. V., of the present Supplement. Black silk felt hat with black tulle and lace veil.

Fig. 3.—MOHAIR RIDING HABIT. This riding habit is made of gray mohair. The heart-shaped basque-waist is furnished with a gros grain binding of the same color and with gray buttons. To make the waist, cut of mohair and shirting lining two pieces each from Figs. 19, 20, and 22, Supplement; leave an inch and a quarter extra material at the front edge of Fig. 19, and cut one piece from Fig. 21. Baste the material on the lining, sew up the darts in the fronts, cut a slit along the double line, and hem the extra material down on the under side. At the middle of the back cut a slit from the under edge to * along the double line given, and join the back, side form, and fronts according to the corresponding figures. Arrange the back and side forms in pleats at the bottom of the waist, bringing each × on Figs. 20 and 21 on ● of Fig. 21. Bind the waist with gros grain three-quarters of an inch wide, and furnish the waist with hooks and eyes and buttons. The eyes are sewed on at the same time with a fly of the requisite length. Sew up the sleeves from 46 to 47, face them at the bottom with a strip of lustring an inch and three-quarters wide, bind them, and set them into the corded armholes, bringing 47 on 40 of the back, having first gathered them from * to :. Chemisette with lace frill. Blue cravat bow. Round straw hat, trimmed with black velvet ribbon and feathers. Hair brushed back, slightly crimped, and tied with a blue ribbon. Buff gauntlet gloves.

IDLE PEOPLE.

IT is the habit to declaim against an idle life, and to assert that a man must do something. Of course he must; but there is a great deal to do in being idle. I am not speaking of foolish idlers. Believe me, a man with fair faculties and the power to be idle is sure to become superior to a man in business possessing similar faculties. First of all, the man who is allowed to do exactly as he likes pleases himself and is pleasant to others.

If he has a pretty wife, he takes time to look at her, and notices the bloom on her cheek and the wave of her hair. She naturally wishes to be seen to advantage, and comes down to breakfast, rather late it may be, but smiling and well dressed. The lazy man reads his paper slowly, as it should be read; he hails with delight the announcement of a new book, and talks of it to his wife; when he is gone to lounge at his club, she reads it, and is able to talk over its contents with him when he comes home. Idle people are the first to notice the budding green leaves, and heartily to welcome them; in fact, treasures of all kinds are heaped up for their special enjoyment, which they can leisurely admire. The world is theirs.

The man who can vary his pursuits, and has time for every thing—for himself, for his wife, for his children, for his friends—alone understands what it is to live. Why should we rush through existence at such a pace? Hurried people complain that they are not happy. They should stoop and pick up every crumb of happiness that lies in their way, instead of forever hastening forward and pining for what they have not. We should profit by the little we all possess; pause and enjoy it at rest. Man was never intended to be the mere machine he makes himself.

I have quite a tender feeling for idle people. Is not a cozy chat pleasant? Is not a lounge amusing? And a drive or a ride at all odd hours, and a nap when it is too hot, are not to be despised. I love the society of those who have no aim, who are contented to live, to gossip, and to be good-tempered. On the day when all men will be in business there will be no more artists, no more writers, no more clever people—no such useless beings.

The greed for money grows greater every day, and life never was so little enjoyed. Of old people walked through life with an easy step, traveled by short journeys, and spent their money in a careless way; still they found doing but little a most fascinating occupation, and it did not make them love life the less. People in these degenerate days plume themselves on being economical, and it is no longer the fashion to be regardless of money. Even the extravagant note down their expenses. What would a rich man of our day say if he were to see an enormous wood fire burning in his kitchen, apparently for no purpose, and, on inquiring the use of it, were to be told that the ashes were the cook's perquisites? Such an answer was given to a French duke of the last century, who only laughed at the reply. It may be taken for granted that he did not see his weekly bills. A house in which there is a good deal of waste is generally very comfortable. The mistress does not spoil her temper by thinking of the price of sugar, the servants are good-humored, the guests are always welcomed, and the poor are bid to eat and drink. Of course this is a very wicked state of things, but not the less a very pleasant one.

Rich men nowadays look out for wives who are good housekeepers. Of yore they wished only for a sweet face and a loving heart, and did not desire a bride to hang the key of the tea-chest to her waistband. No thought was taken as to whether the expenses were a dollar more or less, nor was inquiry made as to the disposal of yesterday's fare.

The practice of locking up and the hoarding of crumbs was taught us by business people. Society can not exist where they are in a majority. I do not say that they will not give dinners and balls, which may be numerous and magnificent; but still there is no society; there can be none when those who meet together have all the same train of thought, the same absorbing desire.

Society is impossible without idle people. It is they who constitute society's charm, because they live only for amusement, and make it an art to please and flatter; they have time to listen to the witty sayings, and to prepare the joke that will enliven the dinner-table; they may sit up till the small hours, and not be haunted with the thought of being forced to get up early the next morning. Idle people occasionally bore themselves, and therefore bend all their energies on the one thought of how they can best be amused. Business men, who always find the day too short, have no need of any thing to make it pass away; it slips through their hands, and only leaves them a little richer.

What then? Well, I make an earnest appeal to my readers not to lose the art of being idle. The idle man, remember, has time to be useful. He alone is a true member of society; he alone can be a loving and attentive husband and a watchful father; he alone can be an agreeable friend and a patient listener; he alone dresses well, flirts well; he alone will peruse these pages: and in him I confide.

THE ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY.

THE noblest library of ancient times, and that which people have heard most about, was the Alexandrian Library, founded by Ptolemy Soter. The Ptolemies who succeeded enriched it by many valuable additions; and each of them adopted, it is said, some rather off-handed measures in the furtherance of the good work. All books imported into Egypt by foreigners were seized and sent to the Museum. Here they were transcribed by clerks appointed for the purpose. That done, the copies were delivered to the proprietors, and the originals were deposited in the library. The career of this famous library was always precarious. More than once it was plundered, or partially destroyed by fire, until it was at last utterly destroyed by the Saracens, under the caliph Omar, A.D. 642.

To show the wonderful extent of the Alexandrian Library, it may be mentioned that the volumes of parchment or papyrus were distributed to the four thousand baths of the city; and such was their incredible number that six months hardly sufficed to burn them. Amrou, the victorious general, was strongly opposed to such an act of wanton destruction; but the fanatical caliph was inexorable. "If," said he, "these writings of the Greeks agree with the Koran, they are useless, and need not be preserved; if they do not, they are pernicious, and ought to be destroyed." Next to the Alexandrian Library, that of Pergamus was most conspicuous, and, according to Plutarch, contained two hundred thousand volumes. This library was presented by Mark Antony to Cleopatra, as a nucleus for a new library at Alexandria. When Constantine the Great transferred the seat of his empire to Byzantium he ordered minute search to be made for any books that might perchance have escaped the fury of the pagan persecutor, Diocletian, and formed the whole into a library at Constantinople. The number of volumes was small in the beginning; but, being successively enlarged by later emperors, it was augmented to one hundred and twenty thousand volumes. Of these, however, more than one-half were burned by the command of Leo III., whose object was to destroy all the records and writings that might militate against his own ideas in favor of idolatry. In this library was deposited the only authentic copy of the Council of Nice. It is said also to have contained the poems of Homer, written in gold letters on the entrail of a serpent, together with a magnificent copy of the Four Gospels, bound in plates of gold and enriched with precious stones. All these, however, were lost in the fire. The ultimate fate of this library is a subject of much dispute. On the fall of Constantinople the learned men of Greece were dispersed over different parts of Western Europe. Mohammed, however, gave orders that the imperial library should be saved, and, according to some accounts, it was closely preserved in some apartments of the seraglio. Ultimately, it is said, Amurath II., in a fit of devotion, caused it to be destroyed. Others think that it fell into decay from ignorance or neglect. A curious discussion has arisen, however, as to whether the library of the sultan does not contain some valuable Latin and Greek manuscripts, the last remaining fragments of the library of Constantine. Tischendorf, writing in 1845, thinks that "the seraglio of the sultan conceals ancient and valuable MSS., though complete obscurity prevails as to their contents;" and he asks who, in our day, would have believed in the existence of "walled-up" libraries; yet a walled-up library was lately one of the mysteries of Cairo. We are afraid that Tischendorf is too sanguine; for the intimate relations of the Western powers with the Sublime Porte which have been brought about in recent years could hardly have failed to settle the long-mooted question.

DREAMS AND REALITIES.

BY PHŒBE CARY.

O ROSAMOND, thou fair and good,
And perfect flower of womanhood,
Thou royal rose of June,
Why didst thou droop before thy time?
Why wither in thy first sweet prime?
Why didst thou die so soon?

For looking backward through my tears
On thee, and on my wasted years,
I can not choose but say,
If thou hadst lived to be my guide,
Or thou hadst lived and I had died,
'Twere better far to-day.

O child of light, O golden head—
Bright sunbeam for one moment shed
Upon life's lonely way—
Why didst thou vanish from our sight?
Could they not spare my little light
From heaven's unclouded day?

O friend so true, O friend so good—
Thou one dream of my maidenhood,
That gave youth all its charms—
What had I done, or what hadst thou,
That through this lonesome world till now
We walk with empty arms?

And yet, had this poor soul been fed
With all it loved and coveted—
Had life been always fair—
Would these dear dreams that ne'er depart,
That thrill with bliss my inmost heart,
Forever tremble there?

If still they kept their earthly place,
The friends I held in my embrace,
And gave to death, alas!
Could I have learned that clear, calm faith
That looks beyond the bounds of death,
And almost longs to pass?

Sometimes, I think, the things we see
Are shadows of the things to be;
That what we plan we build;
That every hope that hath been crossed,
And every dream we thought was lost,
In heaven shall be fulfilled;

That even the children of the brain
Have not been born and died in vain,
Though here unclothed and dumb;
But on some brighter, better shore
They live, embodied evermore,
And wait for us to come.

And when on that last day we rise,
Caught up between the earth and skies,
Then shall we hear our Lord
Say, Thou hast done with doubt and death;
Henceforth, according to thy faith,
Shall be thy faith's reward.

SUMMER DRINKS.

IS it not a want of appreciation that, while the Prince of Wales at his entertainments at Chiswick has a tent set apart for American drinks, so few of our housewives know how refreshing they are, or how they should be concocted? Persons should drink copiously in warm weather to keep up the flow of perspiration, which relieves the system and cools the surface. Advantage may be taken of this to add such stimulating and purifying ingredients as will counteract the effects of debilitating heat. We want to drink in summer instead of eating. Fruits and salads, the natural summer food, are largely composed of water to meet this demand. The complement of beverages at the command of families is usually limited to narcotic drinks—tea and coffee and lemonade, with wine and water for a special indulgence. Now, since every thing that is worth doing at all is worth doing well, a lady ought to set more variety of drinks, and of better composition, before her family and guests. What washy mixtures have we been invited to taste from the huge punch-bowl in the corner, whose ingredients were of vaguest import! The liquid was reddish, so we fancied there must be wine in it; and there were slices of lemon floating in it, so we believed in the acid flavor which strove with that of extra sweetness; but by far the controlling taste was that of Croton, Schuylkill, or Potomac, as the case might be. Had the hostess no sense of flavor, or did she consider her guests of too little account to prepare carefully for them? You can't eat a dry sandwich or drink tasteless punch in a person's house without undervaluing her capability or her hospitality afterward. By no means is this a plea for exhaustive entertainments or feasts in any oppressive sense; only, be the refreshment offered never so slight, it ought always to be the best of its kind. If you decide to have only creams and ices, see that they are nicely beaten and of different flavors. Almond and banana creams are most delicate, coffee and pine-apple are generally approved; so let vanilla and chocolate rest for a season. So with the claret cup and Roman punch.

To begin with the simplest beverage—LEMONADE. Grate the rind off the lemons, which should be rolled to make them easy to press. Put them under a small pastry-board or a slate, and roll them with it. A minute will do the work for a dozen. In the want of a silver lemon-squeezer a homely but helpful substitute may be found in a new clothes-pin, that will hold the slices and press them well. Lemonade is all the better for standing half an hour before drinking, for the sugar, acid, and wine—if used—to mix. Then strain, put in the ice, and serve in crystal pitchers. It is a poor affectation to serve lemonade from a punch-bowl. Travelers who may find themselves "twenty miles from a lemon" will do well to carry a little packet of citric acid to make a refreshing drink in case of slight illness, as nothing so readily averts sick headache and bilious disorders as to drink plenty of sour lemonade, for which citric drinks are the best substitutes, as they contain the acid of lemons and limes. The extract of lemon flavors such drinks so that they can not readily be told from the real juice of the fruit. Convenient lemon-sugars are prepared and sold ready for use. These substitutes, however, are recommended only in case of emergency; the fruit itself is the best.

PERRY is a delightful drink made from cherries, and the extract is prepared in this way to keep a year. To six pounds of cherries add a pint and a half of water; bruise, boil, and strain; then add three pounds of sugar; boil down till the liquid jellies. To prepare the drink, put a spoonful of jelly in a goblet of water; let it dissolve by standing ten minutes; stir and ice.

TEA PUNCH.—Infuse two ounces of hyson tea and an ounce of black in three quarts of boiling water. Add four pounds of loaf-sugar, citric acid and spirit of citron each six drams, and one pint of blackberry brandy. Mix well, and serve in porcelain cups.

BISHOP is the name of an old English and Continental drink which is a favorite with ladies, and recommended as a refreshing stomachic. A large quince is stuck full of cloves, and roasted before the fire till it is thoroughly soft. Pour a bottle of claret into a silver saucepan, with four ounces of honey and the rind of a lemon or bitter orange and the spiced quince. Heat these together, and you have a drink fit to be offered in solid goblet to a bishop or any prelate. This is a sumptuous beverage, only to be prepared and drank from silver, as iron or any other metal, at any stage of the performance, would spoil the whole.

CLARET CUP is so fashionable that in England the reputation of some ladies' hospitality depends on the quality of this alone. It is to be handed round in a great silver cup with two handles, and the guest grasps by both, and drinks deep, after which the brim is wiped by a clean napkin passed for the purpose through one of the handles. Doesn't this remind you of the old Knickerbocker ladies, who used to carry a napkin to church to wipe the goblet at communion after it had been passed to less august lips? In either case the custom is not to be disregarded. Claret cup is made with one bottle of claret to one—some say two—of soda or seltzer water; this to be well iced, and not put to the wine till the drink is wanted. Flavor the claret with four spoonfuls of powdered sugar, a little nutmeg, a small glass of maraschino, or two of sherry, and put a sprig of green borage in the cup, or tie a little bruised borage in a muslin bag. About half a pound of powdered ice will be required for this amount of cup.

CHAMPAGNE CUP is made with one bottle of Champagne to one of soda-water sweetened to taste, or not at all—the wine to be well iced before mixing, and a thick slice of cucumber put into it instead of borage.

REGENT'S PUNCH is made with a bottle of Champagne, a quarter of a pint of brandy, the juice of a lemon, a Seville orange, and a wine-glass of Martinique. With this mix a pint or more of a strong green tea, strained, and sirup or sugar to taste.

PUNCH À LA ROMAINE.—Take a quart of lemon ice, add the whites of three eggs well beaten with brandy till the ice liquefies, with water to taste. Then add a tea-cup of strong green tea, strained, and a little Champagne.

MILK PUNCH.—Pare six oranges and six lemons as thin as you can; grate them over with sugar to get out the flavor. Steep the peels in a bottle of brandy corked close twenty-four hours. Squeeze the fruit on two pounds of sugar, add four quarts of water and one of new milk boiling hot, stir the brandy into the whole, run through a jelly-bag till clear, bottle and cork close immediately. The finer the strainer is, the better the punch.

SHERBETS of various kinds are the juice of fruits or berries, mixed with half as much water and sweetened to taste, and filled with powdered ice. A good way to get the flavor of fruits for this purpose is to boil them and strain the juice, letting it stand till cold, and preparing with sugar and ice. These are always better five minutes after the ice is put in.

ICED TEA and COFFEE are made delicious with sugar and a spoonful of brandy to each cup. Lemon may be sliced in tea and orgeat added to coffee if one fancies. Blackberry or fruit brandy of any sort is delicious in coffee.

RAISIN WINE.—Boil as much water as you want for the wine, and allow it to become perfectly cold. This purifies it. Take eight pounds of Malaga raisins to each gallon of water, taking out only the large stalks. Put them in a sound sweet cask, putting in fruit and water alternately till the cask is full, pressing the raisins well down in it. Lay the bung lightly over. Stir the wine every day or two, keeping the cask full by adding water that has boiled and cooled. In six or seven weeks, when the fermentation has ceased, press in the bung firmly, and leave the wine untouched for twelve months. Draw it off at that time into a clean cask, and fine it with isinglass tied in a muslin bag and suspended in it. This is a good recipe for making wine for sacramental occasions.

GINGER LIQUEUR, excellent for stomach complaints, cramps, etc.—One ounce and a half of ginger, one pound and a half of black currants, one quart of white brandy, one pound of loaf-sugar. Let them stand together three or four days, and strain through a cloth. Dissolve a pound of double-refined loaf-sugar in a little boiling water, when cold mix it all together, strain through flannel, and bottle for use.

PUFFING.

THE origin of the popular catch-word "puffing" is curious. In France, at one time, the coiffure most in vogue was called a pouf. It consisted of the hair raised as high as possible over horse-hair cushions, and then ornamented with objects indicative of the tastes and history of the wearer. The Duchess of Orleans, for example, on her first appearance at court after the birth of her son and heir, had on her pouf a representation, in gold and enamel, most beautifully executed, of a nursery. There was the cradle and the baby, the nurse, and a whole host of playthings. Madame D'Egmont, the Duke de Richelieu's daughter, after her father had taken Port Mahon, wore on her pouf a little diamond fortress, with sentinels keeping guard. Such is the origin of the word puff.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.

"HE'S SWEETEST FRIEND OR HARDEST FOE."

MR. GRANGER fell into the habit of strolling across his park, and dropping into the garden of Mill Cottage by that little gate across which Clarissa had so often contemplated the groves and shades of her lost home. He would drop in sometimes in the gloaming, and take a cup of tea in the bright lamp-lit parlor, where Mr. Lovel dawdled away life over Greek plays, Burton's "Anatomy," and Sir Thomas Brown—a humble apartment, which seemed pleasanter to Mr. Granger, under the dominion of that spell which bound him just now, than the most luxurious of his medieval chambers. Here he would talk politics with Mr. Lovel, who took a mild interest in the course of public affairs, and whose languid adherence to the Conservative party served to sustain discussion with Daniel Granger, who was a vigorous Liberal.

After tea the visitor generally asked for music; and Clarissa would play her favorite waltzes and mazurkas, while the two gentlemen went on with their conversation. There were not many points of sympathy between the two, perhaps. It is doubtful whether Daniel Granger had ever read a line of a Greek play since his attainment of manhood and independence, though he had been driven along the usual highway of the classics by expensive tutors, and had a dim remembrance of early drillings in Cæsar and Virgil. Burton he had certainly never looked into, nor any of those other English classics which were the delight of Marmaduke Lovel; so the subject of books was a dead letter between them. But they found enough to talk about somehow, and really seemed to get on very tolerably together. Mr. Granger was bent upon standing well with his poor neighbor; and Mr. Lovel appeared by no means displeased by the rapid growth of this acquaintance, from which he had so obstinately recoiled in the past. He took care, however, not to be demonstrative of his satisfaction, and allowed Mr. Granger to feel that at the best he was admitted to Mill Cottage on sufferance, under protest, as it were, and as a concession to his own wishes. Yet Mr. Lovel meant all this time that his daughter should be mistress of Arden Court, and that his debts should be paid and his future comfort provided for out of the ample purse of Daniel Granger.

"I shall go and live on the Continent," he thought, "when that is all settled. I could not exist as a hanger-on in the house that was once my own. I would find myself a pied-à-terre in Paris or Vienna, and finish life pleasantly enough among some of the friends I liked when I was young. Six or seven hundred a year would be opulence for a man of my habits in a place like Paris."

Little by little Clarissa came to accept those visits of Mr. Granger's as a common part of her daily life; but she had not the faintest notion that she was drifting into a position from which it would be difficult by-and-by to escape. He paid her no disagreeable attentions; he never alluded to that unfortunate declaration which she remembered with such a sense of its absurdity. It did not seem unreasonable to suppose that he came to Mill Cottage for no keener delight than a quiet chat with Mr. Lovel about the possibility of a coming war or the chances of a change in the ministry.

Clarissa had been home from Hale nearly six weeks, and she had neither heard nor seen any more of George Fairfax. So far there had been no temptation for the violation of that sacred pledge which she had given to Lady Laura Armstrong. His persistence did not amount to much evidently; his ardor was easily checked; he had sworn that night that she should see him, should listen to him, and six weeks had gone by without his having made the faintest attempt to approach her. It was best, of course, that it should be so—an unqualified blessing for the girl, whose determination to be true to herself and her duty was so deeply fixed; and yet she felt a little wounded, a little humiliated, as if she had been tricked by the common phrases of a general wooer—duped into giving something where nothing had been given to her.

"Lady Laura might well talk about his transient folly," she said to herself. "It has not lasted very long. She need scarcely have taken the trouble to be uneasy about it."

There had been one brief note for Clarissa from the mistress of Hale Castle, announcing her departure for Baden with Mr. Armstrong, who was going to shoot capercailzies in the Black Forest. Lady Geraldine, who was very much shaken by her father's death, was to go with them. There was not a word about Mr. Fairfax, and Clarissa had no idea as to his whereabouts. He had gone with the Baden party most likely, she told herself.

It was near the close of October. The days were free from rain or blusterous winds, but dull and gray. The leaves were falling silently in the woods about Arden, and the whole scene wore that aspect of subdued mournfulness which is pleasant enough to the light of heart, but very sad to those who mourn. Clarissa Lovel was not light-hearted. She had discovered of late that there was something wanting in her life. The days were longer and drearier than they used to be. Every day she awoke with a faint sense of expectation that was like an undefined hope; something would come to pass, something would happen to her before the day was done, to quicken the sluggish current of her life; and at nightfall, when the uneventful day had passed in its customary blankness, her heart would grow very heavy. Her father watched her somewhat anxiously at this crisis of her life, and was inwardly disturbed on perceiving her depression.

She went out into the garden alone one evening after dinner, as it was her wont to do almost every evening, leaving Mr. Lovel dozing luxuriously in his easy-chair by the fire—she went out alone in the chill gray dusk, and paced the familiar walks, between borders in which there were only pale autumnal flowers, chrysanthemums and China-asters of faint yellow and fainter purple. Even the garden looked melancholy in this wan light, Clarissa thought. She made the circuit of the small domain, walked up and down the path by the mill stream two or three times, and then went into the leafless orchard, where gnarled old trees cast black shadows, grim and misshapen, upon the close-cropped grass. A week-old moon had just risen, pale in the lessening twilight. The landscape had a cold, shadowy beauty of its own; but to-night every thing seemed wan and cheerless to Clarissa.

She was near the gate leading into Arden Park, when she heard a crackling of the dry leaves, the sound of an approaching footstep. It was Mr. Granger, of course. She gave a sigh of resignation. Another evening of the pattern which had grown so familiar to her that it seemed almost as if Mr. Granger must have been dropping in every evening all her life. The usual talk of public matters, the leaders in that day's Times, and so on. The usual request for a little music, the usual inquiries about her recent artistic studies. It was as monotonous as the lessons she had learned at Madame Marot's seminary.

"Is my life to go on like that for ever?" she asked herself.

The step came a little nearer. Surely it was lighter and quicker than Daniel Granger's—it had a sharp military sound; it was like a step she had learned to know very well in the gardens of Hale Castle.

"He is at Baden," she said to herself.

But the beating of her heart grew faster in spite of that tranquilizing assurance. She heard an unaccustomed hand trying the fastening of the gate, then a bolt withdrawn, the sharp light step upon the turf behind her, and in the next moment George Fairfax was by her side, among the weird shadows of the old orchard trees.

He tried to draw her toward him, with the air of an accepted lover.

"My darling!" he said, "I knew I should find you here. I had a fancy that you would be here, waiting for me in the pale moonlight."

Clarissa laughed—rather an artificial little laugh; but she felt the situation could only be treated lightly; and the foolish, passionate heart was beating so fast all the time, and the pale face might have told so much if the light of the new-risen moon had not been dim as yet.

"How long do you suppose I have been waiting at this spot for you, Mr. Fairfax?" she asked, lightly. "For six weeks?"

"Six weeks! Yes, it is six weeks since I saw you. It might be six years, if I were to measure the time by my own impatience. I have been at Nice, Clarissa, almost ever since that night we parted."

"At Nice! with Lady Laura and Lady Geraldine, I suppose. I thought they were going to Baden."

"They are at Baden; but I have not been with them. I left England with my mother, who had a very bad attack of her chronic asthma earlier than usual this year, and was ordered off to the South of France, where she is obliged to spend all her winters, poor soul. I went with her, and staid till she was set up again in some measure. I was really uneasy about her; and it was a good excuse for getting away from Hale."

Clarissa murmured some conventional expression of sympathy, but that was all.

"My darling," said George Fairfax, taking her cold hand in his—she tried to withdraw it, but it was powerless in that firm grasp—"my darling, you know why I have come here, and you know now why my coming has been so long delayed. I could not write to you. The Fates are against us, Clarissa, and I do not expect much favor from your father. So I feared that a letter might do us mischief, and put off every thing till I could come. I said a few words to Laura Armstrong before I left the Castle—not telling her very much, but giving her a strong hint of the truth. I don't think she'll be surprised by any thing I may do; and my letters to Geraldine have all been written to prepare the way for our parting. I know she will be generous; and if my position with regard to her is rather a despicable one, I have done all I could to make the best of it. I have not made things worse by deceit or double-dealing. I should have boldly asked for my freedom before this, but I hear such bad accounts of poor Geraldine, who seems to be dreadfully grieved by her father's loss, that I have put off all idea of any direct explanation for the present. I am not the less resolved, however, Clarissa."

Miss Lovel turned her face toward him for the first time, and looked at him with a proud, steady gaze. She had given her promise, and was not afraid that any thing, not even his tenderest, most passionate pleading, could ever tempt her to break it; but she knew more and more that she loved him—that it was his absence and silence which had made her life so blank, that his coming was the event she had waited and watched for day after day.

"Why should you break faith with Lady Geraldine?" she asked, calmly.

"Why! Because my bondage has been hateful to me ever since I came to Hale. Because there is only one woman I will have for my wife—and her name is Clarissa Lovel!"

"You had better keep your word, Mr. Fairfax. I was quite in earnest in what I said to you six weeks ago. Nothing in the world would ever induce me to have any part in your breach of faith. Why, even if I loved you—" (her voice trembled a little here, and George Fairfax repeated the words after her, "Even if you loved me")—"I could never trust you. How could I hope that, after having been so false to her, you could be true to me?"

"I never pretended to love Geraldine Challoner as I love you; I never professed any passionate devotion. We were friends of long standing, and our marriage seemed a suitable thing; that was all. I swear to you, Clarissa, I never pledged myself to more than that. And it was only when I came to know you that I found myself capable of more than that; that I made the glad discovery I had not wasted the whole of my heart upon the follies of my youth; that I could still love with force and fervor. It was a glad discovery, my dear one, in spite of the confusion that came with it. Clarissa, for pity's sake, be reasonable, and don't let any high-flown notion of duty mislead you in this business. Come what may, I shall never marry Lady Geraldine. All possibility of that is over. Take back those words, Clary, 'Even if I loved you.' Tell me that you do love me, as I have hoped and dreamed—as I dared to believe sometimes at Hale, when my wedding-day was so near that I seemed like some wretch bound to the wheel, for whom there is no possibility of escape. That is all over now, darling. To all intents and purposes I am free. Confess that you love me." This was said half tenderly, half imperiously—with the air of a conqueror accustomed to easy triumphs, an air which this man's experience had made natural to him. "Come, Clarissa, think how many miles I have traveled for the sake of this one stolen half hour. Don't be so inexorable."

He looked down at her with a smile on his face, not very much alarmed by her obduracy. It seemed to him only a new form of feminine eccentricity. Here was a woman who actually could resist him for ten minutes at a stretch—him, George Fairfax!

"I am very sorry you should have come so far. I am very sorry you should have taken so much trouble; it is quite wasted."

"Then you don't like me, Miss Lovel?" still half playfully—the thing was too impossible to be spoken of in any other tone. "For some reason or other I am obnoxious to you. Look me full in the face, and swear that you don't care a straw for me."

"I am not going to swear any thing so foolish. You are not obnoxious to me. I have no wish to forfeit your friendship; but I will not hear of any thing more than friendship from your lips."

"Why not?"

"For many reasons. In the first place, because there would be treason against Lady Geraldine in my listening to you."

"Put that delusion out of your mind. There would be no treason; all is over between Lady Geraldine and me."

"There are other reasons, connected with papa."

"Oh, your father is against me. Yes, that is only natural. Any more reasons, Clarissa?"

"One more."

"What is that?"

"I can not tell you."

"But I insist upon being told."

She tried her uttermost to avoid answering his questions; but he was persistent, and she admitted at last that she had promised not to listen to him.

"To whom was the promise given?"

"That is my secret."

"To your father?"

"That is my secret, Mr. Fairfax. You can not extort it from me. And now I must go back to papa, if you please, or he will be sending some one to look for me."

"And I shall be discovered in Mr. Capulet's orchard. Ten minutes more, Clarissa, and I vanish amidst the woods of Arden, through which I came like a poacher in order to steal upon you unawares by that little gate. And now, my darling, since we have wasted almost all our time in fencing with words, let us be reasonable. Promises such as you speak of are pledges given to the winds. They can not hold an hour against true love. Listen, Clary, listen."

And then came the pleading of a man only too well accustomed to plead—a man this time very much in earnest; words that seemed to Clarissa full of a strange eloquence; tones that went to her heart of hearts. But she had given her promise, and with her that promise meant something very sacred. She was firm to the last—firm even when those thrilling tones changed from love to anger, and at last grew more and more bitter, till they were as sharp as those wordy daggers which Hamlet the Dane sent home to his mother's guilty heart.

All that he said toward the end she scarcely knew, for there was a dizziness in her brain that confused her, and her chiefest fear was that she should drop fainting at his feet; but the last words of all struck upon her ear with a cruel distinctness, and were never forgotten.

"I am the merest fool and school-boy to take this matter so deeply to heart," he said, with a scornful laugh, "when the reason of my rejection is so self-evident. What I saw at Hale Castle might have taught me wisdom. Even with my improved prospects I am little better than a pauper compared to Daniel Granger. And I have heard you say that you would give all the world to win back Arden Court. I will stand aside, and make way for a wealthier suitor. Perhaps we may meet again some day, and I may not be so unfortunate as my father."

He was gone. Clarissa stood like a statue, with her hands clasped before her face. She heard the gate shut by a violent hand. He was gone in supreme anger, with scorn and insult upon his lips, believing her the basest of the base, the meanest of the mean, she told herself. The full significance of his last words she was unable to understand, but it seemed to her that they veiled a threat.

She was going back to the house slowly, tearless, but with something like despair in her heart, when she heard the orchard gate open again. He had come back, perhaps—returned to forgive and pity her. No, that was not his footstep; it was Mr. Granger, looking unspeakably ponderous and commonplace in the moonlight as he came across the shadowy grass toward her.

"I thought I saw a white dress among the trees," he said, holding out his hand to her for the usual greeting. "How deadly cold your hand is, Miss Lovel! Is it quite prudent of you to be out so late on such a chilly evening, and in that thin dress? I think I must ask your papa to lecture you."

"Pray don't, Mr. Granger; I am not in the habit of catching cold, and I am used to being in the gardens at all times and seasons. You are late."

"Yes; I have been at Holborough all day, and dined an hour later than usual. Your papa is quite well, I hope?"

"He is just the same as ever. He is always more or less of an invalid, you know."

They came in sight of the broad bay-window of the parlor at this moment, and the fire-light within revealed Mr. Lovel in a very comfortable aspect, fast asleep, with his pale aristocratic-looking face relieved by the crimson cushions of his capacious easy-chair, and the brown setter's head on his knee. There were some books on the table close to his chair, but it was evident that his studies since dinner had not been profound.

Clarissa and her companion went in at a half-glass door that opened into a small lobby next the parlor. She knew that to open the window at such an hour in the month of October was an unpardonable crime in her father's eyes. They went into the room very softly; but Mr. Lovel, who was a light sleeper, started up at their entrance, and declared with some show of surprise that he must have been indulging in a nap.

"I was reading a German critic on the Orestea," he said. "Those Germans are clever, but too much given to paradoxes. Ring the bell for tea, Clary. I didn't think we should see you to-night, Granger; you said you were going to a dinner at Sir Archer Taverham's."

"I was engaged to dine with Sir Archer; but I wrote him a note this morning excusing myself upon the plea of gout. I really had a few twinges last night, and I hate dinner-parties."

"I am glad you have so much wisdom. I don't think any man under a Talleyrand or an Alvanley can make a masculine dinner worth going to; and as for your mixed herds of men and women, every man past thirty knows that kind of thing to be an abomination."

The rosy-faced parlor-maid brought in the lamp and the tea-things, and Clarissa sat quietly down to perform her nightly duties. She took her seat in the full light of the lamp, with no evidence of emotion on her face, and poured out the tea, and listened and replied to Mr. Granger's commonplace remarks just the same as usual, though the sound of another voice was in her ear—the bitter, passionate sound of words that had been almost curses.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"IT MEANS ARDEN COURT."

THE time went by, and Daniel Granger pursued his wooing, his tacit undemonstrative courtship, with the quiet persistence of a man who meant to win. He came to Mill Cottage almost every evening throughout the late autumn and early winter months, and Clarissa was fain to endure his presence and to be civil to him. She had no ground for complaint, no opportunity for rebellion. His visits were not made ostensibly on her account, though friends, neighbors, and servants knew very well why he came, and had settled the whole business in their gossiping little coteries. Nor did he take upon himself the airs of a lover. He was biding his time, content to rejoice in the daily presence of the woman he loved; content to wait till custom should have created a tie between them, and till he could claim her for his wife by right of much patience and fidelity. He had an idea that no woman, pure and true as he believed this woman to be, could shut her heart against an honest man's love, if he were only patient and faithful, single-minded and unselfish, in his wooing.

George Fairfax kept his word. From the hour of that bitter parting he made no sign of his existence to Clarissa Lovel. The Armstrongs were still in Germany when December came, and people who had any claim upon Lady Laura's hospitality lamented loudly that there were to be no gayeties at the Castle this year. It was the second Christmas that the family had been absent. Mr. Fairfax was with them at Baden most likely, Clarissa thought; and she tried to hope that it was so.

Christmas came, and Miss Lovel had to assist at Miss Granger's triumphs. That young lady was in full force at this time of year, dealing out blankets of the shaggiest and most uncompromising textures—such coverings as might have suited the requirements of a sturdy Highlander or a stalwart bush-ranger sleeping in the open air, but seemed scarcely the pleasantest gifts for poor, feeble old women or asthmatic old men—and tickets representative of small donations in kind, such as a quart of split pease or a packet of prepared groats, with here and there the relief of a couple of ounces of tea. Against plums and currants and candied peel Miss Granger set her face, as verging on frivolity. The poor, who are always given to extravagance, would be sure to buy these for themselves: witness the mountain of currants embellished with little barrows of citron and orange-peel, and the moorland of plums adorned with arabesques of Jamaica ginger in the little holly-hung chandler's shop at Arden. Split pease and groats were real benefits, which would last when the indigestible delights of plum-pudding were over. Happily for the model villagers, Mr. Granger ordered a bullock and half a dozen tons of coals to be distributed among them, in a large, liberal way that was peculiar to him, without consulting his daughter as to the propriety of the proceeding. She was very busy with the beneficent work of providing her special protégées with the ugliest imaginable winter gowns and frocks. Clarissa, who was eager to contribute something to this good work, had wounded her fingers desperately in the manufacture of these implacable fabrics, which set her teeth on edge every time she touched them. Mr. Lovel would not even allow them to be in the room where he sat.

"If you must work at those unspeakably odious garments, Clarissa," he said, "for pity's sake do it out of my presence. Great Heavens! what cultivator of the Ugly could have invented those loathsome olive greens, or that revolting mud-color? evidently a study from the Thames at low water just above Battersea Bridge. And to think that the poor—to whom nature seems to have given a copyright in warts and wens and boils—should be made still more unattractive by such clothing as that! If you are ever rich, Clarissa, and take to benevolence, think of your landscape before you dress your poor. Give your old women and children scarlet cloaks and soft gray woolen petticoats, and gratify your men with an orange neckerchief now and then, to make a patch of color against your russet winter background."

There were dinner-parties at Arden Court that winter, to which Mr. Lovel consented to take his daughter, obnoxious as he had declared all such festivities to be to him. He went always as a concession to his host's desires, and took care to let Daniel Granger know that his going was an act of self-sacrifice; but he did go, and he gave his daughter a ten-pound note, as a free-will offering, for the purchase of a couple of new dresses.

Clarissa wondered not a little at the distinction with which her father and herself were treated by every one who met them at Mr. Granger's house. She did not know that a good deal of this attention was given to the future mistress of Arden Court, and that, in the eyes of county people and Holborough gentry alike, she stood in that position. She did not know that her destiny was a settled business in every one's mind except her own; that her aunt Oliver and the rector, quite as much as her father, looked upon her marriage with Daniel Granger as inevitable. Mr. Lovel had been careful not to alarm his daughter by any hint of his convictions. He was very well satisfied with the progress of affairs. Daniel Granger was too securely caught for there to be any room for fear of change on his part, and Daniel Granger's mode of carrying on the siege seemed to Mr. Lovel an excellent one. Whatever Clarissa's feelings might have been in the beginning, she must needs succumb before such admirable patience, such almost sublime devotion.

Christmas passed, and the new year and all festivities belonging to the season, and a dreary stretch of winter remained, bleak and ungenial, enlivened only by Christmas bills, the chill prelude of another year of struggle. Toward the end of January Marmaduke Lovel's health broke down all of a sudden. He was really ill, and very fretful in his illness. Those creditors of his became desperately pressing in their demands; almost every morning's post brought him a lawyer's letter; and, however prostrate he might feel, he was obliged to sit up for an hour or so in the day, resting his feverish head upon his hand, while he wrote diplomatic letters for the temporary pacification of impatient attorneys.

Poor Clarissa had a hard time of it in these days. Her father was a difficult patient, and that ever-present terror of insolvency, and all the pains and perils attendant thereupon, tormented her by day and kept her awake at night. Every ring at the cottage gate set her heart beating, and conjured up the vision of some brutal sheriff's officer, such as she had read of in modern romance. She nursed her father with extreme tenderness. He was not confined to his room for any length of time, but was weak and ill throughout the bleak wintry months, with a racking cough and a touch of low fever, lying prostrate for the greater part of the day on a sofa by the fire, and only brightening a little in the evening when Mr. Granger paid his accustomed visit. Clarissa tended him all through these melancholy days, when the rain beat against the windows, and the dull gray sky looked as if it would never more be illuminated by a gleam of sunshine—tended him with supreme patience, and made heroic efforts to cheer and sustain his spirits, though her own heart was very heavy. And so it came to pass that in these most trying days Daniel Granger repeated the avowal of his love, not urging his suit with any hazardous impatience, but offering to wait as long as Clarissa pleased for his sentence. And then, in the midst of the girl's distress at the renewal of this embarrassing declaration, her father spoke to her, and told her plainly that she was in all honor bound to become Mr. Granger's wife. She had suffered him to devote himself to her with a devotion rare in a man of his age and character. She had allowed the outer world to take the business for granted. It would be a cruel wrong done to this man if she were to draw back now and leave him in the lurch.

"Draw back, papa!" she cried, with unmitigated surprise and alarm; "but what have I ever done to give you or Mr. Granger or any one else the slightest justification for supposing I ever thought of him except as the most commonplace acquaintance?"

"That pretense of unconsciousness is the merest affectation, Clarissa. You must have known why Mr. Granger came here."

"I thought he came to see you, papa, just like any other acquaintance."

"Nonsense child; one man does not dance attendance upon another like that—crying off from important dinner-parties in order to drink tea with his neighbor, and that kind of thing. The case has been clear enough from the beginning, and you must have known how it was—especially as Granger made some declaration to you the first time you went to the Court. He told me what he had done in a most honorable manner. It is preposterous to pretend, after that, you could mistake his intentions. I have never worried you about the business; it seemed to me wisest and best to let matters take their natural course, and I am the last of men to play the domestic tyrant in order to force a rich husband upon my daughter; but I never for a moment doubted that you understood Mr. Granger's feelings, and were prepared to reward his patience."

"It can never be, papa," Clarissa said, decisively; "I would not commit such a sin as to marry a man I could not love. I am grateful to Mr. Granger, of course, and very sorry that he should think so much more of me than I deserve, but—"

"For God's sake don't preach," cried her father, fretfully. "You won't have him; that's enough. The only road there was to extrication from my difficulties is shut up. The sheriff's officers can come to-morrow. I'll write no more humbugging letters to those attorneys, trying to stave off the crisis. The sooner the crash comes the better; I can drag out the rest of my existence somehow in Bruges or Louvain. It is only a question of a year or two, I dare say."

The dreary sigh with which Mr. Lovel concluded this speech went to Clarissa's heart. It can scarcely be said that she loved him very dearly, but she pitied him very much. To his mind, no doubt, it seemed a hard thing that she should set her face against a change of fortune that would have insured ease and comfort for his declining years. She knew him weighed down by embarrassments which were very real—which had been known to her before Daniel Granger's appearance as a wooer. There was no pretense about the ruin that menaced them; and it was not strange that her father, who had been loath to move beyond the very outskirts of his lost domain, should shrink with a shuddering dread from exile in a dismal Belgian town.

After that one bitter speech and that one dreary sigh Mr. Lovel made no overt attempt to influence his daughter's decision. He had a more scientific style of game to play, and he knew how to play it. Peevish remonstrances might have availed nothing; threats or angry speeches might have only provoked a spirit of defiance. Mr. Lovel neither complained nor threatened; he simply collapsed. An air of settled misery fell upon him; an utter hopelessness, that was almost resignation, took possession of him. There was an unwonted gentleness in his manner to his daughter; he endured the miseries of weakness and prostration with unaccustomed patience; meekness pervaded all his words and actions, but it was the meekness of despair. And so—and so—this was how the familiar domestic drama came to be acted once more—the old, old story to be repeated. It was Robin Gray over again. If the cow was not stolen, the sheriff's officers were at the door, and, for lack of a broken arm, Marmaduke Lovel did not want piteous silent arguments. He was weak and ill and despairing, and, where threats or jesuitical pleadings would have availed little, his silence did much; until at last, after several long, weary weeks of indecision, during which Mr. Granger had come and gone every evening without making any allusion to his suit, there came one night when Clarissa fell on her knees by her father's sofa and told him that she could not endure the sight of his misery any longer, and that she was willing to be Daniel Granger's wife. Marmaduke Lovel put his feeble arms round his daughter's neck, and kissed her as he had never kissed her before; and then burst into tears, with his face hidden upon her shoulder.

"It was time, Clarissa," he said at last. "I could not have kept the brokers out another week. Granger has been offering to lend me money ever since he began to suspect my embarrassments, but I could not put myself under an obligation to him while I was uncertain of your intentions: it will be easy to accept his help now; and he has made most liberal proposals with regard to your marriage-settlements. Bear witness, Clary, that I never mentioned that till now. I have urged no sordid consideration upon you to bring about this match; although, God knows, it is the thing I desire most in this world."

"No, no, papa, I know that," sobbed Clarissa. And then the image of George Fairfax rose before her, and the memory of those bitter words, "It means Arden Court."

What would he think of her when he should come to hear that she was to be Daniel Granger's wife? It would seem a full confirmation of his basest suspicions. He would never know of her unavailing struggles to escape this doom—never guess her motives for making this sacrifice. He would think of her, in all the days to come, only as a woman who sold herself for the sake of a goodly heritage.

PHŒBE CARY.

IT seems but as yesterday when we laid Alice Cary down under the snow in Greenwood, and made loving record of her worthy graces in the Bazar. Now Phœbe has gone! "They were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided." On Sunday, the 12th of February last, Alice Cary died; on Monday, the 31st of July, Phœbe died. Scarcely one-half of one of our little earthly years kept the sisters apart. They have been so much together in domestic, social, and literary companionship that hardly ever is one mentioned without recalling the other. There never was, probably, any thing so much like a spiritual Siamese twinship between sisters as that which existed between these two, and we can scarcely write of them apart.

Phœbe was born on her father's farm, eight miles from Cincinnati, in 1825, being five years younger than Alice. Here they spent their early years, and here, about the same time, they began writing for the press.

Phœbe's articles in the National Era, published at Washington, first attracted attention to her. For several years the sisters contented themselves with their contributions to periodicals, Phœbe writing much less than Alice. Their first venture in a volume is entitled "Poems by Alice and Phœbe Cary," which was published in 1850 at Philadelphia; but more than two-thirds of the poems were written by the elder sister.

In 1854 appeared, from the press of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, of Boston, a volume of Phœbe's, entitled "Poems and Parodies." Parodies are not generally entitled to a very honorable place in literature, and in later years Phœbe set little value on that part of this volume; but they show the vein of fun and humor that ran through her thoughts, and gave such a delightful vivacity to her conversation.

In 1868 Messrs. Hurd & Houghton published her latest volume, called "Poems of Faith, Hope, and Love." This is altogether the most creditable of her productions. It contains the ripest fruits of her genius. She was collecting much that she has written since with a view to their publication in a volume, but the work was not completed when she was called away.

It ought to be mentioned that in the preface to the "Hymns for all Christians" (published also by Hurd & Houghton) Rev. Dr. Deems acknowledges the great help he had received from her in the compilation.

She wrote almost nothing in prose. So little was she accustomed to that species of composition that when called upon to prepare a sketch of her departed sister for the Ladies' Repository she said that she felt throughout the whole work a great difficulty, not only from the delicacy of the task, but also from her sense of awkwardness in attempting to write any thing in prose. And yet that last product of her pen shows her tact and talent in a remarkable degree, and has been greatly admired.

Phœbe had a good, clear, sound understanding, and was as little touched with maudlin sentiment as any woman we ever saw. She was plain in her tastes, and had always cultivated economical habits. She was free from affectations, her greatest embarrassment arising from her being known as a poet when she had no desire to be conspicuous. She was decidedly womanly in all things, and had a great dislike for any thing that seemed unwomanly in any of her sex, and felt that those whose work called them to be named by the public more frequently than their sisters should draw the veil of modesty more closely about them.

She was decided in many of her religious opinions, but liberal toward those with whom she could not agree. Her church-membership had been in Dr. Cheever's (Congregational) church, but the last years of her life she has communed with the "Church of the Strangers," of which, however, she never became a member, although in warm personal friendship with its pastor, Dr. Deems. She valued Christian character more than church-membership, and was as much at home with her friend the poet Whittier in the simple Quaker meeting-house as in churches whose ritual was elaborate. Many of her poems are deeply religious. One will probably be cherished as long as Christian sentiment shall be preserved in song. Several versions of it have appeared. We give that which she desired to be considered her last revision and authorized version.

One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er:
I'm nearer my home to-day
Than I ever have been before;

Nearer my Father's house,
Where the many mansions be;
Nearer the great white throne,
Nearer the crystal sea;

Nearer the bound of life,
Where we lay our burdens down;
Nearer leaving the cross,
Nearer gaining the crown.

But the waves of that silent sea
Roll dark before my sight,
That brightly, the other side,
Break on a shore of light.

Oh, if my mortal feet
Have almost gained the brink,
If it be I am nearer home
Even to-day than I think—

Father, perfect my trust,
Let my spirit feel in death
That her feet are firmly set
On the Rock of a living faith!

She told the writer that this hymn was composed one Sunday morning in 1852 after coming from church, and feeling depressed and lonely.

In another part of this number will be found what we consider a very fine poem, the latest production of hers sent to the Bazar, one of her very latest writings, and hitherto unpublished. It is the song of the dying swan, tender and sweet and beautiful.

We have said that the sisters were almost one. And yet in temperament and genius, as in person, they were greatly unlike. They were such independent characters that neither was imitator of the other.

No one can read Phœbe's poems without being struck with the strong good sense of them, with their bright and cheery temper, and with their entire hopefulness. And yet there is through them a passionate yearning for love. They are a real woman's poems. In them there is a resignation to the Divine allotments, whatever they may be. Sometimes there is a gleam of dramatic power, as in the poem entitled "Dead Love." Her favorite among her own productions, we believe, was "A Woman's Conclusions," in which is this stanza, following a picture of what her life might have been in wedded love, with children about her:

Yea! I said, if a miracle such as this Could be wrought for me, at my bidding, still
I would choose to have my part as it is,
And let my future come as it will.

And this is the concluding stanza of the poem:

So let my past stand just as it stands,
And let me now, as I may, grow old;
I am what I am, and my life for me
Is the best—or it had not been, I hold.

In conversation her quickness at repartee and her unstinging but brilliant wit made her very charming. Sometimes it would be a succession of intellectual pyrotechnics for half an hour at a time. She had not large reverence; she quickly detected shams; she had a sharp sense of the ludicrous. This combination of qualities sometimes made her seem, to those who did not know her well, as wanting in the religious element; but her intimate friends knew how full she was of that love for God and that love for one's neighbors which make the groundwork of a real religious character. The Lord's Supper was to her the service which most touched and melted her. It so represented God's love for man and man's love for God that its celebration seemed always to her the tenderest reunion of earth and heaven. But there was no cant in her talk, and no sanctimony in her life.

She was the incarnation of health. We never saw another person who seemed to enjoy so much physical comfort. She scarcely knew what aches and pains and ailments were until her last sickness. Through all her sister Alice's trying illness Phœbe watched and waited and worked most courageously. And when the departure of Alice came she bore it with the most surprising cheerfulness, put on no mourning, opened the house, sunned the rooms, and lay down to sleep, as for weeks she had slept, in the room adjoining that where Alice had fought her last battle. And then, as soon as she could, she rose and girded herself for work, among other things beginning to prepare a new edition of all her sister's writings. But she changed rapidly. She grew gray in a few weeks; she seemed to lose heart; she sank down. The bow had been too tensely strained. She had never known sickness. What to most people would have been a confinement of a few weeks closed her career. She did not understand it. It was an incomprehensible thing to her. Sickness to her was death. When her pastor one day tried to rally her, laying out a plan for a country trip, and then a series of works to be undertaken, she said, most mournfully, "My dear friend, my work is done."

It was true. She went to Newport, being literally carried there. Few of her friends knew that she was gone. There, separated from the world, in great loneliness, this genial, lovely, wholesome soul went up to take her place in "the Father's house, where the many mansions be."

The departure of these sisters is a loss to American literature. The world of readers will miss them. But they were more than writers; they were lovable women, and many will miss their strains of musical thought; but some much more will miss their sweet companionship. But they have passed from Dreams to Realities.

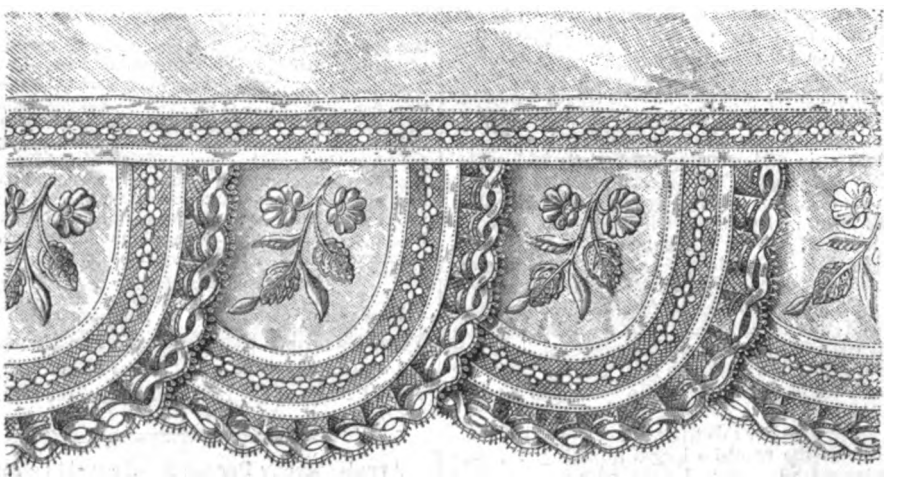

Fig. 2.—TRIMMING FOR PETTICOATS, DRESSES, ETC.

Trimmings for Petticoats, Dresses, etc., Figs. 1-7.

THESE trimmings are chiefly designed for white petticoats; they may, however, be used also for Swiss muslin, cambric, or nansook dresses. The trimming may, of course, be made of any width desired.

Fig. 1.—For this trimming cut the requisite number of pieces of muslin each eleven inches and a quarter long and three inches and three-quarters wide. Round off the under side of these pieces as shown by the illustration, hem them narrow; arrange the top in box-pleats, and sew them on the petticoat in such a manner that the pleated pieces overlap each other, as shown by the illustration. Now cut a straight piece of double muslin an inch and a quarter wide, and between this piece sew a box-pleated ruffle an inch and a quarter wide. Stitch the strip thus arranged on the petticoat at the upper and under edge, so that the under side of the strip covers the seam made by sewing on the pleated pieces, and the box-pleated ruffles remain free at the top.

Fig. 2.—For this trimming take a strip of cambric five inches and a quarter wide, cut the under side in scallops three inches and three-quarters wide and an inch and a quarter deep, and sew gathered white lace three-quarters of an inch wide, and lace insertion of the same width, on the cambric strip as shown by the illustration; the seam made by sewing on the latter is covered by bias strips of linen a quarter of an inch wide, which are set on with two rows of back stitching. At the upper side of the trimming strip insertion is also fastened on the foundation by means of strips of linen. The upper of these two bias strips serves at the same time to fasten the trimming on the petticoat. Now sew embroidery figures, that have been cut out of the foundation on which they are worked, on the trimming strip as shown by the illustration, and cut away the material under the insertion. Instead of working the trimming on a separate strip, it may also be worked on the bottom of the petticoat.

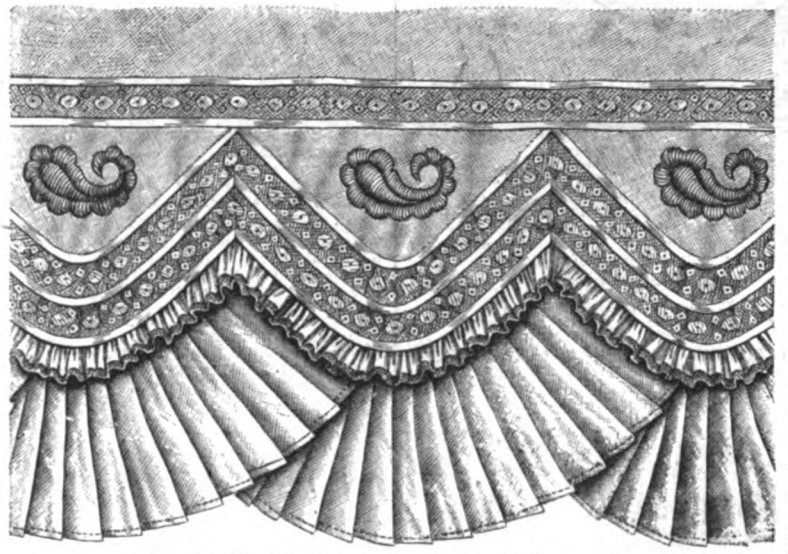

Fig. 3.—TRIMMING FOR PETTICOATS, DRESSES, ETC.

Fig. 3.—For this trimming a strip of cambric five inches and a quarter wide is required. Cut the under side of this strip in scallops five inches and three quarters wide and two inches and a half deep. Set a side-pleated cambric flounce four inches wide along each scallop; these flounces must overlap each other in the hollow between every two scallops. Sew a cambric ruffle three-quarters of an inch wide, edged with lace, and two rows of insertion of the same width above the flounce, as shown by the illustration. The seams made by sewing on the ruffle and the rows of insertion are covered by bias strips of linen a quarter of an inch wide. Separate application figures in white embroidery complete the trimming. At the upper side of the trimming strip a row of insertion is stitched on the cambric by means of narrow bias strips of linen. The upper of these two bias strips serves at the same time to fasten the trimming strip on the petticoat. Cut away the material underneath the rows of insertion, and fasten the edges carefully.

Fig. 4.—For this trimming cut a strip of the requisite length from Fig. 46, Supplement, trim the upper and under edge with a ruffle bordered with lace, and arrange the strip in pleats, bringing × on ●. On the middle of each point thus formed set a bias strip of linen four inches and a half long, pointed at one end and bordered all around with a ruffle edged with lace, as shown by the illustration. Stitch a bias strip of linen on the trimming strip in points, as shown by the illustration and indicated on the pattern.

Fig. 5.—For this trimming first set a side-pleated cambric ruffle, six inches wide, on the petticoat, then cut a cambric strip of the requisite length from Fig. 47, Supplement, trim the under edge with lace three-quarters of an inch wide, lace insertion of the same width, and bias strips of linen half an inch wide. Trim the upper edge of the strip with lace, gather it along the straight line indicated from each ∗ to ∶ to a width of an inch and a quarter, and cover each gathering thread with a bias strip of linen half an inch wide, which is pointed at both ends. In sewing on these bias strips, fasten the trimming strip on the side-pleated ruffle in such a manner that the ends of the points come on the under edge of the ruffle; the trimming must also be sewed on between the pleated parts by means of a bias strip.

Fig. 6.—This trimming is made of cambric, furnished with lace an inch wide, bias strips and medallions of piqué, and narrow bias strips of linen. The medallions are ornamented in white embroidery as shown by the illustration. To make the trimming first furnish the petticoat with a side-pleated cambric ruffle four inches and a half wide. Then cut a strip of cambric of the requisite length from Fig. 48, Supplement, trim the under edge with lace, and cover the seam made by doing this with a bias strip of linen a quarter of an inch wide. Now set a medallion on each point, surround it with lace, fasten it also by means of a bias strip of linen, and pleat the trimming strip, bringing × on ●. Sew the trimming strip thus completed on the petticoat as shown by the illustration, so that the ends of the points of the strip reach to the bottom of the side-pleated ruffle. The seam made by sewing on the trimming strip is covered by a bias strip of piqué an inch and three-quarters wide; on both sides of the latter stitch a bias strip of linen a quarter of an inch wide.

Fig. 7.—For this trimming cut a strip of cambric of the requisite length from Fig. 49, Supplement, trim the under side with insertion and lace, and arrange the top in pleats, bringing × on ●. Sew on this bias strips of linen three inches and three-quarters long and half an inch wide, which are pointed at one end, and edged with a gathered cambric ruffle an inch wide. Each point of the trimming strip is edged with a cambric ruffle two inches and a half wide, which is sloped toward the sides, and bordered with lace at the upper side. The seam made by setting on these ruffles is covered by a bias strip of piqué an inch and three-quarters wide, which is arranged in points, and ornamented with white soutache as shown by the illustration.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

LAURA.—For riding habits read Bazar No. 31, Vol. IV. A cloth or water-proof traveling dress and a black silk suit are the most useful dresses you can have on your tour through Europe.

MARIE.—Read reply above to "Laura." Make the skirt of your white muslin bridal dress two yards long behind. Have an over-skirt and low or square-necked basque, and trim with Valenciennes or duchesse lace, insertion, and appliqué embroidery. If this is too expensive, use gathered or pleated flounces of the muslin edged with very narrow Valenciennes. The groom wears a full dress black suit. Short veils are not often worn by bride-maids.

S.—Read Riding Habits in Bazar No. 31, Vol. IV. They are not double-breasted at present.

NETTIE W.—For fifty cents you can buy a pinking-iron, or wedge, of any design you wish, either scallops or points. The block upon which the goods rests and the maul can be found at home. We can furnish you a Bazar containing patterns of an infant's wardrobe. Price ten cents.

DELIA.—It requires very little ingenuity to make the Worth basque high in the neck. We have given illustrations and patterns of chemisettes. We have no patterns of plain waist dresses other than those advertised. Bazar No. 36, Vol. II., will teach you all about plain waists, the manner of cutting, making, etc. Muslin under-sleeves are coat-shaped, with a broad pleated frill falling over the hand.

LUCILE.—The Worth basque dress is one of the prettiest designs for a Swiss suit. One broad flounce or from three to five narrow ruffles trim the lower skirt. You can wear a white under-waist beneath Swiss muslin, or, if you choose, a waist to match the silk under-skirt. Wear a belt to match the colored skirt. Both pleated and gathered Swiss ruffles are used. Black lace is only used on white tarlatan or organdy for evening dress, and is not very appropriate for a day suit. Make a box-pleated blouse, or else a basque of Swiss muslin. The sleeves are plain to the elbow; thence open and ruffled.

A WIDOW.—Do not dress your baby of twenty months in mourning for its father. Let it wear white altogether, with, if you insist upon it, black sashes and ribbons. Widows' veils are a yard and a half long, with a quarter of a yard of this length turned up for a hem.

"MAIDEN AUNT."—A reply to your letter has been crowded out until we fear it is too late to benefit you; but we have given many details of dress-making from week to week in our "New York Fashions" that have probably been useful to you. Your sample is appropriate for a church suit for a lady of forty-five. Make with basque and upper skirt or a polonaise. Line the lower skirt if you choose, but not the upper one. The best trimming is black velvet ribbon an inch and a half wide, and black fringe on basque and upper skirt; a wide flounce headed by velvet on the lower skirt. The Bazar uses its best endeavor to simplify costumes, to give "minute instructions," and to assist those who dress plainly and inexpensively to dress tastefully also. Much, however, is necessarily left to individual taste and the ingenuity of our readers.

H. M.—The samples of lace are both imitations. The white lace might be used under black lace on a black silk polonaise, or beneath grenadine or tulle ruffles on a black grenadine dress.—As an essentially American present to an English bride, you might send one of Rogers's statuettes, or an American chromo, or a handsomely bound volume by an American author.

W. W. F.—Gentlemen in mourning wear suits of lustreless diagonal cloth, and of black Cheviot in which a little white appears. Black neck-tie and black cassimere hat with elastic cloth band.

JENNIE.—Line the waist and sleeves of your buff pongee polonaise with white muslin. Trim with black velvet bands and bows.

LANOY E.—Get a black silk suit—one of gray cashmere and silk together—and a black cashmere polonaise, for your outfit in September. Do not get many dresses, as the season is an intermediate one, when styles are not settled. Brown will continue to be a leading color during the winter, and the pale-tinted pearl, pink, and blue silks will remain in vogue for evening dresses. Both bonnets and hats will be worn, but more bonnets than are seen in the summer.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Ladies wear their chatelaine pins at the throat or on the bosom, and their watches in the dress belt, or in a pocket made low down in the dart seam of basques.

MILLICENT.—Steep one ounce of walnut bark in twice as much water as will cover it, and set the color with alum—a lump as large as the end of the little finger. Add half the quantity of spirits of wine if you want a stimulating wash for the hair. The bark is sold by druggists.

UGLY GIRL, PINY WOODS.—A pale blue eye with a long white eyelash may be improved by taking plenty of exercise and excitement, which make the eye brilliant and deep in color. The lashes may be touched with a hair-pencil dipped in strong walnut juice, which is as harmless as any coloring. White hair and lashes show deficiency of iron in the system. Eat beefsteaks and drink Burgundy, or any generous native wine, and dance a great deal. Wear a linen girdle to support the frame if exercise tires you. Clear blue ribbons of a medium tint always lend a pleasing reflection to the eyes, and you will do well to wear them in your hair and at your throat. Orange, with a great deal of white tulle or muslin, also seems to render the tints of your style more decided by suggesting the violet tinge.

ANTIOCH COLLEGE.
The special attention of ladies is called to the advantages of ANTIOCH COLLEGE for all who wish to pursue any study thoroughly. From the elementary studies up to those of the full College Course, ladies may choose those which they wish to pursue, and follow them under the care of the best teachers. Gentlemen and Ladies are united in the Faculty, and gentlemen and ladies recite together. Ladies who take the full course receive a full College Degree. While the advantages for instruction are of the best, the annual expenses of a pupil at Antioch, for every thing necessary, are hardly two hundred dollars a year.
The next term begins September 13. Address, for farther information,

WHAT IS HEADACHE?

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

In nine cases out of ten the source of headache is not in the brain, but in the stomach. Indigestion is the most frequent cause. The digestive organs being disordered, they derange the action of the liver, the bowels, the kidneys, and the nerves; and the whole secretive and excretive machinery being as it were thrown out of gear, the brain suffers. Restore the natural tone of the stomach and bowels with a few doses of and headache arising from this cause is at once arrested. This delightful preparation is the best remedy for chronic and periodical headache at present known, and absolutely invaluable as a stomachic and gentle cathartic.

HOTTENTOTS SEEN GATHERING BUCHU LEAVES AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE FOR H. T. HELMBOLD.

BUCHU.

[From Dispensatory of the United States.]

DIOSMA CRENATA—BUCHU LEAVES.

PROPERTIES.—Their odor is strong, diffusive, and somewhat aromatic; their taste bitterish and analogous to mint.

MEDICAL PROPERTIES AND USES.—Buchu leaves are gently stimulant, with a peculiar tendency to the Urinary Organs.

They are given in complaints of the Urinary Organs, such as Gravel, Chronic Catarrh of the Bladder, Morbid Irritation of the Bladder and Urethra, Disease of the Prostate Gland, and Retention or Incontinence of Urine, from a loss of tone in the parts concerned in its evacuation. The remedy has also been recommended in Dyspepsia, Chronic Rheumatism, Cutaneous Affections, and Dropsy.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU is used by persons from the ages of 18 to 25, and from 35 to 55, or in the decline or change of life; after Confinement or Labor Pains; Bed-Wetting in children.

In affections peculiar to Females the Extract Buchu is unequaled by any other remedy.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has cured every case of Diabetes in which it has been given. Irritation of the Neck of the Bladder and Inflammation of the Kidneys, Ulceration of the Kidneys and Bladder, Retention of Urine, Diseases of the Prostate Gland, Stone in the Bladder, Calculus, Gravel, Brick-Dust Deposit, and Mucous or Milky Discharges, and for enfeebled and delicate constitutions of both sexes attended with the following symptoms: Indisposition to Exertion, Loss of Power, Loss of Memory, Difficulty of Breathing, Weak Nerves, Trembling, Horror of Disease, Wakefulness, Dimness of Vision, Pain in the Back, Hot Hands, Flushing of the Body, Dryness of the Skin, Eruption on the Face, Pallid Countenance, Universal Lassitude of the Muscular System, &c.

HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU is Diuretic and Blood-Purifying, and cures all diseases arising from habits of dissipation, excesses and imprudences in life, impurities of the Blood, &c., superseding Copaiba in affections for which it is used, in connection with HELMBOLD'S ROSE WASH.

Ask for Helmbold's. Take no other.

Describe symptoms in all communications.

HELMBOLD'S FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA,

The Great Blood Purifier and Beautifier of the Complexion.

FACETIÆ.

WHY is a wet day like one of the ancient monarchs of France?—Because it is rainy (Réné), of course.

A PRETTY PIECE OF WORK.—A certain party recently, not a hundred miles from ——, who took a thimbleful of gin, lost the thread of his argument, got in a wax, began to reel, didn't cotton to any body, went out knitting his brows. A policeman eyed him, and told him to hook it, and he got home completely sewn up!

A PRICKLY PAIR—A porcupine and a hedgehog.

"Vat you call dem tings vit long bills zat fly, and make a noise b-z-z-z?" said a Frenchman to us yesterday.

"Woodcock," we replied.

"Eh bien! I kil-lit, zis mornin' before breakfast, twenty-five woodcock."

"The deuce you did! Where did you find them?"

"In my chambre à coucher."

"Twenty-five woodcocks in your bed-chamber? You must mean mosquitoes."

"Eh bien! zen I kil-lit alors twenty-five moschetos."

CHANGE FOR A SOVEREIGN—A republic.

A BRAZIL NUT TO CRACK.—A good story is going the round of the diplomatic circles to the following effect: A gentleman who met the Emperor of Brazil in a Brompton omnibus asked his Majesty what the people of his country did in their leisure moments. The emperor (whose pronunciation of the English language is still defective) immediately replied, "Nutting!" We will not vouch for the truth of this story. In fact, were not the omnibus thrown in (evidently to give a tone of probability to the tale) we should scout the whole affair as a base and baseless fabrication.

Why are compositors very fortunate fellows?—Because they can 'set up' in business without a shilling of capital.

Why should Eve have considered Adam a very good husband?—Because he never spotted her curtains and carpets by smoking in the drawing-room, never flirted with other women, never asked for a latch-key, and never returned home at 1 A.M. intoxicated by overindulgence in pickled salmon.

A REGULAR COUP DE MAIN.

"I say, what's the reason that young coxcomb, Horace Mew, every time he talks to a lady seizes her hand?"

"Oh, it's only his familiar way of holding a conversation!"

SLEEPY PROBLEMS FROM THE SOUTH COAST.

What sort of a person is the "swell of the ocean" we have heard so much of?

Who makes the "bed of the ocean?" and, also, who lies upon it?

Why do sailors weigh the anchor every time they leave a port? and do they find it loses or gains?

Even in the matter of dress our doctor's taste is thoroughly professional—he prefers a "mixture."

"Very good, but rather pointed," as the cod-fish said when he swallowed the bait.

"What is your business?" said the magistrate at a police court the other morning to a prisoner.

"I'm an observationist, your worship."

"An observationist! What is that?"

"One who looks around in the daytime to see what he can steal at night, if it plea'se your worship."

It did not please his worship, and so he sent the observationist to the Penitentiary for sixty days.

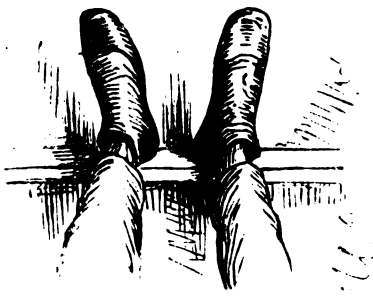
THE TYRANNY OF MASTERS.

ANN TO 'LIZA. "Well, there, I am surprised at Misthir Smith 'avin' Seven Men 'ere at work, and not one Good-lookin' un among 'em. He did oughter be ashamed of 'isself."

DOMESTIC PATENTS.

INSECT EXTERMINATOR—FOR DESTROYING ROACHES, CROTON-BUGS, ETC. PATENT APPLIED FOR.

A REFRIGERATOR. RIGHT FOR SALE.



MANTEL ORNAMENTS.

FAMILY BROILERS.

TO POULTRY-KEEPER.—Is there any difference between a hen stealing and a cock robbin'?

The day to pick your wife is Choose-day. Wedens-day is the day to be married on, of course.

QUERY.—Do racing men ever keep running accounts at their bankers'?

The kangaroo is indeed a curious beast. He is generally most wide-awake when he's leaping.

PROVERBIAL.—Cleanliness is next to godliness, and it is soap that is next to charity.

A man who loses his dexter eye generally has a sinister look.

HODFELLOWS—Bricklayers' laborers.

What is it that goes up the hill and down the hill, and yet never moves?—The road.

Why may Adam be accounted the most fortunate of married men?—Because he never had to take his wife out shopping, to pay her milliner's bill, or to tolerate the visits and advice of his mother-in-law.

THE BEST HOUSEHOLD RECEIPTS—The receipts on your tradesmen's bills.

Why is an empty cabin like a bird of the poultry class?—Because it is a chanticleer (shanty clear).

A thoughtful observer on women's rights comes to their defense very effectively as follows: "I have seen women so delicate that they were afraid to ride for fear of the horse running away, afraid to walk for fear the dew might fall, afraid to sail for fear the boat might upset; but I never saw one afraid to be married, which is more riskful than all the others put together."

The question, "Does getting drunk ever advance one's happiness?" would seem to be put to rest by the Irishman who went courting when drunk, and was asked what pleasure he found in whisky.

"Oh, Biddy," he replied, "it's a trate intirely to see two of your purty faces instead of one!"

A celebrated dandy was ordered by his physicians to follow a course of sea bathing at Dieppe. Arrived at that delightful bathing town, he ordered a machine and attendant, and went boldly into the water. He plunged in bravely, but in an instant after came up puffing and blowing.

"François," said he, "the sea smells detestably; it will poison me. Throw a little eau-de-Cologne into the water, or I shall be suffocated!"

"NATURAL SELECTION"—Choosing a wife.

HORTICULTURAL MEMS.

The horticulturist is always a good man. He who gives plenty of manure to his wall-fruit must be a benefactor of his peaches!

You are told that if you tread on a worm he may turn. With regard to caterpillars, if you don't tread on them they are certain to turn—to butterflies or moths.

There are places so productive that "if you tickle them with a hoe they will smile with a harvest." Of course the ho! hoe! is infectious. The rake is not so well tempered as the hoe; but then it is of no use if it can't show its teeth.

The early bird catches the worm, but you must go with a lantern after dark to find the slug-a-bed.

The new machines for cutting grass are of a shockingly humiliating tendency. We saw old Gravesire using one the other day when it was very warm; and we regret to say that although he is elderly, respectable, and eminently wealthy, the effect of the machine was to set him "mopping" as well as "mowing."

AN ACUTE OBSERVER.

PAPA (log.). "There, Mabel, Papa can't carry you another flight—his Head is splitting!"

MABEL. "Why, so it is, Papa. I see the crack."

AN OLD OFFENDER.

COUNTRY GENTLEMAN (eying his gardener suspiciously). "Dear, dear me, Jeffries, this is too bad! After what I said to you Yesterday, I didn't think to find you—"

GARDENER. "You can't shay—hic—I wash Drunk Yesht'day, Sh—"

COUNTRY GENTLEMAN (sternly). "Are you Sober this Morning, Sir?"

GARDENER. "I'm shlightly Shober, Shir!"

RAINBOWS OF GOLD.

"If you can get to the foot of a rainbow before it fades away you will find a bushel of gold."—Legend of Fairy Lore.

WHEN I was a child I was solemnly told,
When the rainbow appeared in the sky,
That under its foot was a bushel of gold
That any could get would they try;
So I ran where the splendor came down to the ground,
But it fleeted as fast as I ran,
And with all of my search it was nothing I found;
Yet I'm doing the same as a man.

There's the rainbow of love, when affections are young,
The brightest, we think, of the lot;
We follow, to find it a thing of the tongue,
Or a foolish abstraction of thought.
There's the rainbow of fame, with its amaranth crown;
We chase it in emulous strife;
We reach where its foot so enticing came down,
And find—we have wasted a life.

Hope's rainbows are ever abroad in the air,
Alluring us fools to pursue;
We follow and follow, and find nothing there
Save a sprinkle of glittering dew.
Earth's rainbows of promise, so fair to the sight,
Are but fictions, at best, of the mind;
Their gleams give at most unsubstantial delight—
They fade and leave nothing behind.

Then what of the rainbow that gleams beyond death—
The promise hereafter? Who is there can tell
If, after the parting of body and breath,
He is sure under that rainbow all will be well?
Can be certain it is the last bow to allure,
The one that stoops down on the bushel of gold—
The gold he at last shall possess? Who is sure?
Alas! 'tis a secret we can not unfold.

THE PRESENT FASHION.

IF one supposes that the people of the earth are not gradually marching on toward a perfect development, and wishes to be assured that the age is really an advance upon all that have gone before, there is one thing whose inspection must convince him of the fact, trivial as we are wont to consider it, of immense importance to the race as it really is, in every moral and physical respect: we mean the prevailing fashion. And we claim that, in spite of all the absurdities and follies with which the rich and the idle have chosen to encumber it, the present manner of shaping and making feminine garments is altogether the best thing that has yet sprung from the brain of the modiste.

True, there is something to be said for the primitive garment of our earlier ancestresses, that wild-beast robe—the skin of "striped panther, lifting loosely to the air," in which Mr. JOAQUIN MILLER delights to drape his dusky heroines. Its simplicity was perfect, and it probably answered all purposes. But the preserve of panthers being in a measure exhausted, substitutes have been found necessary, and the fancy has been stimulated to their invention. When life forsook its first freedom, and men became the slaves of cities and women of inner courts, woven draperies had taken the place of the savage dress, and brooches and jewels did the service that eagles' beaks and claws had done. So long as women remained the mere ornaments of their masters' seclusion, and the streets were places unfit for them to tread, nothing could have been better than the long, flowing garment revealing all the outlines as it hid them; and the peplum and the veil, wrapped in which the women ventured beyond their gates as in a cloud of invisibility, still spread over them the shelter of home. And not all history can give us any lovelier picture than that of Helen when she went abroad and "shadowed her beauty in white veils."

But, as civilization ripened, and ribaldry and indecency retired from the public gaze to dark corners, and no reason remained why women should not use the thoroughfares, it may be that the necessity of the case modified the loose apparel, which, beautiful as we find it in the pictures of Pompeiian interiors, with its cool and flowing folds, must have been far from equally attractive when flapping round the feet, and caught up in one hand or the other and hitched along from step to step. And it is, probably, this modification to meet circumstances which has ever since given rise to the various fashions, or endeavors to attain something preferable to that which exists.

Without doubt these fashions have, from generation to generation, frequently been the exhibition of individual caprice; but, on the whole, they have steadily mounted from one degree of usefulness to another, the exaggerations of the first season fixing the fit medium of succeeding ones, till the present street costume leaves but little to be desired.

Look at the cumbersome dress of ELIZABETH'S day, the ruff, the buckram bodice, the vestments which, one after another, MARY STUART took off in making ready for the headsman—the fearful lacing and the torturing back-boards, the calashes and galoches of our great-grandmothers—and then look at any lady of our own era who follows the fashion without subserviency or indulgence in striking extremes, and you can have but one opinion as to the superior merit of the present ideas. We have now a short dress that just escapes the soiling of the street; a neatly fitting shoe, from whose thick sole the exceedingly minute heel has been discarded, leaving one merely high enough to lift the foot from the wet and the dust; the useless folds of the upper garment gathered out of the way, making a graceful outline at the hip; hair "which wantons with the love-sick air," worn more becomingly than ever before; a bonnet which shelters the top of the head from the sun and air exactly where shelter is needed, which the wind has left off loosening, and tormenting the temper thereby, and which no longer hides the face "down a Leghorn lane," with as unpleasant results as those attending the use of blinders on a horse; and a tout ensemble pleasing to the gaze of the beholder and comfortable to the body of the wearer.

Of course, like many other good things, these fashions are at the mercy of the user, susceptible of abuse, and receiving it at the hands of all those who have too much time, or too much money, or too little taste, to suffer them to retain their original quietness. It is in this way that they are made a reproach by the wilderness of trimming with which the milliner is suffered to overlay them, and by the thousand-and-one whimsical cuttings and slashings that they endure, and in all which time and substance are wasted, and a rivalry established dangerous to purse and to character. But such things bring their own remedy, since the dresses bristling with frillings and flutings will so soon tire the gaze and satiate the fancy that a reaction of soft unbroken outlines must follow; and if we are not driven to assume the nun's garb by sheer force of contrast, we shall have the mode as it was meant to be—a costume capable of infinite variety, and of adaptation without singularity to all figures and all tastes. Certainly a more alluring sight than one of the damsels of the day, in her lawns and laces, her skirts like the petals of a rose, her bright ribbons, her flying hair, could hardly gladden the eyes of men; and if, as we may hope, her heart and soul are clothed in raiment equally as fair, she well may gladden the eyes of angels too.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Musk.

DEAR BOB,—As I was rolling out of town in the train one morning this summer for a day's pleasuring—or, in my case, who enjoy so much in town, I suppose I ought to say change of pleasure—in the country, I seated myself in one of those very comfortable drawing-room cars, and as I proceeded to adjust my mind to the journey I perceived a very strong odor of musk. Perfumes are pleasant to me, and when I am aware of them I instantly feel myself to be in the neighborhood of some mariner freshly come home from the spice islands. I smell Java and Borneo and Sumatra. My mind is full of jungles and tigers and Malays, but so confusedly remote as not to be threatening or troublesome. Or if the odor be of a certain purity and pungency rather than richness, the scenery shifts in my mind to gardens in cooler zones, or to wild-wood dells, and a thousand fond associations fill my memory with beautiful pictures of the kind that all old gentlemen and old ladies, my dear Bob, contemplate with tenderness to the very last.

Having nothing in particular to do, I unfolded the morning paper, and then looked about me to see who it was that began the day with such a fine odor. I said that it was musk, or at least musky, and that is a perfume which, as you know, is so powerful that it is made the basis of others, and, by reason of the same power, is sometimes a little suspicious. I remember in my younger days the dapper little gentleman, so neat in his dress and so polite in his manner, who was book-keeper in an office to which I used to resort. But he was enveloped in an atmosphere of musk. I think the whole building was scented. The books of that house must smell like the rolls that swathed old mummies, and were steeped in odorous gums. It was always perplexing to me, I remember, that a man so small should, as it were, smell so immensely, and that so mild a man should be associated with any thing so powerful as that perfume. Now, Bob, it is a melancholy truth that the small, mild man was a shameful sinner in many ways. He was obliged to have recourse to powerful medicaments, and to destroy all trace of them he neutralized the odor which they might leave about him by unstinted use of that bullying musk.

The result was inevitable. Sin and musk are inextricably associated in my mind. I can not help fancying that sin has a musky smell, and the stronger the musk the more awful, it seems to me, the sin must be. When you have been smoking, my dear Bob, and presently seek the society of ladies, I have seen you gnawing orris root or chewing cachous. You wish to correct the rank tobacco fumes by a more agreeable breath. It is wise and courteous, but it is, nevertheless, suggestive. If you wished to conceal that you had been smoking, the device would not serve. The orris and the cachous say gayly to all the company, "We are hiding something," and every body knows what it is. Or, perhaps, it is only printing the fact of your tobacco habit in ornamental type. The perfume is only a blue and gold edition of the fume.

As I glanced around the car I saw that the odor proceeded from a large, dark-haired gentleman, who had that extremely conscious unconscious aspect which I remark very often upon my travels. Occasionally he took out his handkerchief and adjusted it a great deal more than was necessary for the very slight use to which he put it noseward, and it was evident that he was intentionally shaking out the invisible cloud of musk in which he concealed himself, like a magician in the smoke of his incantations, or a cuttle-fish in the inky mist which he generates to shield him from pursuit. Every body in the car, I am sure, perceived the prodigious scent, and some of the ladies, I observed, coughed a little and turned pale, as if they were ill; and one or two of the gentlemen stared and scowled and half snorted—a snort of impatience being, as I understand it, nasal profanity, or an oath of the nose. But the serenity of our high-smelling traveler was undisturbed, and he devoted himself to his paper with a most solemnly affected air of abstraction.

The scene reminded me ludicrously of a ceremonious dinner at which I was once present, and to which all the guests had been bidden to eat venison. The host warned us not to waste our appetites, nor to trifle with them upon unimportant dishes; and after due expectation and delay the great dish was served. But, my dear Bob, far off its coming did not shine, but was apparent. We were not vultures nor buzzards, and to eat the venison was impossible. But nothing could surpass the bland unconcern with which every body at table seemed to be unconscious of what was only too appallingly apparent. The host behaved well, and, after a form of offering the morsel which would have graced a banquet of condors, he winked at its swift disappearance, and we all chattered gayly, as if we had dined luxuriously and amply. Even so the dark-haired, musky gentleman in the car was, after a little while, blandly disregarded, although he was, I may say, appallingly apparent.

But when, at a convenient station, I stepped out to breathe the fresh air upon the platform, I passed a certain young lady, whose name I would certainly write in full if I did not know that it would cover your manly face, my dear Bob, with the most prickly blushes. It was an exquisite summer morning, and as I passed I looked at the paint and pasteboard battlements of the station-house, and said to her:

> "This castle hath a pleasant seat: the air
> Nimbly and sweetly recommends itself
> Unto our gentle senses."

And even that summer air was sweeter for a faint and subtile scent; not sickly and cloying, but delicately fresh, as if a zephyr laden with the aroma of carnations had lost itself somewhere in the folds of that young lady's dress. This, also, was a perfume, but how different! This, too, was suggestive, like that overpowering musk; but I give you my word, dear Bob, nobody turned pale nor snorted.

Later in the day, when I had left the train, and it had rolled far and far away, I sat at the pleasantest of windows looking out over the river and across a garden which sloped riverward from the house. There were lawns and terraces and huge urns and vases overflowing with flowering vines, but I chiefly perceived the scent of roses, which grew in vast beds, and perfumed the wind that stole over the river as silently and swiftly as a lover, as Leander, say, to rest his head upon that Hero's fragrant bosom. The freshness and sweetness of that roseate air were inspiring. I really forgot my years and the infirmities proper to my age, and thought that no summer day had ever been so blissful. And, as I inhaled as well as beheld its beauty, I could not help reflecting upon the richness of life and experience that endowed the same thing with such infinitely various associations and suggestions. That overpowering musk in the morning, and that breath of carnation at mid-day, and now the rose-odor in the afternoon—how could any thing be more different in their effects—and yet they were all sweet perfumes!

And yet is it perfumes only of which what I thought is true? Are they not themselves symbols of our manners upon the road? I think that you know somebody, my dear Robert, who shows the utmost propriety of conduct, whose address is always bland and courteous, who never betrays impatience nor anger of any kind, but is as smooth as if his manners had been oiled and rubbed like the frame of a wrestler. His smile is ready and profuse. He is prompt and intelligent and thoughtful. He is always ready for the business or the play of the moment. He has his story to tell, his joke to crack, his song to sing. He has traveled and observed. He is humorous but not satirical, always well-dressed, hopeful, and cheerful. But for all that you do not like him. His manners are as irreproachably good as musk is undeniably sweet. But as that perfume is unpleasantly suggestive, so his manner is suspicious. It is too strong. There is too much musk here. Phew! And I can fancy you indulging in that nasal profanity which I remarked in the car.

But when I left the window over the rose-garden and descended to the parlor that opened upon the lawn, I met you know who, and as we walked out in that sunset and talked of a hundred things, I was aware of a manner which technically could not be described as more faultless than that of the somebody I have just mentioned, but which seemed to me as exquisite as the breath of the carnation I perceived in the morning. And when, later, Mrs. Margery came in, that queen of women, and with a superb grace and splendor which you can imagine may have been the natural manner of goddesses as we see them in the finest statues—some Diana when she loved Endymion, some calm-browed Ceres, some great-eyed Juno, some Venus of Milo—made every body happy, then it seemed to me that I perceived in another way the perfect perfume of that whole rose-garden.

It is something under the manner, you see, my dear young friend. There is a certain smoothness and finish which, when you have once known them to hide deceit and selfishness, are hateful, although, as manner merely, faultless. Musk is sweet. To me it is not in itself disagreeable. But it has become such a mask that when I perceive it I am alarmed, like a railway engineer when he runs over a torpedo. There is danger ahead. I smell it. And my experience is not peculiar—it is shared by very many. If I should perceive it when I am with you, I should instantly say that you had been drinking, or chewing opium, or taking some drug, or that at least you had done something that you knew was wrong, and that you were trying to conceal. Manner is a perfume. But perfumes, as we know, may be meant to put us off the scent. Let us be wary, therefore, my dear boy, I said to myself, as I returned to town, and choose for our use only those odors which are not liable to suspicion, but are such as that young lady whom you know, and whom I respect and love—at the proper distance—always uses.

Your friend, dear Bob,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

INFANT'S CLOTHING.

WE give this week illustrations, and will furnish cut paper patterns, of the most important articles of infants' clothing. The robe, day slip, gown, cloak, petticoat, and shirt are the garments that young mothers find most difficult of construction. Our cut paper patterns will simplify these henceforth, as they are complete in the smallest details. Patterns of all smaller articles, such as bibs, sacques, bands, etc., have been given from time to time in the Supplements.

DRESSES.

High-necked and long-sleeved dresses are most in favor at present for infants. This is a sensible fashion, as it dispenses with sacques, which are sometimes left off through carelessness, so that the child takes cold. However, there is usually found in an infant's outfit at least one dressy robe made with low neck, short sleeves, and more or less elaborate trimming, to be worn at the christening, or on occasions when baby is the centre of attraction. The material for this is fine mull, or else the thinnest French nansook. This robe measures a yard and a quarter in length, is about two yards wide, and consists of two straight breadths and a gored front, with body and skirt in one, shaped after the design given in our illustration. The back of the waist is fully gathered at the top and belt, the side is sloped out for the armhole, and the tiny sleeve, when properly set in, will shape the top straight around, displaying the plump, dimpled shoulders that square necks conceal. The belt does not pass over the front gore, but begins on each side of it, and is made of the trimming separate from the belt. The robe illustrated has puffs of nansook divided by Valenciennes insertion. The edges of the puffs are rolled and overseamed to the insertion. The laundress should fold the puff through the centre, iron and flute it as though it were a ruffle, and thus give when opened the effect of pleated marquise puffs. If real Valenciennes is too expensive, there is an Italian imitation with feathery edges, that copies real lace admirably, and costs but half as much. Hamburg insertion, like needle-work, though done by machinery, is also inexpensive. A third plan for those who have much time and little money is to unite the puffs by tucked bands, making five or six tiniest tucks in the centre, a space each side covered by feather stitching, and a hem to finish the edges. If a sash is used, it is tied on the left side of the front or back, according to fancy.

High yoke slips for every-day wear are the simplest and prettiest of baby dresses. Thicker nansook and dimity are the favorite fabrics for these. Linen lawns rumple too easily; cross-barred and striped muslins are old-fashioned. Colored dresses on babies are now unheard-of things. The yoke may be of the dress material, fitted smoothly over the shoulders, and surrounded by a ruffle or edging; or it may be formed entirely of lengthwise puffs, bands of insertion, tucks, or of Valenciennes medallions and needle-work. The two widths of the skirt are sometimes straight, sometimes sloped slightly toward the top, and are seven-eighths or a yard long. A two-inch hem, with trimming like that on the yoke inserted above it, finishes the skirt. The sleeves are coat-shaped. A wide ribbon sash, or one of the material, hemmed, is used. In the latter case a belt of insertion is put across the front, and long strings are sewed to it and tied behind. Shirrs and drawing-strings around the entire waist are also seen, but to our taste the dress is prettiest when hanging loose from the yoke, unconfined by belt or sash.

NIGHT-GOWN.

The gown pattern is merely a long sacque, buttoned behind or before, as the mother chooses. If buttoned behind, it serves also for a day dress in the nursery. Soft French percales, American cambric, and finest muslins of light quality are selected for night-gowns, and simple edgings for trimming.

Some of the newest day slips shown at the furnishing houses are combinations of our night-gown and yoke slip. The back has a yoke; the front is a sacque, smooth and plain, with lengthwise rows of insertion sewed in with feather stitching. This can be done easily, and will make variety in the outfit.

PETTICOATS.

Directions are unnecessary for making petticoats. Two straight widths of jaconet, or muslin, hemmed, ruffled, tucked, or trimmed with insertion, are gathered to a waistband of the material, doubled and passed straight around the body. A place for the arm may be hollowed out, but is not important. Frenchwomen prefer tapes to tie all such garments; buttons, and too often pins, are used here. Petticoats of gauze flannel for day wear are made by the same pattern. Plain flannels have an inch-wide hem turned up on the outside, held at the top by a row of feather or brier stitching, and bound on the edge with white lutestring ribbon. The waistband is linen doubled. More elaborate skirts have shallow scallops needle-worked, and rich soutache braiding or embroidery. The barrow-coat, or "pinning-blanket," used to inwrap the child's limbs on cold nights, is a single width of soft, thick flannel hemmed on three sides, with the fourth gathered to a waistband.

INFANTS' SHIRTS.

The shirt is a dainty little garment made of finest linen lawn, the old-fashioned kenting, and in many cases of sheer linen cambric. The rolling lapels and sleeves are trimmed with Valenciennes or tiniest ruffles. A hem finishes it below. The smallest, smoothest, softest seams should be seen on all infants' clothing, and especially on the shirts, that come next the tender flesh.

THE CLOAK.

The cloak used at all seasons is two large capes and a hood. White cloaks are preferred. For summer the material is repped piqué, and lately white lawn; in winter white merino is choosen for dress occasions, plaid flannels for greater warmth and ordinary use. Braiding, embroidery, and fringe are the trimmings for piqué and merino.

An easy and pretty fashion is to work polka dots at intervals over all the upper cape, and on all the visible parts of the lower. A vine of embroidery, or elaborate braiding in palm or fern leaves or medallions, then surrounds both capes, and fringe finishes the edges. The upper cape is often richly trimmed while the lower is perfectly plain. Merino cloaks are lined throughout with thin silk, and interlined with soft flannels. Wadding and quilting make these hang stiffly. French cloaks of Victoria lawn and of striped dimity have pleated lawn ruffles instead of fringe. Flannel cloaks are simply bound with ribbon of the color that appears in the plaid, or else they have a ruche of flannel notched or bound.

VARIETIES.

Turbans of Valenciennes lace and needle-work medallions are chosen for both boy and girl babies. These are almost too elaborate for inexperienced mothers to make, and they cost $10 or $15 ready made. For those who wish to attempt them pretty models and minute directions are given in former numbers of the Bazar. Soft fleecy wool knitted caps have also been illustrated. In lieu of these mothers make simple little cape bonnets of white lawn for summer, and of braided merino for winter.

Sacques are not so much used as formerly when all dresses were low in the neck. Finest cashmere sacques, richly braided and embroidered, are found at the furnishing stores. Berlin wool sacques are still softer, and are perfectly shaped.

A blanket or shawl, a square of merino or fine flannel, is added to all infants' wardrobes. Imported blankets are exquisitely needle-worked, and are far cheaper than those made here. They are invariably white, with a richly wrought vine and scallops around the square, and a thick cluster in one corner. Made of flannel, they cost $7; of merino, $8 to $9 50.

The best bibs for ordinary use are of white lawn, lined and slightly wadded, and quilted. These absorb moisture, and are far softer than piqué. The quilting is far apart, in double diamonds, a tiny figure is wrought in each diamond, and the entire edge of the bib is scalloped and overcast. Bibs to be worn outside handsome cloaks are made of Valenciennes insertion and needle-worked bands edged with lace. A three-cornered kerchief of linen cambric trimmed with fine lace is also used.

Flannel bands supplied at the furnishing houses are of doubled flannel, with a broad band of elastic inserted down the front. The ends of the flannel band are narrowed to wrap around the body by passing through a slit under each arm.

Woven Afghans for infants' carriages rival the knitted ones in beauty, are almost as soft, and cost about one-third as much; they are woven in bright Pompadour blue and rose stripes with white, and the brilliant flowers are embroidered by hand: $7 50 to $9 is the range of prices.

Pretty and inexpensive baskets for toilette articles have linings and ruffles of white dimity, the edges ornamented with feather stitching in blue zephyr wool. On the top of the basket is a ruche of Swiss muslin with rolled edges overwrought with blue wool. A simple design is wrought on the pockets, cushions, and centre of the basket. Finer trimmed baskets are lined with blue or rose silk under Swiss muslin or Valenciennes insertions.

An imported berceaunette, or cradle basket, has drapery and covers of pink silk beneath dotted Swiss muslin edged with duchesse lace: the price is $45. Still handsomer ones, made here, are swinging cradles, with canopies of blue silk covered by Swiss muslin pleatings and Valenciennes.

PERSONAL.

THE London correspondent of the New Orleans Times went to Westminster Abbey on Sunday afternoon, a few weeks ago, to hear Dean STANLEY preach. The Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia, with their two little sons, were also there. As they advanced up the aisle the grand organ pealed forth the national hymn, "God save the Queen," and every body stood up. The Dean's sermon was from the Forty-sixth Psalm, "God is our hope and strength, a very present help in trouble," which, by-the-way, is the subject of the national hymn of the German people—"Ein feste burg ist unser Gott." The Dean closed his discourse very gracefully, by a repetition of his text in the German paraphrase, both in German and English, and then the verse was sung as an anthem by the choir. The effect was very fine.

—Miss STEBBINS has completed for the Central Park a bronze statue, "The Angel of the Croton," for the $150,000 fountain now in course of construction on those grounds.

—GEORGE SAND is said to be lying dangerously ill, and doubts are entertained of her recovery. She is breaking down under a load of anxiety concerning the future of France. It is not unlikely, if she recovers, that she will be elected to one of the vacant seats in the French Academy.

—Mr. P. T. BARNUM and General SCHOFIELD have purchased 30,000 acres of land in Colorado, including eleven miles on each side of the Huerfano River. They propose to be cattle-raisers, and to start the raising with one thousand animals of superior blood.

—The new Treasury bonds are to be ornamented with portraits of prominent statesmen deceased. The $50 bonds will have that of SILAS WRIGHT; the $100's, EDWIN M. STANTON; the $500's, THOMAS H. BENTON; the $1000's, ex-President HARRISON; the $5000's, ANSON BURLINGAME; the $10,000's, JOHN A. ANDREW.

—CHARLES BULLEN has just written the "Story of Count Bismarck's Life," in which occurs the following: "The value of a good cigar," said BISMARCK, as he proceeded to light an excellent Havana, "is best understood when it is the last you possess, and there is no chance of getting another. At Königgrätz I had only one cigar left in my pocket, which I carefully guarded during the whole of the battle as a miser does his treasure. I did not feel justified in using it. I painted in glowing colors in my mind the happy hour when I should enjoy it after the victory. But I had miscalculated my chances." "And what was the cause of your miscalculation?" "A poor dragoon. He lay helpless, with both arms crushed, murmuring for something to refresh him. I felt in my pockets, and found I had only gold, and that would be of no use to him. But stay—I had still my treasured cigar! I lighted this for him, and placed it between his teeth. You should have seen the poor fellow's grateful smile! I never enjoyed a cigar so much as that one I did not smoke."

—When the Rev. Mr. SEARS was settled in Wayland, Father ALLEN said to him that he also once preached there as a candidate, and should have been settled but for one little thing. "What was it, pray?" "Oh, the people didn't want me."

—Queen VICTORIA is noted for promptness and making good "time." She likes that quality in others, and has, therefore, given orders that the pulpit sand-glass, which indicates the length of time allowed for the sermon in the royal chapel, shall be measured for twenty minutes only, instead of an hour as formerly.

—It is reported, and is quite likely to be true, that JAMES GORDON BENNETT, Esq., editor of the Herald, has announced his intention to give $100,000 toward the completion of the new Roman Catholic cathedral in Fifth Avenue. Although not an ostentatious, Mr. BENNETT is a liberal, contributor to works of a religious and benevolent character.

—Miss HARRIET MARTINEAU, who is now sixty-nine, is in fair health this summer, though disabled from work. She lives in her charming retreat of "Ambleside," in the English lake country.

—The Bishop of Peterborough, Dr. MAGEE, is, next after Canon LIDDON, the sensation preacher of the Church of England. Recently Westminster Abbey was filled a full hour before the time of service to hear him on "The Intemperance of the Lower Orders." A Dissenting clergyman writes: "It was one of the most eloquent and impressive discourses I ever heard; the diction chaste and often surpassingly beautiful. It occupied a full hour in the delivery, and was given without notes, with great earnestness and freedom of action. It must, however, have been committed to memory, for no man could have extemporized such sentences."

—The "how to do it" of the Western pioneer is illustrated in the life and adventures of ELI STILSON, of Oshkosh, Wisconsin, who "marched into the bowels of the land" twenty-four years ago with $2000, and started a little farm in a wilderness. He now has 1100 acres of as fine land as the eye can rest upon, worth $100,000. His house is small and neat; but his barn!—bless you! it is 600 feet long, and he keeps adding to it. He runs 1500 sheep, and cows and oxen innumerable; and is allowed to be about the best farmer in Wisconsin.

—Among the pretty and precious little things the late PHŒBE CARY used to show to her friends was a curious necklace, composed of stones, shells, bits of ivory, etc., contributed by those for whom she had a personal regard. Each one was of value in her eyes, as something of interest attached to it. Many of the stones were precious. Among the contributors were ROBERT DALE OWEN and Mr. WHITELAW REID, who furnished a little cube of "agate."

—Hon. A. H. STEPHENS is signalizing his accession to journalism by writing piquant paragraphs. One of his late squibs was five columns in length.

—Father MIEL, formerly a Roman Catholic priest, has joined the Episcopal Church, and been received into the diocese of Pennsylvania. He is said to be a gentleman of superior ability and culture, and was formerly one of the preachers in the Madeleine, Paris.

—It is announced that JULIAN HAWTHORNE, son of the novelist, is the original of Laurie, in Miss ALCOTT'S "Little Women."

—Mr. WILLIAM B. REED, an eminent member of the Philadelphia bar, who had been secured by the friends of ex-President BUCHANAN to prepare a life of that personage, has felt compelled by impaired health to relinquish the task. It will now be undertaken by Professor JAMES C. WELLING, of Annapolis, Maryland, formerly assistant editor to GALES & SEATON, of the old National Intelligencer. He is to receive $8000 for the work.

—Something strange about AUBER. No one seems to know how or where he was buried. At one time it was reported that his body was lost. At all events, he was buried not only without appropriate honors, but without any funeral ceremony whatsoever, and a commission has just been formed in Paris for arranging a mortuary service in memory of the great composer.

—Lord MACAULAY never wrote in haste, and revised every thing he wrote with the greatest nicety. His first rough draft was absolutely illegible from erasures and corrections. It was written on official foolscap, with the lines full an inch apart. This formed but the rough outline. Then began the work of amplification and revision, and when that was complete you could hardly find space on the page to stick a pin's point. PRESCOTT saw two or three of these pages of the manuscript of his history. "You have no conception," he says, "of the amount of labor that one of these sheets of foolscap represents." But this manuscript was never sent to the printer. It was copied out by MACAULAY in a hand almost as bold and legible as large pica. When in London he generally spent most of the morning in the reading-room of the British Museum, and his evenings at his desk. His favorite hours of work were those of the morning. But upon this point he "humored his disposition," like GREY. If the work palled him, he took up his hat and stick, and started off for a stroll, generally taking a book in his pocket when in the country. In London he varied this diversion by visiting the book-stalls to pick up rare or original editions of old books, or by strolling through the Seven Dials in search of ballads. He was as fond of these as Sir WALTER SCOTT, and spent the whole of one long vacation, it is said, in a stroll through the northern counties collecting a set. When living alone in the Albany, JEFFREY tells us that MACAULAY, like CHARLES DICKENS, often threw down his pen at midnight, and strolled out into the silent streets to walk about for two or three hours. He thought the silence and solitude of a great city favorable to meditation, and generally returned to his desk with a fresh stock of vivid and picturesque thoughts.

—When the British Queen gives a court breakfast the doings are something after this sort, according to the record of an American freeman who recently assisted at one: "On these occasions the Queen walks about very smiling and chipper, with a white cap that looks like a French bonne's over her head, and the widow's weeds a thought lightened by a suspicion here and there of white lace or crape. The breakfasts take place in the afternoon at four and a half o'clock, and the ladies attend in a costume gotten up expressly for the occasion. They gossip and chatter in groups on the sward, while the gentlemen, in uniform and stars and garters, quiz them in a highly aristocratic way, or discuss politics in the arbors. The little Princess of Wales, in particular, is very lively and popular on these occasions, and has a sprightly air, which neither the well-known propriety and haughtiness of her royal mamma nor the indifference of her big, lazy husband seem to have dampened."

—The Marquis of Bute is said to have determined upon running a line of steamers from Cardiff, South Wales, to this city. The indigent young man has recently, by a legal decision, been awarded property that brings him an additional $200,000 a year.

—It is suggested in some of the Pennsylvania papers that a very proper way of doing honor to the memory of THADDEUS STEVENS would be for the children in the common schools of the State to subscribe each a small sum for the erection of a monument. Mr. STEVENS, more than any man in Pennsylvania, was the one who organized and brought to its present admirable position the common school system of that State.

—The Paris Journal announces the death of old TAGLIONI, at the age of one hundred and two. He died at the villa of his granddaughter, Princess ALEXANDRE TROUBETZKOI, on the banks of the Lake of Como. During the late war one of his grandsons served in the Prussian and another in the French army.

—Bishop M'FARLAND, of Hartford, has been presented with a $20,000 residence by his congregation, and been assigned to the diocese of Hartford, recently erected from the see of Connecticut and Rhode Island.

—A few days since the ex-Emperor NAPOLEON, accompanied by Prince ACHILLE MURAT, met by appointment Colonel DUNCAN, of the United States, for the purpose of going to Erith, there to take an excursion upon the cigar-ship yacht of the Messrs. WINANS, of Baltimore. The party was a private one, consisting of the above-named and Mr. and Mrs. CLINTON WINANS and Mr. WALTER J. WINANS. The Emperor was greatly pleased with the novel vessel, and especially as he has always taken great interest in all American affairs. After spending several hours steaming up and down the Thames, the Emperor returned by the special train which had taken him down. The inhabitants of Erith, hearing of the Emperor's visit, turned out in great numbers to greet him, and gave him three hearty cheers.

—Prince ARTHUR, it is stated, has proposed to Lady ROSAMOND CHURCHILL, daughter of the Duke of Marlborough; and an Hon. Mr. CARRINGTON, brother of a Lord CARRINGTON, is engaged to a young American girl who has $15,000 a year. Curious, is it not, that Englishmen rave about and marry American girls (with money), while American gentlemen do not rave about English girls at all? Not the slightest.

—Senator HAMLIN attended a clam-bake in Portland a few days since, and between plates advocated the claims of the Transcontinental Railroad. Good clams.

—GEORGE W. CHILDS, of the Philadelphia Ledger, occupies just now the attention of the English aristocracy. On the Fourth of July he spent the day with the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham, excurted on the Thames, and dined at Greenwich. He is to spend a week with his Grace and her Grace at Stowe. On the 5th Mr. C. and party were dined by the Lord Mayor and lady, and about this time they are the guests of Mr. WALTER, of the London Times, at his great estate of Bearwood. Mr. WALTER and Mr. CHILDS have had warm personal relations for many years.

—When the Queen of Holland was in England she expressed to Dean STANLEY a desire to behold some of the noted literary lions. So the Dean gave a literary dinner, and, among others, invited Mr. LECKY, who pleased the Queen. And then the Queen invited him to visit her in Holland. And he went; and he met there a maid of honor to her Majesty, and became enamored of and "popped" to her, and they were married, and have ever since lived happily. She is very beautiful and cultivated. The Dutch ladies are generally beautiful and cultivated. They are not fat.

—The new editor of Fraser's Magazine is Dr. GEORGE WEBBE DASENT, an eminent linguist, and writer of unusual force and brilliancy. He married a daughter of the late Mr. DELANE, of the London Times, and has been one of the best writers on that paper.

—"Mother WILSON," of Canton, Maine, aged one hundred and five years, is said to be the oldest Methodist in this country, if not in the world. The Bazar knows of a man who is one hundred and seven. He is not a Methodist. He is a druggist.

—REGNIER retires from the Théâtre Français, after forty years' service, being one of the longest careers on record for an actor in the same house. His pension is 9000 francs a year.

—The wife of the Czarowitz of Russia, formerly the Princess DAGMAR, has had more reputation for personal charms than any other feminine member of the royal families of Europe, and probably deserves the place heretofore assigned to the Empress of Austria.

—Miss LILY PECKHAM, who has studied law in the office of her brothers in Milwaukee, has put out her sign in that city as "attorney at law." She desires her friends to discontinue the use of her pet name when a child, and to speak of her and address her hereafter by the name which her parents gave her at birth—ELIZABETH PECKHAM. She is right, and her request should be heeded.

Border and Foundation Figure for Curtains, Altar Covers, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS design is worked on lace covered with Swiss muslin, with embroidery cotton in half-polka, button-hole, and satin stitch embroidery. Some of the figures are also worked in lace stitch. After the embroidery is completed, cut away the Swiss muslin as shown by the illustration, following the contour of the design figures. The border may be worked on lace as well as on Swiss muslin curtains. For Swiss muslin curtains baste a strip of lace of the width of the border under one side of the curtains. Illustration, Fig. 1, shows a foundation figure suitable for the border. The full-page illustration, Fig. 2, shows the whole pattern.

Braided Cord Mat.

THIS mat is of white woven cord of the size shown by the illustration. Transfer the design to card-board or stiff paper, then baste three pieces of cord of the requisite length on this along the four parallel lines of the design, letting the cords come close together, and form alternately one loop turned toward the outer edge, and one loop turned toward the middle of the mat. The basting must be done with very long stitches, so that the cords which are afterward basted on may readily be passed between the layers of cord previously fastened on. Sew the beginning and end of the cord together as neatly as possible. Now baste on three cords along the windings formed by the free four parallel lines of the design. In forming each three loops of the outer edge braid the threefold cord together as shown by the illustration; besides this pass the cord once above and once beneath the three windings previously basted on (see illustration). Sew the ends of the cord together as before. Now braid two single cords between the windings of the cords previously basted on, first one, then the other. This completes the heavy border of the mat. For the middle part of the mat take two cords of the requisite length, lay them close together as shown by the illustration, and alternately pass them through a threefold cord loop of the border; lay them in a small loop there, as shown by the illustration, then arrange them in a large loop turned toward the middle; braid these larger loops together as shown by the illustration. Pass a single cord through the windings, as shown by the illustration, and sew the windings together at the points of intersection; then rip the work from the card-board. The side which formed the outside while working forms the under side of the completed mat. This mat will be found very serviceable, and can easily be varied so as to serve for numerous household purposes.

PERILS FOR PESTS.

IT is well known that certain plants act as natural fly-traps, and cause the death of the unhappy insects who fall into their clutches. The Venus's fly-trap is familiar to most of us, either from books or from actual inspection; and the little sun-dews lie under the suspicion of a partiality for animal food. But it may not be so generally understood that certain ingenious persons have proposed to turn to practical account this peculiarity. Thunberg, indeed, tells us that at the Cape a species of Roridula, a plant allied to our sun-dews, is hung up in country houses for the purpose of catching flies. It was, however, reserved for a Belgian botanist to advocate the cultivation in our drawing-rooms of a plant which is handsome in itself, and an admirable fly-trap; but, with all due respect for the ingenuity of the suggestion, we doubt whether flowers to which struggling flies are attached, without any chance of escape, would be the most pleasant ornaments for a room. As we are told that a horticulturist at Liege grows it in large quantities, and that "une belle plante en pot" costs only a franc, we may suppose that the plan finds favor among our Belgian friends.

The plant is known to botanists as Apocynum androsæmifolium, or dog's-bane, and is common in many parts of the United States. It grows to the height of two feet, and bears very numerous pink bell-shaped flowers, in which is the remarkable arrangement which has caused the advocacy of the plant for fly-destroying purposes. Dr. Darwin, in the "Botanic Garden," gives an explanation of this which is scarcely correct; but Curtis, a year or two later, figured and described it very accurately. The five anthers converge into a kind of cone, meeting though not adhering at the top, and being below a slight distance apart. Inside these is the stigma, which exudes a viscid, honey-like liquid. The flies, attracted by this, insert their proboscides into the lowermost and widest part of the slit between each pair of anthers, pushing them upward, and, when satisfied, instead of drawing them out in the same direction downward, vary their position, and pull the proboscides upward into the narrow part of the slit. Here they become firmly fixed, and pulling is of no avail; so the poor insects usually perish miserably; pointing a striking moral to those who rashly engage in pleasure without first "counting the cost."

How it is that the "march of intellect"—which, as Mr. Darwin shows us, affects not only man, but the whole animal world—has not shown the unfortunate flies some means of escape, or suggested to them the expediency of drawing out their trunks in the same direction in which they inserted them, it is difficult to say.

A yet more remarkable fly-trap, and one which is actually in use in California for the purpose of catching flies, is the Californian pitcher-plant, or Darlingtonia, which appears to be admirably contrived for effecting this object. Mr. Robinson describes the surface inside the pitcher as being smooth for a little way down, then isolated hairs appear, and soon the chamber becomes densely lined with needle-like hairs, all pointing downward. These hairs are very slender, transparent, and about a quarter of an inch long, but have a needle-like rigidity, and are perfectly colorless. "The poor flies, moths, lady-birds, etc., seem to travel down these conveniently arranged stubbles, but none seem to turn back. The pitcher, which may be a couple of lines wide at the top, narrows very gradually, and at its base is about a line in diameter. Here, and for some little distance above this point, the vegetable needles of course converge, and the unhappy fly goes on till he finds his head against the firm thick bottom of the cell, and his rear against myriads of bayonets; and here he dies. Very small creatures fill up the narrow base, and above them larger ones densely pack themselves to death in the hope of fighting their way out." There is often a thick, reddish juice at the bottom of these pitchers, which may probably be attractive to insects; but whether any benefit accrues to the plant from their entrapment is not ascertained.

Lastly, so far as our present notice is concerned, a German writer has made the discovery that Dracæna paniculata kills flies, especially when the plant stands several feet from a window. The dead flies hang to the under side of the leaf, which shows a regard for tidiness highly creditable to them. On the whole, however, we do not think that any of our floral fly-traps are likely to come into general use, so we must for the present be content to endure philosophically the annual incursion of the small marauders.

THEN AND NOW.

SHE stood at the threshold at evening;
She was clad in her bridal dress;
She knew he was ready to greet her,
And she longed for his fond caress.

'Twas the robe she should wear on the morrow,
And she wanted her love to see
How fair was his chosen flower,
How beauteous his darling could be.

And Hope with her glittering finger
Bade her look to the life before,
And she smiled in the mirth of her spirit
As she stood at the study door.

Years passed, three short years of gladness,
And the stream of her young life flowed
Like the stream of a laughing rivulet
When the sunshine knows no cloud.

And again does she stand on the threshold,
Where she stood on that happy night;
But her eyes are no longer laughing,
Her dress is no longer white.

And the sorrow that plays o'er her features
Is as dark as the robe she wears,
And a wreath of undying flowers
To lay on the dead she bears.

For he never again shall greet her,
He shall rise to receive her no more;
The voice which she loved is silent
As she waits at the study door.

Then her step was so firm and eager,
It is now so subdued and slow;
Then 'twas he who had stooped to kiss her,
She must kneel to kiss him now.

But e'en so, with consoling finger,
Hope points to the life above,
Where beyond the dark night of sorrow
Is the dawn of eternal love.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.—(Continued.)

ONCE having given her promise, there was no such thing as drawing back for Clarissa, even had she been so minded. Mr. Lovel told the anxious lover that his fate was favorably decided, warning him at the same time that it would be well to refrain from any hazardous haste, and to maintain as far as possible that laudable patience and reserve which had distinguished his conduct up to this point.

"Clarissa is very young," said her father; "and I do not pretend to tell you that she is able to reciprocate, as fully as I might wish, the ardor of your attachment. One could hardly expect that all at once."

"No, one could hardly expect that," Mr. Granger echoed, with a faint sigh.

"As a man of the world, you would not, I am sure, my dear Granger, overlook the fact of the very wide difference in your ages, or expect more than is reasonable. Clarissa admires and esteems you, I am sure, and is deeply grateful for a devotion of which she declares herself undeserving. She is not a vain, frivolous girl, who thinks a man's best affection only a tribute due to her attractions. And there is a kind of love which grows up in a girl's heart for a sensible man who loves her, and which I believe with all my soul to be better worth having than the romantic nonsense young people take for the grand passion. I make no profession, you see, my dear Granger, on my daughter's part; but I have no fear but that Clarissa will learn to love you, in good time, as truly as you can desire to be loved."

"Unless I thought that she had some affection for me, I would never ask her to be my wife," said Mr. Granger.

"Wouldn't you?" thought Mr. Lovel. "My poor Granger, you are farther gone than you suppose!"

"You can give me your solemn assurance upon one point, eh, Lovel?" said the master of Arden Court, anxiously: "there is no one else in the case? Your daughter's heart is quite free? It is only a question as to whether I can win it?"

"Her heart is entirely free, and as pure as a child's. She is full of affection, poor girl, only yearning to find an outlet for it. She ought to make you a good wife, Daniel Granger. There is nothing against her doing so."

"God grant she may!" replied Mr. Granger, solemnly; "God knows how dearly I love her, and what a new thing this love is to me!"

He took heed of his future father-in-law's counsel, and said nothing more about his hopes to Clarissa just yet a while. It was only by an undefinable change in his manner—a deeper, graver tenderness in his tone—that she guessed her father must have told him her decision.

From this day forth all clouds vanished from the domestic sky at Mill Cottage. Mr. Lovel's debts were paid; no more threatening letters made his breakfast-table a terror to him; there were only agreeable-looking stamped documents in receipt of payment, with little apologetic notes, and entreaties for future favors.

Mr. Granger's proposals respecting a settlement were liberal, but, taking into consideration the amount of his wealth, not lavish. He offered to settle a thousand a year upon his wife—five hundred for her own use as pin-money, five hundred as an annuity for her father. He might as easily have given her three thousand, or six thousand, and it was for no lack of generous inclination that he held his hand; but he did not want to do any thing that might seem like buying his wife. Nor did Marmaduke Lovel give the faintest hint of a desire for larger concessions from his future son-in-law: he conducted the business with the lofty air of a man above the consideration of figures. Five hundred a year was not much to get from a man in Granger's position; but, added to his annuity of three hundred, it would make eight—a very decent income for a man who had only himself to provide for; and then, of course, there would be no possibility of his ever wanting money, with such a son-in-law to fall back upon.

Mr. Granger did not lose any time in making his daughter acquainted with the change that was about to befall her. He was quite prepared to find her adverse to his wishes, and quite prepared to defend his choice; and yet, little subject as he was to any kind of mental weakness, he did feel rather nervous as he cleared his throat from some imaginary huskiness before addressing Miss Granger.

It was after dinner, and the father and daughter were sitting alone in the small Gothic dining-room, sheltered from possible draughts by medieval screens of stamped leather and brazen scroll-work, and in a glowing atmosphere of mingled fire and lamp light, making a pretty cabinet-picture of home life, which might have pleased a Belgian painter.

"I think, Sophia," said Mr. Granger, after that preliminary throat-scraping—"I think, my dear, there is no occasion for me to tell you that there is a certain friend and neighbor of yours who is something more to me than the ordinary young ladies of your acquaintance."

Miss Granger seemed as if she were trying to swallow some hard substance—a knotty little bit of the pine-apple she had just been eating, perhaps—before she replied to this speech of her father's.

"I am sure, papa, I am quite at a loss to comprehend your meaning," she said at last. "I have no near neighbor whom I can call my friend, unless you mean Mrs. Patterly, the doctor's wife, who has taken such a warm interest in my clothing-club, and has such a beautiful mind altogether. But you would hardly call her a young lady."

"Patterly's wife! no, I should think not!" exclaimed Mr. Granger, impatiently. "I was speaking of Clarissa Lovel."

Miss Granger drew herself up suddenly, and pinched her lips together as if they were never to unclose again. She did open them, nevertheless, after a pause, to say, in an icy tone,

"Miss Lovel is my acquaintance, but not my friend."

"Why should she not be your friend? She is a very charming girl."

"Oh yes, I have no doubt of that, papa, from your point of view; that is to say, she is very pretty, and thinks a great deal of dress, and is quite ready to flirt with any one who likes to flirt with her—I am sure you must have seen that at Hale Castle—and fills her scrap-book with portraits of engaged men . witness all those drawings of Mr. Fairfax. I have no doubt she is just the kind of person gentlemen call charming; but she is no friend of mine, and she never will be."

"I am sorry to hear that," said her father, sternly; "for she is very likely to be your stepmother."

It was a death-blow, but one that Sophia Granger had anticipated for a long time.

"You are going to marry Miss Lovel, papa—a girl two years younger than I?"

"Yes, I am going to marry Miss Lovel, and I am very proud of her youth and beauty; but I do not admit her want of more solid charms than those, Sophia. I have watched her conduct as a daughter, and I have a most perfect faith in the goodness and purity of her heart."

"Oh, very well, papa. Of course you know what is best for your own happiness. It is not for me to presume to offer an opinion; I trust I have too clear a sense of duty for that." And here Miss Granger gave a sigh expressive of resignation under circumstances of profound affliction.

"I believe you have, Sophy," answered her father, kindly. "I believe that, however unwelcome this change may be to you at first—and I suppose it is only natural that it should be unwelcome—you will reconcile your mind to it fully when you discover that it is for my happiness. I am not ashamed to confess to you that I love Clarissa very fondly, and that I look forward to a happy future when she is my wife."

"I hope, papa, that your life has been not unhappy hitherto—that I have not in any manner failed in my duties as a daughter."

"Oh dear, no, child; of course not. That has nothing to do with the question."

"Will it—the marriage—be very soon, papa?" asked Miss Granger, with another gulp, as if there were still some obstructive substance in her throat.

"I hope so, Sophy. There is no reason, that I can see, why it should not be very soon."

"And will Mr. Lovel come to live with us?"

"I don't know; I have never contemplated such a possibility. I think Mr. Lovel is scarcely the kind of person who would care to live in another man's house."

"But this has been his own house, you see, papa, and will seem to belong to him again when his daughter is the mistress of it. I dare say he will look upon us as nothing more than interlopers."

"I don't think so, Sophia. Mr. Lovel is a gentleman, and a sensible man into the bargain. He is not likely to have any absurd ideas of that kind."

"I suppose he is very much pleased at having secured such a rich husband for his daughter," Miss Granger hazarded presently, with the air of saying something agreeable.

"Sophia!" exclaimed her father, angrily, "I must beg that the question of money may never be mooted in relation to Miss Lovel and myself, by you above all people. I dare say there may be men and women in the world malignant enough to say—mean enough to suppose—that this dear girl can only consent to marry me because I am a rich man. It is my happiness to know her to be much too noble to yield to any sordid consideration of that kind. It is my happiness to know that her father has done nothing to urge this marriage upon her. She gives herself to me of her own free-will, not hurried into decision by any undue persuasion of mine, and under no pressure from outer circumstances."

"I am very glad to hear it, papa. I think I should have broken my heart if I had seen you the dupe of a mercenary woman."

Mr. Granger got up from his seat with an impatient air, and began to pace the room. His daughter had said very little, but that little had been beyond measure irritating to him. It galled him to think that this marriage should seem to her an astonishing, perhaps even a preposterous thing. True that the woman he was going to marry was younger, by a year or two, than his own daughter. In his own mind there was so little sense of age that he could scarcely understand why the union should seem discordant. He was not quite fifty—an age which he had heard men call the very prime and meridian of life; and he felt himself younger now than he had ever been since he first assumed the cares of manhood—first grew grave with the responsibilities involved in the disposal of a great fortune. Was not this newly born love, this sudden awakening of a heart that had slumbered so long, a renewal of youth? Mr. Granger glanced at his own reflection in a glass over a buffet as he paced to and fro. The figure that he saw there bore no sign of age. It was a relief to him to discover that—a thing he had never thought of till that moment.

"Why should she not love me?" he asked himself. "Are youth and a handsome face the only high-road to a woman's heart? I can't believe it. Surely constancy and devotion must count for something. Is there another man in the world who would love her as well as I? who could say, at fifty years of age, This is my first love?"

"I am to give up the housekeeping, of course, papa, when you are married," Miss Granger said presently, with that subdued air of resignation in which she had wrapped herself as in a garment since her father's announcement.

"Give up the housekeeping!" he echoed, a little impatiently; "I don't see the necessity for that. Clarissa"—oh, how sweet it was to him to pronounce her name, and with that delicious sense of proprietorship!—"Clarissa is too young to care much for that sort of thing, dealing out groceries and keeping account-books, as you do. Very meritorious, I am sure, my dear, and no doubt useful. No, I don't suppose you'll be interfered with, Sophy. In all essentials you will still be mistress. If Clarissa is queen, you will be prime minister; and you know it is the minister who really pulls the strings. And I do hope that in time you two will get to love each other."

"I shall endeavor to do my duty, papa," Miss Granger answered, primly. "We can not command our feelings."

It was some feeble relief to her to learn that her grocery books, her day-books by double-entry, and all those other commercial volumes dear to her heart, were not to be taken away from her; that she was still to retain the petty powers she had held as the sole daughter of Daniel Granger's house and heart. But to resign her place at the head of her father's table, to see Clarissa courted and caressed, to find faltering allegiance perhaps even among her model poor—all these things would be very bitter, and in her heart Sophia Granger was angry with her father for a line of conduct which she considered the last stage of folly. She loved him after her own precise, well-regulated fashion—loved him as well as a creature so self-conscious could be expected to love; but she could not easily forgive him for an act which seemed, in some sort, a fraud upon herself. She had been brought up to believe herself his sole heiress, to look upon his second marriage as an utter impossibility. How often had she heard him ridicule the notion when it was suggested to him by some jocose acquaintance! and it did seem a very hard thing that she should be pushed all at once from this lofty stand-point and leveled to the very dust. There would be a new family, of course; a brood of sons and daughters to divide her heritage. Hannah Warman had suggested as much when discussing the probability of the marriage with that friendly candor and disposition to look at the darkest side of the picture which are apt to distinguish confidantes of her class.

"I am sure, papa," Miss Granger whimpered by-and-by, not quite able to refrain from some expression of ill temper, "I have scarcely had a pleasant evening since you have known the Lovels. You are always there, and it is very dull to be alone every night."

"It has been your own fault in some measure, Sophy. You might have had Clarissa here if you'd chosen to cultivate her friendship."

"Our inclinations are beyond our control, papa. Nothing but your express commands and a sense of duty would induce me to select Miss Lovel for a companion. There is no sympathy between us."

"Why should there not be? You can not think her unamiable, nor question her being highly accomplished."

"But it is not a question of playing, or singing, or painting, or talking foreign languages, papa. One selects a friend for higher qualities than those. There is Mary Anne Patterly, for instance, who can scarcely play the bass in a set of quadrilles, but whose admirable gifts and Christian character have endeared her to me. Miss Lovel is so frivolous. See how stupid and listless she seemed that day we took her over the schools and cottages. I don't believe she was really interested in any thing she saw. And, though she has been at home a year and a half, she has not once offered to take a class in either of the schools."

"I dare say she sees the schools are well officered, my dear, and doesn't like to interfere with your functions."

"No, papa, it is not that. She has no vocation for serious things. Her mind is essentially frivolous; you will discover that for yourself by-and-by. I speak in perfect candor, you know, papa. Whatever your feelings about Miss Lovel may be, I am above concealing mine. I believe I know my duty, but I can not stoop to hypocrisy."

"I suppose not. But I must say you might have taken this business in a pleasanter spirit, Sophia. I shall expect, however, to see you take more pains to overcome your prejudice against the young lady I have chosen for my wife; and I shall be rather slow to believe in your affection for myself unless it shows itself in that manner."

Miss Granger covered her face with her handkerchief, and burst into a flood of tears.

"Oh, papa, papa, it only needed that! To think that any one's influence can make my father doubt my affection for him after all these years of duty and obedience!"

Mr. Granger muttered something about "duty" which was the very reverse of a blessing, and walked out of the room, leaving Sophia to her tears.

CHAPTER XXV.

WEDDING BELLS.

THERE was no reason why the marriage should not take place very soon. Mr. Granger said so; Mr. Lovel agreed with him, half reluctantly, as it were, and with the air of a man who is far from eager to precipitate events. There was no imaginable reason for delay.

Upon this point Mr. and Mrs. Oliver were as strong as Daniel Granger himself. A union in every way so propitious could not be too speedily made secure. Matthew Oliver was full of demonstrative congratulations now when he dined at Mill Cottage.

"Who would have guessed when I brought you home from the station that morning, and we drove through the park, that you were going to be mistress of it so soon, Clary?" he exclaimed, triumphantly. "Do you remember crying when you heard the place was sold? I do, poor child; I can see your piteous face at this moment. And now it is going to be yours again. Upon my word, Providence has been very good to you, Clarissa."

Providence had been very good to her. They all told her the same story. Among her few friends there was not one who seemed to suspect that this marriage might be a sacrifice; that in her heart of hearts there might be some image brighter than Daniel Granger's.

She found herself staring at these congratulatory friends in blank amazement sometimes, wondering that they should all look at this engagement of hers from the same point of view, all be so very certain of her happiness.

Had she not reason to be happy, however? There had been a time when she had talked and thought of her lost home almost as Adam and Eve may have done when yet newly expelled from Paradise, with the barren world in all its strangeness before them. Was it not something to win back this beloved dwelling-place—something to secure comfort for her father's age—to secure an income which might enable her to help her brother in the days to come? Nor was the man she had promised to marry obnoxious to her. He had done much toward winning her regard in the patient progress of his wooing. She believed him to be a good and honorable man, whose affection was something that a woman might be proud of having won—a man whom it would be a bitter thing to offend. She was clear-sighted enough to perceive his superiority to her father—his utter truthfulness and openness of character. She did feel just a little proud of his love. It was something to see this big, strong man, vigorous in mind as in body, reduced to so complete a bondage, yet not undignified even in his slavery.

What was it, then, which came between her and the happiness which that congratulatory chorus made so sure of? Only the image of the man she had loved—the man she had rejected for honor's sake that bleak October evening in the chilly moonlight, and whom she had never ceased to think of since that time. She knew that Daniel Granger was, in all likelihood, a better and a nobler man than George Fairfax; but the face that had been with her in the dimly lighted railway carriage, the friendly voice that had cheered her on the first night of her womanhood, were with her still.

More than once, since that wintry afternoon when Mr. Granger had claimed her as his own for the first time, taking her to his breast with a grave and solemn tenderness, and telling her that every hope and desire of his mind were centred in her, and that all his life to come would be devoted to securing her happiness—more than once since that day she had been tempted to tell her lover all the truth, and that there was a memory that came between her and her desire to give him a fitting return for his affection; but shame kept her silent. She did not know how to begin her confession. On that afternoon she had been strangely passive, like a creature stunned by some great surprise; and yet, after what she had said to her father, she expected every day that Mr. Granger would speak.

After a good deal of discussion among third parties, and an undeviatingly quiet urgency on the part of Mr. Granger himself, it was arranged that the wedding should take place at the end of May, and that Clarissa should see Switzerland in its brightest aspect. She had once expressed a longing for Alpine peaks and glaciers in her lover's presence, and he had from that moment determined that Switzerland should be the scene of his honey-moon. They would go there so early as to avoid the herd of autumnal wanderers. He knew the country, and could map out the fairest roads for their travels, the pleasantest resting-places for their repose. And if Clarissa cared to explore Italy afterward, and spend October and November in Rome, she could do so. All the world would be bright and new to him with her for his companion. He looked forward with boyish eagerness to revisiting scenes that he had fancied himself weary of until now. Yes; such a love as this was indeed a renewal of youth.

To all arrangements made on her behalf Clarissa was submissive. What could a girl not twenty urge against the will of a man like Daniel Granger, supported by such powerful allies as father and uncle and aunt and friends? She thanked him more warmly than usual when he proposed the Swiss tour. Yes; she had wished very much to see that country. Her brother had gone there on a walking expedition when he was little more than a boy, and had very narrowly escaped with his life from the perils of the road. She had some of his Alpine sketches, in a small port-folio of particular treasures, to this day.

Mrs. Oliver reveled in the business of the trousseau. Never since the extravagant days of her early youth had she enjoyed such a feast of millinery. To an aunt the provision of a wedding outfit is peculiarly delightful. She has all the pomp and authority of a parent, without a parent's responsibility. She stands in loco parentis with regard to every thing except the bill. No uneasy twinge disturbs her as the glistening silk glides through the shopman's hands, and ebbs and flows in billows of brightness on the counter. No demon of calculation comes between her and the genius of taste when the milliner suggests an extra flounce of Malines, or a pelerine of Honiton.

A trip to London, and a fortnight or so spent in West End shops, would have been very agreeable to Mrs. Oliver; but on mature reflection she convinced herself that to purchase her niece's trousseau in London would be a foolish waste of power. The glory to be obtained in Wigmore or Regent Street was a small thing compared with the kudos that would arise to her from the expenditure of a round sum of money among the simple traders of Holborough. Thus it was that Clarissa's wedding finery was all ordered at Brigson and Holder's, the great linen-drapers in Holborough market-place, and all made by Miss Mallow, the chief milliner and dress-maker of Holborough, who was in a flutter of excitement from the moment she received the order, and held little levees among her most important customers for the exhibition of Miss Lovel's silks and laces.

Toward the end of April there came a letter of congratulation from Lady Laura Armstrong, who was still in Germany: a very cordial and affectionate letter, telling Clarissa how the tidings of her engagement had just reached Baden; but not telling her how the news had come, and containing not a word of allusion to Lady Geraldine or George Fairfax.

"Now that every thing is so happily settled, Clary," wrote my lady, "without any finesse or diplomacy on my part, I don't mind telling you that I have had this idea in my head from the very first day I saw you. I wanted you to win back Arden Court, the place you love so dearly; and as Mr. Granger, to my mind, is a very charming person, nothing seemed more natural than that my wishes should be realized. But I really did not hope that matters would arrange themselves so easily and so speedily. A thousand good wishes, dear, both for yourself and your papa. We hope to spend the autumn at Hale, and I suppose I shall then have the pleasure of seeing you begin your reign as mistress of Arden Court. You must give a great many parties, and make yourself popular in the neighborhood at once. Entre nous, I think our friend Miss Granger is rather fond of power. It will be wise on your part to take your stand in the beginning of things, and then affairs are pretty sure to go pleasantly. Ever your affectionate

"LAURA ARMSTRONG."

Not a word about George Fairfax. Clarissa wondered where he was; whether he was still angry with her, or had forgotten her altogether. The latter seemed the more likely state of affairs. She wondered about him, and then reminded herself that she had no right even to wonder now. His was an image which must be blotted out of her life. She cut all those careless sketches out of her drawing-book. If it had only been as easy to tear the memory of him out of her mind!

The end of May came very quickly, and with it Clarissa's wedding-day. Before that day Miss Granger made a little formal address to her future step-mother—an address worded with studious humility—promising a strict preformance of duty on Miss Granger's part in their new relations.

This awful promise was rather alarming to Clarissa, in whose mind Sophia seemed one of those superior persons whom one is bound to respect and admire, yet against whom some evil spark of the old Adam in our degraded natures is ever ready to revolt.

"Pray don't talk of duty, my dear Sophia," she answered, in a shy, tremulous way, clinging a little closer to Mr. Granger's arm. It was at Mill Cottage that this conversation took place, a few days before the wedding. "There can scarcely be a question of duty between people of the same age, like you and me. But I hope we shall get to love each other more and more every day."

"Of course you will," cried Daniel Granger, heartily. "Why should you not love each other? If your tastes don't happen to be exactly the same just now, habitual intercourse will smooth down all that, and you'll find all manner of things in which you can sympathize. I've told Sophy that I don't suppose you'll interfere much with her housekeeping, Clarissa. That's rather a strong point with her, and I don't think it's much in your line."

Miss Granger tightened her thin lips with a little convulsive movement. This speech seemed to imply that Miss Lovel's was a loftier line than hers.

Clarissa remembered Lady Laura's warning, and felt that she might be doing wrong in surrendering the housekeeping. But then, on the other hand, she felt herself quite unable to cope with Miss Granger's account-books.

"I have never kept a large house," she said. "I should be very sorry to interfere."

"I was sure of it," exclaimed Mr. Granger; "and you will have more time to be my companion, Clarissa, if your brain is not muddled with groceries and butcher's-meat. You see, Sophia has such a peculiarly business-like mind."

"However humble my gifts may be, I have always endeavored to employ them for your benefit, papa," Miss Granger replied, with a frosty air.

She had come to dine at Mill Cottage for the first time since she had known of her father's engagement. She had come in deference to her father's express desire, and it was a hard thing for her to offer even this small tribute to Clarissa. It was a little family dinner—the Olivers, Mr. Padget, the rector of Arden, who was to assist cheery Matthew Oliver in tying the fatal knot, and Mr. and Miss Granger—a pleasant little party of seven, for whom Mr. Lovel's cook had prepared quite a model dinner. She had acquired a specialty for about half a dozen dishes which her master affected, and in the preparation of these could take her stand against the pampered matron who ruled Mr. Granger's kitchen at a stipend of seventy pounds a year, and whose subordinate and assistant had serious thoughts of launching herself upon the world as a professed cook by advertisement in the Times—"clear soups, entrées, ices, etc."

The wedding was to be a very quiet one. Mr. Lovel had expressed a strong desire that it should be so; and Mr. Granger's wishes in no way clashed with those of his father-in-law.

"I am a man of fallen fortunes," said Mr. Lovel, "and all Yorkshire knows my history. Any thing like pomp or publicity would be out of place in the marriage of my daughter. When she is your wife it will be different. Her position will be a very fine one; for she will have some of the oldest blood in the county, supported by abundance of money. The Lycians used to take their names from their mothers. I think, if you have a son, Granger, you ought to call him Lovel."

"I shall be proud to do so," answered Mr. Granger. "I am not likely to forget that my wife is my superior in social rank."

"A superiority that counts for very little when unsustained by hard cash, my dear Granger," returned Marmaduke Lovel, lightly. He was supremely content with the state of affairs, and had no wish to humiliate his son-in-law.

So the wedding was performed as simply as if Miss Lovel had been uniting her fortunes with those of some fledgeling of the curate species. There were only two bride-maids—Miss Granger, who performed the office with an unwilling heart; and Miss Pontifex, a flaxen-haired young lady of high family and no particular means, provided for the occasion by Mrs. Oliver, at whose house she and Clarissa had become acquainted. There was a breakfast, elegant enough in its way—for the Holborough confectioner had been put upon his mettle by Mrs. Oliver—served prettily in the cottage parlor. The sun shone brightly upon Mr. Granger's espousals. The village children lined the church-yard walk, and strewed spring flowers upon the path of bride and bridegroom—tender vernal blossoms which scarcely harmonized with Daniel Granger's stalwart presence and fifty years. Clarissa, very pale and still, with a strange, fixed look on her face, came out of the little church upon her husband's arm; and it seemed to her in that hour as if all the life before her was like an unknown country, hidden by dense mists and fogs, she had thought of it so little. This day, which was to make so great a change in her destiny, had come upon her almost unawares.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

TRAVELING is generally comfortable and agreeable in proportion to the good habits and temper of the traveler. If your trunk is but three-quarters packed when the express-man calls for it, and you crowd in your last articles while he is impatiently waiting at the door; if you are behindhand yourself, and reach boat or cars just at the moment of starting, and rush on board panting and heated—it is a bad beginning. Probably every thing will go wrong with you during the entire journey. If you are traveling for pleasure, take time for your packing, and time to reach wharf or station comfortably. It is not essential to go by the "most popular" and "fastest" route. Frequently that is the most uncomfortable. Choose a well-managed route which is not likely to be overcrowded. Then you will probably obtain good accommodations. It is surprising to notice how disagreeable persons can make themselves to their traveling companions. Some are merely selfish, others are positively rude. As an experiment, let one seek for the reactionary effect of trying to make others comfortable. What satisfaction can there be in bristling up with indignation if a stranger asks a question; or in looking upon all the children who happen to be in boat or car as if they had no business to be away from their homes? The other day we noticed a respectably dressed woman sitting in the saloon of one of the Sound steamers. Evidently she was unaccustomed to traveling. She addressed some question to a fretful-looking but stylishly dressed lady, but was immediately silenced by the supercilious stare which was the only reply she received. After an hour, when most of the fashionables were supping, she made a second venture. "I have paid five dollars for this," said she, showing her ticket; "is it right? You know better than I do." A glance at the ticket, one or two inquiries, and a simple assurance that it was "all right" were sufficient to satisfy the woman, who evidently could not read. She went her way, grateful and happy. If you will spend ten minutes in amusing that weary, restless child who sits before you in the car, you will be more than repaid by the grateful look that dawns upon the mother's face at the thought that her pet is not regarded as a nuisance. And it should not be too great a strain upon the courtesy of any traveler, when occupying a double seat in the cars, to make room for one who enters and looks anxiously for a vacant place. But how often we see a gentleman who has put his portmanteau in the outside seat—as much as to say "this is occupied"—while he sits on the inner seat reading his newspaper, and calmly oblivious of the fact that a dozen, who have paid for as good accommodations as himself, are searching for a seat; or a lady, who, having located sachel and shawl in the seat beside her, gazes steadfastly out of the window, until roused by a direct application for the seat. Then, most likely, she moves her luggage with an air indicative of discontent and injury. And we have seen a whole party of travelers occupying twice as many seats as they had paid for, with complaisance and, we had almost said, stupid indifference, while others were standing near them, unable to find seats. True politeness shows itself every where.

A project is under consideration for constructing a tunnel through the Sierra Nevada of sufficient size to admit of the passage of trains and a canal. This tunnel will save to the Pacific Railroad Company a distance of seven miles and an ascent and descent of 1000 feet, and make almost wholly unnecessary the use of snow sheds.

Point-a-Pitre, Guadeloupe, West Indies, is unfortunate. In 1843 the town was destroyed by an earthquake. The inhabitants, being in dread of another affliction of the same kind, rebuilt the town entirely of wood. On the 18th of July nearly the whole city was destroyed by fire, the work of an incendiary, and from twenty to thirty thousand persons rendered homeless.

The Bois de Boulogne, of Paris, is beginning to smile again. Wonders are being done in the way of planting trees to replace those cut down, and flower beds which had been trampled down by the soldiers and their horses are being laid out again by skillful gardeners.

Through the week following the terrible disaster on the ferry-boat Westfield, reports of additional deaths among those wounded reached us every day, until the number amounted to ninety-six; and even then the hospitals contained many burned and scalded patients whose lives were in danger.

The investigation of the United States inspectors into the cause of the explosion on the Westfield, and the general examination of ferry-boat boilers, will, we trust, at least secure the use of unpatched and strongly constructed boilers, and the employment of careful, skillful, intelligent engineers.

The "Helping-Hand Association" of this city, whose object is "to improve the condition of the women of our city by teaching them to help themselves by honest labor," reports four hundred women under instruction last year.

An exchange tells us of a remarkable woman living in Detroit, who recently celebrated her one hundredth birthday, and who "can knit socks in four languages, and repeat the commandments with one hand behind her back." Truly a wonderful woman, or the exchange referred to has a treasure of a type-setter.

There is a pleasant significance in the circumstance that the Sandwich Islanders have sent $2000 to the poor peasants of France who were ruined by the war.

It is not worth while for college boys to be too smart on returning home to spend their vacations. They may find their parents can compete with them, as did the youngster who, fresh from college, attempted to prove that two are equal to three. "Is not that one?" demanded he, oracularly, pointing to a roasted chicken on the table; "and is not that two?" pointing to another; "and do not one and two make three?"

Whereupon his father said, "Wife, you take one, and I'll take the other, and our smart boy can have the third for his dinner."

The largest railroad dépôt in the world, probably, is that recently completed in this city, and located between Forty-second and Forty-fifth streets, near Fourth Avenue. It is constructed of iron and glass, thus being entirely fire-proof, and is 692 feet long, 240 feet wide, and 121 feet high.

The reputation of Americans for republican simplicity suffers in consequence of the extravagance of a limited number. While the majority of American citizens are industrious and frugal, the lavish expenditures of the minority are too often regarded as an index to the character of the whole people. The fact that $18,000 in gold was paid to a lace house in Paris by the wife of a New England Senator for six and a half yards of point lace, which European sovereigns considered too expensive for them to wear, does not prove any thing in regard to the general habits and character of our citizens. There are instances enough, however, to indicate that those who indulge in reckless expenditures are usually those who have acquired their money rapidly and without much labor. Those who gain riches by steady, successful industry seldom throw away their gold. They know its value. They may be free-hearted and benevolent, but they do not waste what has cost them honest toil.

No less than five newspapers have been established in the new African Golconda. Many who went there hoping to pick up precious gems have abandoned diamond-digging for journalism.

It appears that serious difficulties exist in regard to the ventilation of the Mont Cenis Tunnel. Unless it can be improved travelers will scarcely be inclined to venture into it, as there is danger of suffocation from the smoke and heat.

An agricultural university is about to be established in Virginia, on the grounds of the old Randolph College, consisting of about three hundred and fifty acres. The expenses for board, tuition, and books will be about one hundred dollars a year, each student being expected to labor personally to aid in defraying the general expenditures.

Over 257,000 baskets of peaches were shipped from Wilmington to this city in a single week.

Some of the horrible reports concerning the famine in Persia have been contradicted by the Persian embassador. This is, indeed, good news, if true; for, according to accounts which had come to us previously, this famine seemed to be the most appalling one of modern times. But even if the more hideous details of worse than cannibalism among the wretched people are untrue, there is no doubt a lamentable scarcity of food in the central and southern provinces, and fearful suffering consequent upon it.

The Morning Star recently arrived at Honolulu, after a passage of 123 days, from Boston. This missionary ship was to leave Honolulu about the last of July, on a cruise of three or four months among the mission stations west of the Sandwich Islands. A number of missionaries to various parts of Micronesia sailed in her.

A Montreal audience recently brought a sensational performance to a summary termination. During some feats upon the flying trapeze one of two young girls fell, and sustained considerable injury. The father of the child subsequently forced her upon the stage, and attempted to make her take another leap. The indignant audience protested, and finally several gentlemen took possession of the stage, and the inhuman father was compelled to end the show.

We have often heard of a "Flirtation Walk" or a "Lovers' Lane" in some town or village; but only very lately were we aware that "Pop-the-question Avenue" is the name of a thoroughfare in Mishawaka. Does a simple promenade through it serve as an expression of the heart's desire, or are words necessary?

From the Alleghany Mountains comes a refreshingly cool account of the "midsummer heats" experienced by a fishing-party. The farther south they journeyed the colder it grew, and before reaching the camping-ground thin ice could be discerned in the mud-puddles in the roads. This under a July sun! They warmed their benumbed limbs by a fire, and crept under their blankets the first night. They thought to catch some trout for breakfast next morning, but found their pathway covered with snow, and met a native with something on his feet that resembled snow-shoes. The creature had heard of their arrival, and came to sell them a supply of those indispensable articles. From him they learned that if they wished to drop a line in the river, an axe would be necessary to cut a hole in the ice. The trout-party regret that they did not take with them sleigh-bells and skates, and propose bringing home a select assortment of snow-balls to corroborate their statements concerning the weather.

Somebody argues that polygamy and extravagance in dress are as incompatible as fire and water; and that with the increasing reign of fashion in Salt Lake City a "new revelation" will soon enable each woman to aspire to as much of a husband as she can find in one man. This argument seems to be founded on a current report that one of Brigham's young and stylish wives recently gave an order to a merchant to purchase for her in New York an expensive silk dress. The matter was privately laid before the President, who, instead of countermanding the order, increased it to include his entire matrimonial circle, making thirty silk dresses instead of one. This may answer with Brigham, who has money enough; but if the many wives of the poorer prophets begin to hanker after silk dresses there will be likely to be a break in the household.

THE WEALD OF THE WEALD OF SURREY.

"A country where, strictly speaking, only three things will grow well—grass and wheat and oak-trees."—WILLIAM COBBETT.

SOUND truth he spake, that sturdy Englishman
Who for Reform was rather in a hurry,
When he declared old Mother Nature's plan
Concerning that delightful Weald of Surrey,
Whose beauty here is sketched by no impostor,
But a consummate artist—Birket Foster.

The dear old woodland Weald: though time may rob it
Of antique furnaces of glass and iron,
Yet the three things which took the heart of Cobbett
Still its demesne most pleasantly environ.
The grass grows green, the fortunate wheat-ear quickens,
The mighty oak-tree with the centuries thickens.

Haste to that corner, jaded Londoner,
Weary of Fleet Street traffic, Pall Mall trifles,
Weary of party strife, of Fashion's stir,
Weary of Wimbledon and Snider rifles:
Wander throughout the *Folds of that old Weald—
And taste the joys which simple pleasures yield.

You'll see the oaks and grass and glorious wheat;
You'll see of Surrey laborers the smartest;
You'll see delicious glades for pretty feet;
And you may see the dwelling of the Artist.
And if you take your sweetheart—it may cost her
A kiss or two, this sketch by Birket Foster.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. VII.

THE summer heats, which make nature lovely, are the bane of most that is lovely in our fair-skinned Northern girls. Southern frames receive the glowing warmth, and grow paler and paler, because—giving a matter-of-fact explanation of a beautiful appearance—the surface of the skin is cooled by the perspiration, and the blood retreats to the central veins. The "shining pallor" which poets love on the faces of their favorite creations is the sign and effect of concentrated passion of any kind in a quick, electric nature. I disbelieved in the expression a long time, classing it with the "marble flush" and such freaks of novel nature; but the peculiar look has come under my eye more than once, and a very striking one it is, as if the light came from within—a lustrous, elevated expression, too ethereal and of the spirit to be called even high-bred. It is one of the refinements nature gives to her ideal pieces of humanity, and nothing coarse lurks in the creation of the one who presents it. The Southern pallor is quite different—a dead but clear olive, very admirable when the skin is fine. Northern paleness is relieved rather than disfigured by a few golden freckles. They are piquant rather than otherwise; and girls with the pure complexion which attends auburn, blonde, and brown hair ought to consider them as caprices of nature to blend the hues of bright, warm hair and snowy skin. When large, and almost as dark as the patches on the tiger-lily, every one will own them something to be rid of with dispatch. Freckles indicate an excess of iron in the blood, we are told, the sun acting on the particles in the skin as it does on indelible ink, bringing out the color. A very simple way of removing them is said to be as follows:

Take finely powdered nitre (saltpetre), and apply it to the freckles by the finger moistened with water and dipped in the powder. When perfectly done and judiciously repeated it will remove them effectually and without trouble.

An old English prescription for the skin is to take half a pint of skim-milk—so poor as to be blue—slice into it as much cucumber as it will cover, and let it stand an hour; then bathe the se of buttermilk, which young ladies can hardly prefer as a cosmetic on account of its odor. A very delicate and effective preparation for rough skins, eruptive diseases, cuts, or ulcers is found in a mixture of one ounce of glycerine, half an ounce of rosemary, and twenty drops of carbolic acid. In those dreaded irritations of the skin occurring in summer, such as hives or prickly heat, this wash gives soothing relief. The carbolic acid at once neutralizes the poison of the blood, which causes the sore, purifies and disinfects the wound or blotch, and heals it rapidly. A solution of this acid in glycerine made much stronger, say fifty drops to an ounce of the glycerine, forms a protection from mosquitoes if applied at night. Though many people consider the remedy equal to the disease, constant use very soon reconciles one to the creosotic odor of the carbolic acid, especially if the pure crystallized form is used, which is far less overpowering in its fragrance than that commonly put up. Those who dislike it too much to use it at night will find the sting of the bites almost miraculously cured and the blotches removed by touching them with the mixture in the morning. This is penned with grateful recollection of its efficiency after the bites of Jersey mosquitoes a few nights ago. Babies and children should be touched with it to relieve the pain they feel from insect bites, but do not know how to express except by worrying. Two or three drops of attar of roses in the preparation disguises the smell so as to render it tolerable to human beings, though not so to mosquitoes.

Ladies who find that sea air turns their hair gray, or who are fearful of such a result, should keep it carefully oiled with some vegetable oil; not glycerine, as that combines with water too readily to protect the locks. The recipe for cold cream made with more of the almond-oil, so as to form a salve, is not a bad sea-dressing for the hair, and the spermaceti and wax render it less greasy than ordinary preparations. Animal pomades grow rancid, and make the head most unpleasant to touch and smell.

To restore the color to dark hair when it is lost through ill health or overstudy many preparations are given. But the fashionables to-day, with true taste, admire gray hair when in profusion, and deem it distinguished, especially when accompanied by dark eyes, to which the contrast adds a piercing lustre. But those who consider themselves defrauded of their natural tints may use this. Tincture acetate of iron, one ounce; water, one pint; glycerine, half an ounce; sulphuret of potassium, five grains. Mix well, and let the bottle remain uncovered to pass out the foul smell arising from the potassium. Afterward add a few drops of ambergris or attar of roses. Rub a little of this daily into the hair, and it will not only restore it to its original color, but benefit the health of the scalp.

Ladies are much troubled sometimes by the tendency of their hair to come out of crimp or curl while boating or horseback-riding. The only help for this is to apply the following bandoline before putting the hair in papers or irons. A quarter of an ounce of gum-tragacanth, one pint of rose-water, five drops of glycerine; mix and let stand overnight. If the tragacanth is not dissolved let it be half a day longer; if too thick, add more rose-water, and let it be for some hours. When it is a smooth solution, nearly as thin as glycerine, it is fit to use. This is excellent to make the hair curl. Moisten a lock of hair with it, not too wet, and brush round a warm curling-iron, or put up in papillotes. If the curl comes out harsh and stiff, brush it round a cold iron or curling-stick with a very little of the cosmetic used for keeping stray hair in place, or, better still, the cold cream salve mentioned above. As the recipe for the cold cream was given a long time ago, and ladies who read this article may not have seen it, another is added, of perhaps finer proportions. Oil of sweet almonds, five parts; spermaceti, three parts; white wax, half a part; attar of roses, three to five drops. Melt together in a shallow dish, set over hot water, so as not to heat too much, strain through a piece of muslin if it is not perfectly clear when melted, and as it begins to cool beat it with a silver spoon till quite cold and of a snowy whiteness. It is well to rub it smooth on a slab of marble or porcelain before putting it up in glass boxes to keep. For the hair use seven parts of almond-oil to the other proportions named. The secret of making fine cold cream lies in stirring and beating it well all the time it is cooling.

contact of the low and degraded—and charitable persons sometimes run narrow risks of this kind—or from scorbutic affections or the fumes of certain medicines, each and any of which are liable to produce roughness and inflammation of the skin, will be glad to know of a speedy and certain cure for their affliction. It is a wash of sulphurous acid (not sulphuric) diluted in the proportion of three parts of soft water to one of the acid, and used three or four times a day till relieved. I knew a young lady whose fine complexion was ruined by the fumes of medicine she administered to her grandmother, whom she tended with religious care; and, thinking there may be others in the like case, hasten to give this ready prescription. Sub rosa—all parasites on furniture, human beings, or pets are quickly destroyed by this application.

In answer to repeated inquiries, the writer would say that the walnut stain for skin or hair is made precisely like that for cloth, by boiling the bark—say an ounce to a pint of water—for an hour, slowly, and adding a lump of alum the size of a thimble to set the dye. Apply with a little brush, such as is used in water-colors, to the lashes and eyebrows, or with a sponge to the hair. Wrap the head in an old handkerchief when going to sleep, or the moisture of the hair may stain the pillow-cases. Also, the right proportion for ammonia in bathing is two tablespoonfuls of the strong spirit of ammonia in a basin of water, say two quarts and a half. This is far more efficacious to give a sweet and wholesome presence than perfumes, sachets, or the horrible musk powders which some ladies still have the strange taste to use.

"DARLING."

"DARLING!" He spoke it with a tone that drowned.
Deeps the word has, breathed between mothers' lips,
Other than when the quick dissyllable slips
From mouth to mouth of girl-friends who have found
Each other dear. "Darling"—the word was bound
About my child-neck by my father's arms,
Graved on my face by brothers, and had charms
Shaded as infinitely as the sea's one sound.

Yea! all within one compass!—But this word,
Whereof I lay the sweetness to my tongue,
And mimic the intonation as it stirred
My hair, is mellower than a deep song sung
In the deep night by mellowest-throated bird,
And not the old word, but one forever young!

MARIE OF VILLEFRANCHE.

IT was a cold, snowy day when I went to see Marie: the villagers had their heads tied up in brilliant-colored handkerchiefs, contrasting pleasantly with the white snow, and they shuffled quickly over their errands in their clanking sabots. There was a good deal of talk and laughter among them, but all the faces looked pinched and cold.

"Where did Marie la Veuve live?" I asked. All knew, and all were willing to show me the way; for "Marie was the village favorite," as one of the gossips explained to me. "She kept a silent tongue in her head; had been a good daughter, sister, and wife; was helpful to those in trouble, and joyful with those who rejoiced; but things were going badly with Marie since the birth of her fatherless child, and there was no hope of peace, and these coquins de Prussiens were eating up the land."

When I entered Marie's room she was lying on her bed, white and still, with a little swaddled bundle beside her. "This is my baby," she whispered, setting upright the little stiff image. The baby opened its dark eyes and looked at me with that entire want of speculation in its gaze common to its kind. Marie said no more, but her face was as speaking in interest as her child's was vacant; she took my hand and held it in both of hers. There was not silence in the room, however, for beside the bed stood the voluble little mother-in-law, telling me all the symptoms: how there was no milk for the little one, how feverish the mother was, what sleepless nights, what exhausting days. "The doctor says it is because there is trouble on the mind. Of course there is trouble, with the husband dead, shot down before the eyes of his brother, on the heights above Sedan, on that fatal day of August 31; of course there is trouble, with nothing to eat, and all the little savings going. Is it not all true, ma mère?" And the little old woman turned for corroboration to a bent figure sitting at the farther corner of the room, stretching out lean, long fingers toward the glow from the little stove.

"Yes, yes," murmured this other; "it is the war, famine, and fever that have done it all. I have just this and that," taking up the hem of her dress and petticoat; "just this and that; all gone. And then the smell of powder and blood!"

"Never mind her," said the other to me, apologetically; "her mind is gone, but she is Marie's mother, and in her day was the belle of the village; she married well, and had a farm of her own, plenty of linen, and three great lits montés. Marie was not the only child; there was another, a boy, humpbacked and of weak intellect, who showed no love for any one but Marie, and her whole life was devoted to him until he died. My son never laughed at him as the other village lads did, but would spend long hours in amusing him, and the boy was never stubborn or willful with Jacques. And then Marie married my son, and all the village said she might have done better; but a man who is gentle with children is sure to be gentle with women, and a son who is thoughtful for his mother is likely to make a good husband; and so I told Marie; and to Jacques I said, 'Never leave off asking her until you get her;' and in the end he did win her. And now he has died fighting for his country, and I am proud and satisfied, though I am not happy." The brave little woman paused here to lift the corner of her apron to the dim old eyes.

All this time Marie lay back upon her pillow, tearless and still. She was not a strikingly pretty woman, but there was a supplicating sadness in her large dark eyes, softly veiled by black lashes, and there was a wealth of sweetness and tenderness about the full, slightly compressed lips, that lent to her whole face a strange, fascinating interest.

Had this sweet, silent woman, I wondered, drifted unknowingly into matrimony? Was it "juxtaposition in fine?" or was it that deep, sensitive gratitude that grows so near akin to love in a woman's heart?

Jacques had not ridiculed the idiot boy, and she, so loving to her brother, and too young to sound the depths of such a sacrifice, had given herself to Jacques for recompense. And now trouble had come, and she had been near to death, and, as the woman said, all the little savings had gone. The case was bad, but Marie was not so downcast as I had expected. Perhaps she had at this moment forgotten much that she had suffered; perhaps, also, she was experiencing a great and undefined relief. What if there should dawn a new life for her, with health and her child!—a life without dreads, or suppressed wearinesses, or smothered incompatibilities. "If only I could live!" said the speaking eyes. So, at least, I read her story. Otherwise it might almost seem strange that she should wish for life, with nothing to look forward to but widowed loneliness. She and I had hardly uttered a word together, but, as she held my hand in hers, I felt arising between us a sudden sympathy that springs up between two people recognizing a spontaneous trust that needs no outward expression.

The door was now opened softly to admit a German soldier, one of those coquins de Prussiens, carrying an armful of small cut logs of wood. I had noticed him, as I came in, chopping them up in front of the door. He gave me a military salute as he passed on tiptoe to the little stove, where he began to replenish the dying flame, moving about silently and softly. There stood a little saucepan of milk on the hearth, which the women were neglecting; he moved it to a little distance from the fire, and, stirring it, saved it from being burned. He then opened a cupboard, and drew out a little packet of corn flour which I had sent to Marie the previous day. "Ah! I had forgotten," cried la belle mère, quickly drying her eyes, "she ought to have had that an hour ago. Go and get some water from the well, Heinrich, while I mix some in a cup." Heinrich reached her a cup and spoon from a shelf, and passed out as quietly as he had come in. He was a powerfully built man, with a great head, set rather clumsily on square, upright shoulders; there was a gentle dignity in his manner, and a good resolute expression in his deep gray eyes. One felt he was the reposeful element in that little household. The women had taken the part of requisitioning the enemy, and making full use of his kindly helpfulness, while he, the strong one, was being bullied, because of his strength, by the weak ones.

"Do you not think there is danger," whispered la belle mère, as she accompanied me to the door, "having that great Prussian in the house, with Marie so young?"

"What do you mean?" I asked, astonished.

"I don't say that he is not all that is convenable, and Marie is entirely engrossed with her baby; mais après? How long is it to last? I ask myself. When are these Germans to be sent away? Marie is a good woman, and he a good man, notwithstanding that he is our enemy. He has, too, such a way of doing things for me before I ask him, seeming to divine all we want. My Jacques was always willing, but not forethoughtful as this one is. I have nothing to complain of in Marie's conduct: she scolds him, and he never answers her back; and she sends him about, and he always goes. Mais après? In my day it was an impossible thing for a young man and woman to live together without falling in love, but the young are more reasonable now—at least, Marie, I know, is reasonable; she and Jacques were very different from me and my man. Who ever would have thought that I should grow to be an old woman, living on all alone?"

"I don't think you need anticipate any thing," I said; "Marie's baby is her great interest."

"If only he were like the rest of them, cruel and exacting, I should feel easier, and could complain," she muttered to herself, as she reentered the cottage.

On the following day I journeyed to a neighboring town, to pay a visit to an ambulance in which I had nursed during the troubled times that followed the capitulation of Sedan, and I almost forgot Marie's little household in the interest of renewing old acquaintances. As I arrived at the door of the well-known sombre-looking house, a young man hobbled up to me, and, seizing my hand, shook it heartily.

"Don't you know me?" he asked. "I am the one out of the five amputated that survived in that crowded little room. Look here; what a splendid support I have got!" He went on displaying a clean wooden stump strapped on to his shattered limb. "And this, too," pointing to a decoration on his breast. "Yes, I can hold up my head proudly among all these Prussian dogs, for I fought wildly for France; but to what use is it? What has come of it? We are betrayed, first by our Emperor, then by our generals; and even our women cringe and snigger to these loafing barbarians. Few Frenchmen can, like me, hold up their heads, and feel satisfied they have done their utmost for their country." And off stumped my quondam patient, followed by a little troop of gamin admirers.

"The wind is tempered to the shorn lamb," thought I, as I watched the poor maimed lad limping about so gayly.

I found things in a progressive state inside the walls. The French came up to me, voluble and hearty, recognizing in me a friend whose pocket might possibly be filled with tobacco and cigars, if not the bearer of important news from the outer world. The Germans were silently dignified, and gloomily hopeless about their own recovery. "Could I write a brief poem to a distant lady-love?" "No." "Well, would I ask the doctor to prevail upon the cook to make some stronger soup?" "Yes, I would do that." "Had I by chance a cold sausage in my pocket?" "No; could I do any thing else?" I inquired. "Yes, madame might make some."

Some weeks after my return home from my visit, I went again to see Marie. I had heard she had been getting on well, and I found her up, and much better, with a new and brighter expression on her face. Her mother had just been discussing the advisability of retiring to bed; she had tired of her coffee-roasting and knitting, and the afternoon was gloomy and cold. I helped the tottering old woman into an inner room, where, in a sort of berth hollowed into the wall, she lay down and soon fell asleep. While I was with her the German, Heinrich, came in, and went straight up to Marie. "Why don't you tell her? You can trust her, and she might help us." I knew he meant me. "Speak, Marie," he went on, bending over her his great head, with the strong, short-cropped hair. He was all-powerful; Marie would have done any thing for him, and he knew it, and she knew that he knew it; and yet he was pleading and tender, and gentler than she was. Her eyes had fallen under his gaze, and her lips pressed themselves together; she had struck pettishly the great big hand that inclosed hers. It is only the strong and the great who are gentle; it is the weak who strike out cruelly and recklessly to save themselves from falling. I came out from the inner room, and sat down in the old mother's chair on the other side of the fire. Heinrich came and stood before me, erect and resolute. "Madame," he began, "I love this Frenchwoman, Marie of Villefranche, and I wish to marry her; but if we made our intentions known in the village, either she or I would be torn in pieces by the people, for at this hour there is no love lost between the despoiled and the despoilers. In loving Marie I do not forget my country, nor does she renounce hers. I only find that love, when it comes, triumphs over all other feelings and considerations. Could you not speak to the curé for us, and get him to marry us privately?" "But," I interrupted, "surely it is too short a time since the death of Marie's husband." "I have been in the house for months, and have to-day received marching orders," he put in. "And he has been every thing to me, and done every thing for me, and I can not bear it any longer," added Marie, in her low, passionate voice. Then the big man knelt down, and kissed and stroked the pale hands that held with effort her baby's weight.

On my way home that evening I called at the curé's house. I gave my name, and he came shuffling along the little garden walk, with sabots pulled over his shoes, so as to open the gate to me himself. We bowed and scraped to one another, and remarked on the depth of the snow as we made our way to his sanctum. In the centre of the room stood a writing-table covered with greasy-looking volumes, thin letter-paper, ink, and sand; there was an open fire-place filled with ashes, and two logs placed ready for lighting. The curé immediately stooped down and lit a match (though I protested), and the room was soon lighted with the sparkling flames. On the mantel-shelf stood small dusty images of the Madonna and the Crucifixion, balanced by a pipe and tobacco-pouch; a cupboard happened to be half open, and on its shelves were ranged flasks of various sauces and spices, and mouldy old bottles of sealed wines. He motioned me to a chair, and drew a little mat in front of it for my feet; and with his snuff-box in his hand, and his head meekly bowed down, he listened to my tale. It was a difficult story to tell, and I stuttered and stammered over it; but the priest was all attention. "That is all very right," he said, in a reassuring way; "there are much more complicated cases than that in the village. And so you think they should marry," he went on, lifting his sleepy eyes to mine.

"Yes, indeed I do; and any little expense Marie may incur I shall most gladly—"

"Of course; I understand," he interrupted, waving his hand in a deprecating way. "Poor Jacques! he could neither read nor write, but, as he said, that did not prevent him from serving his country. Well, we will try and arrange matters in a quiet way some time soon, and in the mean while Marie and this German must keep quiet and bide their time."

And then I rose, and he, bowing low, put on his sabots again, and accompanied me to the garden gate.

On the following day I called again at Marie's cottage. She expected me, and had put the little coffee-pot on the stove, and had sent Heinrich out to get some new bread for me, talking of every thing but the one subject nearest to her heart. She was looking charming, and was making a great effort to be energetic. I was being warmed by her hot coffee, and we were waiting for Heinrich and the bread, when the outer door opened, and a great gust of cold wind swept through the narrow passage. Marie was holding a saucepan over the fire; the pan shook and trembled, and I feared for the fate of the milk, as Marie turned her eyes, so full of lustrous light, to the door. I was feeling a little shut out, and aggrieved about the probable loss of the milk destined for my cup, as I noticed Marie's distraction, when—thud-thud came along the passage, and thud-thud echoed through the room. As I looked at her I saw that suddenly the love-lit eyes waned and paled, and from her clinched white lips came an agonized shriek. She staggered forward, and fell into her husband's arms.

"Marie, mignonne, c'est moi, regardes ton Jacques," and he tried to lift up the blanched face to his. "Ah! it was you who saved me," he went on, turning and recognizing me. "How much I owe to you! Figure to yourself, my Marie; a party of five were brought from the field; all had to undergo amputation, and I alone survived the surgeon's knife. I thought it was all up with me when I fell pierced by two balls, and with those riderless horses careering over me, and knew nothing more until I woke to find myself in an ambulance without my leg; and now I walk with my head as high as any of those scélérats de Prussiens."

I looked round, bewildered, and saw Heinrich in the door-way; he stood like one petrified, holding the loaf of bread listlessly in his hand; his face and form seemed to shrink, and all strength appeared to have left him; he gave one despairing look at the bent head crowned with its glistening braids of black hair, and silently quitted the room.

I laid Marie upon her bed, and watched beside it for many miserable hours, while she passed out of one fainting fit into another. It was a totally different home-coming to what poor Jacques had anticipated; he had meant it to be a triumphal entry—an unexpected, unalloyed pleasure; instead of which it had only been a scene of consternation and distress. He found, however, a hearty welcome from all his neighbors, who, when Marie got better, came flocking in to express their congratulations.

I returned home that evening with a very heavy heart: on the road I met Heinrich. "I am going to try and get other quarters inside the town," he said to me as I came up to him. We walked together side by side, sadly and silently. A party of Prussian officers came riding joyously along the road; they were returning from scouring the country, on the pretense of an alarm from francs-tireurs. All were noisy, ruddy, and full of life: they looked curiously at my companion as he returned their military salute. Why should a conquering German look so downcast? they seemed to say. A little further on came rattling at full speed the feld-post, bristling with soldiers and bayonets, each cart driven by a sullen, scared-looking French peasant. As we passed them the men called out friendly greetings to Heinrich, but he did not raise his bent head, as with long, absent strides he waded through the snow. As we passed through the gates leading into the town, with all the bustle and confusion round us, he began abruptly to talk aloud his inmost thoughts.

"And how my mother will grieve for me!" he said. "I have written to her from time to time, telling her about my love for Marie, and she has so well understood: she has all a man's chivalry for women. At first she wrote, 'Do not give your heart to a Frenchwoman, my son,' but in her last letter she said, 'When the war is over, and if your life is spared, bring Marie, with her babe and the two old women, to our valley of the Wisperthal; the house is roomy, and with us there will be peace and plenty, and we shall together forget all that has been.' And now," he went on, flinging up his arms, "it is all like some wild dream that is past. You are tired,' he said, looking down at me with his kindly, penetrating eyes, "but you will sleep to-night and get rest, while I—I— My life now will be one long, restless night, when waking I find her not."

"You are a soldier; you can fight," I said, feeling more pity for Marie.

"Yes, I can do that," he said, laughing hoarsely.

Some days afterward I was in the door-way of a house opposite to that of Jacques, when my attention was attracted to a little crowd collected round his open door.

Two Uhlans had come riding down the street, and stopped to join Heinrich, who was mounting his horse and bidding farewell to his hosts. Jacques held out his hand and gave Heinrich a kindly shake, for the wounded Frenchman could afford to be polite to his enemy; the old mother had come tottering into the light, and while shading her eyes with her hand, was giving a long, earnest look at the departing guest. The bustling little mother-in-law was calling out her last farewell to Heinrich, who, though he was one of the detested invaders, had proved himself a helpful and kindly inmate. Marie was standing with her baby in her arms at an upper window; she was full in the light, not partly hidden, as a girl might be, looking her last on the man she loves. She was gazing down, with her Madonna face full of a high purpose and a calm serenity: the war within her had been sharp and fierce, but the struggle was over, and she had accepted her fate as God had willed it. She had come forward into the window to bring peace and encouragement to Heinrich.

There was a divine tranquillity about her whole bearing that struck him as he glanced up, with a sad, disturbed face, into the calm above him; he looked again, long and earnestly, and the shadow of a great grief seemed to pass away, and the drawn, hollow lines about his face softened into repose. She, out of the depths of her despair, had taught him that hard life-lesson, "que la liberté est l'obéissance volontaire." We are not sent into the world to rest in the haven of a great love, to seek and win our individual happiness; love comes, as spring comes, to renew all life, to cover the hard, cold earth with softness and sweetness, to bring the tender buds to blossoming perfection, to fill the clear air with fragrance and light. What if the spring passes?

—is there not the long summer of twilight and peace? Marie had loved, and her love had made her stronger and better; she had suffered, and the suffering had raised and purified her whole nature; she was going to "live the life," not as she had planned it for herself, but as fate had decreed it. The beauty of renunciation shone out of her clear eyes, and in the majesty of her figure there breathed the restful calm that follows upon the tumult of a storm subdued.

"They are not men; they are machines!" exclaimed a young girl, scornfully, as she moved away from the little group at the door. She had threaded a red ribbon through her ebon hair, and had lifted up her bright eyes laughingly to look into Heinrich's face. He was adjusting his long, glittering lance in the stirrup at the time, and had either not noticed her glance or had gazed at her vacantly with his dim, grieful eyes.

I stood and looked after the three figures, sitting square and upright on their powerful horses. As they passed out from the village street on to the straight highway, bordered with stately trees, whose frozen branches, entwining with one another, formed a trellised arch in long perspective, one heard the clank of the horses' hoofs far up the road. The scene, as I saw it, with the shadows of evening softening all harsh outlines, seemed like some dream-picture, bathed in the rose and amber light of a waning sun. There was no joyous rippling sound of running water; all the fountains were frozen dumb; thin clouds of vapory mist wreathed slowly up into the air from above the rough-hewn crosses that bordered the road-side, marking the resting-place of those killed fighting for their father-land. Heinrich turned to give one last look, and then the three horsemen passed out of sight.

Jacques crossed the street, and caught sight of Marie at the window. She smiled, and held up the laughing baby. Jacques's face became radiant, as he stood leaning on his crutches, watching the mother and child, and then limped quickly back again into the house. Then Marie leaned out for a moment, her whole face involuntarily changing as she looked for the last time into the misty distance, beginning, perhaps, to realize with something like despair the level dullness of her future daily life. It was a passionate farewell look—a helpless, wistful gaze: she was young and eager, with throbbing pulses and an aching heart, that revolted against the woman's relentless will. The child looked up into the altered face, its gleeful crowing changed to a little weak, scared cry. Marie started back, and, bending her head low over her baby, hushed its wailing sobs. And in the fading light I saw the indistinct outlines of Jacques's good-humored, meaningless face: he put his hand lightly on Marie's shoulder, and drew her into the room: he shut the window, and began to trim the evening lamp with his deft hands. And from behind the lamp I saw Marie's grand figure passing to and fro, as she hushed her child to sleep: there was silence in the room, and in the blessed stillness I knew that she would gain strength and calm — that peaceful calm that steals its way into a woman's soul when she holds in her firm arms the sacred burden of a sleeping child.

When the snow had melted, and the tender blades of grass had sprung out from the brown mould in the fields and hedges, and small buds had dotted the slender shoots of the trees, I went to bid farewell to the villagers of Villefranche. It may be in the coming years I shall see them again, in times of peace and plenty, when war is no longer devastating the rich gardens of the Ardennes, and fever and famine are passed away as a tale that is told. But never can I forget France as she appeared to me then, "beautiful amid her woes," her proud spirit unbroken, her faith in her old prestige unshaken, her children silently suffering in her cause: how bright, how patient, how proudly uncomplaining they were! how soft, how winning, how warm-hearted! what quick sensibilities, what flashes of keen humor, what dignity and grace! Are the French indeed so callous and frivolous?—these earnest, devoted husbands, these tender, helpful wives, supporting with their united, unwearied efforts large families of bright-eyed children? What a rich study were the faces of the old men and women! Life had not slipped idly past them; their old age was stored with rich memories. We wept for their sufferings, but no tears came from their eyes; they suffered in silence, waiting and hoping it was but a black cloud passing over the blue breadth of their sky: it would break and disperse, and France would appear from behind it brighter, greater, more glorious than before. So thought the simple peasants as they faced starvation in their ruined homes.

I found Marie's old mother sitting spinning outside the door, in the checkered sunlight. "And so you too are going, and Heinrich is gone; nothing is left—c'est la guerre, c'est la guerre."

Within, Jacques was seated at a table, having a writing lesson; Marie stood at his elbow, guiding his pen.

"It is never too late to mend," said Jacques, as he rose to give me his chair. "I ought to know how to write. I ought to have written to Marie when I was away. She has told me all. I do not blame her; the fault was mine."

I put into his hand a letter that I had just received from an unknown correspondent, announcing the death of Heinrich, who had been shot at Orleans. When he was dying he asked his doctor to write me a few lines: "He wishes you to know that he is at rest, Marie, and that his last prayer was for happiness for you and Jacques."

Marie wept as she read the letter. Jacques drew her close to him, and sheltered the tear-stained face. "Marie," he said, gently, "I suffer such pain, such constant, gnawing pain, that I sometimes wish I, too, had been killed outright."

Marie quickly raised her head; the hot tears ceased to flow.

"No, dear Jacques; no, it is much better as it is."

She supported him to a couch, and, sitting down beside him, held his thin suffering hand in hers.

"When you touch me, Marie, the pain seems to pass away from me!"

"I am so glad!" she whispered, bending over him her wistful, smiling face.

I went out softly, I bade them no farewell; but as I left, I, too, like Heinrich, prayed that Marie and Jacques might be happy, with such happiness as God gives to those who do not question nor struggle against destiny, but work and wait, earning that long rest which is the end of life.

THE questioner is evidently awaiting with some anxiety the verdict of the capricious beauty on the pretty bracelet with which he hopes to win her favor. And the wistful, tender look in his eyes speaks of many questions deeper than this simple one, which he would fain ask did he meet with due encouragement. The costly trinket has been brought perhaps for an anniversary gift, or perhaps, again, for a peace-offering; but it is evident that its acceptance involves other issues than that of wearing it. The young girl, with her eyes so studiously averted from her lover's gaze, which they must meet on the way to the jewel cases, is somewhat at a loss what answer to give: whether to gladden the heart of the youth by approving his gift, or to decline it, with the contents of the unopened caskets, with thanks. But, as we like to see people happy, let us hope that she will raise her eyes with a look of pleased approbation, and that the golden circlet may symbolize a joyful future for the handsome pair.

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

FOR the last fifteen years we have been living in Paris only for the present, without care for the future; now we are living only for the future, without care for the present; and as signs of the times always harmonize, in whatever sphere they may appear, and always assume an identical tendency corresponding with the general physiognomy of the epoch, we find the same characteristic trait in the domain of fashion—indifference to the present, and large preparation for the future. For three months past in France, and for some weeks longer, women have worn and will wear what they have, without making any change in the articles composing their dress; nevertheless, the work of renovation is going on, and the result will be that next winter will be essentially transitional, and we shall see the fusion in the fashions of the past with those of the future.

For instance, the winter wrappings will be composite in form. The paletot will fraternize with the talma, preserving a just medium between the very tight and the very loose garment. Velvet wrappings will be trimmed with lace ruches and edgings, and fringe will be used chiefly for cashmere. Many wrappings will be made of black or very dark blue cloth. Some will affect the military shape and ornaments, of course with moderation, and in the good taste which characterizes the creators of fashion in Paris; for this profession exists, as I shall presently explain. Cloth wrappings will be interlined with soft wool, and lined with light flannel of bright colors, which will form a very narrow binding all round the edge of the garment. I will describe one of these wrappings, which I have seen in preparation, as the detailed description will enable my readers better to understand the general features of the fashion which will prevail next season. Paletot of grayish-blue cloth, as dark as possible without being black, neither long nor short, tight-fitting nor loose, and slashed all around so as to form long basques. Lining of light grayish-blue flannel. The edge of the paletot was trimmed on the outside with a thick braiding of grayish-blue delaine of a medium shade between that of the paletot and that of the lining. Of course this braiding, otherwise called a flat galloon, trims the edge of the slashes. Along the upper edge of the braiding runs a very narrow piping of flannel of the same shade as the lining. It is proposed to reproduce the same combination in black cloth with red lining, black braid and red piping; but this color, so beautiful when used in moderation, has unfortunately fallen into disgrace since its identification with the Commune. Similar paletots will be made of brown cloth with a lining of écru flannel. and a braiding of brown delaine of a medium shade, surmounted by an écru piping.

Large casaques are also in preparation, either of cloth or velvet, adjusted in the back and loose in front; but the large bow in the back is no longer used. This has given way to small pleated basques, which seem to divide the casaque into two distinct parts, one of which is a skirt, and the other a paletot loose in front and tight-fitting behind. Many water-proofs will be made of Scotch plaid in dark colors, instead of the dismal and ugly water-proof cloth which has been so long in vogue. These will be made with a cape, and of a less ungraceful form than those of the past years. Large cashmere cloaks with capes are also talked of, but their advent is as yet uncertain.

As I said just now, there exists in Paris a certain class, very limited in number, of creators of fashion. Their names are unknown; their functions must remain hidden at the price of their success. It is their business to invent, to create; to have talent and genius in behalf of a few great dress-makers and a number of renowned dry-goods stores; for invention, even in the domain of fashion, does not fall to the lot of every one. These inventors work in summer for autumn, in autumn for winter, and so on. When their imagination has suggested to them five or six garments and as many styles of trimming, they sell the models thereof to the large furnishing houses. The idea of a new garment readily brings five hundred dollars. Once sold to a house, it can not be furnished by the inventor to any other party. Still more, should he be guilty of the indiscretion of showing his models in preparation to any one, he would lose his customers, and could no longer find a sale for his wares in the Paris market. Chance has made me acquainted with two of these creators of fashion. I shall never betray their secrets in France. I may, however, be permitted to avail myself of them elsewhere.

At this moment two pretty models are in preparation for the autumn season. One of these is a black silk fichu, entirely pleated and covering the bust. To this fichu are attached three extremely wide flounces of black lace, set one above another in such a manner as almost completely to cover the skirt of the dress. The other model is a casaque made of a point of black lace and nine yards of the same lace, uncut, like the point. Over the casaque is tied in the back a sash of black gros grain eight inches wide, and fringed at the ends. For the daytime and in full dress this casaque is worn over a silk or foulard dress with high neck and long sleeves, and for evening with low-necked and short-sleeved light silk dress.

The mixture of different stuffs of the same color, but of different fabric, producing contrasts of light and shade by the variety of reflection, constitutes a mine of happy effects, which will be worked next winter. For instance, dresses of faye, or demi-lustre silk, will be trimmed with velvet or satin of the same color, and velvet dresses with faye of a similar shade. One of the prettiest combinations of this sort is the following. Skirt of black faye, with a deep pleated flounce, surmounted by a black velvet band and a pleated heading; the band is edged on each side with a satin piping. Over-skirt of the same faye, with large pleats in the back. The fronts of the over-skirt are turned back and caught together behind under the pleats. The parts turned back, forming a kind of revers, are faced all the way through with black velvet edged with satin piping. The joining of the revers is covered by a large bow of black velvet cut from the piece and bound with satin. The waist, of faye, is trimmed with pleated ruffles. The basques, rather long and pleated, are lined with black velvet. The under edge of the basque at the back is caught up in the middle, and fastened to the bottom of the waist in such a manner as to form a sort of fan made by the black velvet lining of the basque. The sleeves have black velvet cuffs, bound with satin and edged with pleated ruffles of faye. The high waist has a large black velvet sailor collar finished like the cuffs.

Another much simpler but very pretty dress, designed for the demi-season, is composed of a slate gray silk skirt, trimmed with perpendicular bands of brown velvet ribbon, forming a kind of broad stripe. Over-skirt of brown cashmere, bordered with a pleated cashmere ruffle an inch and three-quarters wide, above which is set a band of slate gray velvet. Casaque-waist, with long pleated basques trimmed like the over-skirt. Sleeves furnished with cuffs of slate gray velvet, and trimmed with a pleated ruche of brown silk ribbon.

For the last assemblies of summer and the first of autumn many dresses are worn of plain light silk, trimmed with embroidered white muslin flounces. The effect is very pretty, but I prefer gauze muslin flounces, without embroidery or lace, and simply hemmed. A dress of this kind was sent yesterday to Mademoiselle De G——. The French watering-places are brilliant this year, for the reason that any native of France, whether man or woman, would think it a disgrace to go to any summer resort in Germany. No French artist would consent to be heard in Baden; our talent all remains in France. The toilette of Mademoiselle De G—— was composed of a skirt of very light silver gray silk, made with a train (the dress was designed for a large dinner-party), and trimmed with two wide flounces of very thin white gauze muslin, gathered and simply hemmed. Small pouf of silk like the dress, very bouffant on the hips, and trimmed with a gauze muslin flounce. Marie Antoinette waist, with a point in front and small pleated basques in the back, and very long waisted. The waist, with sleeves reaching only to the elbow, and trimmed with two gauze muslin ruffles, opened in front, square and very low, was high in the back. Inside the waist was a peasant fichu of gauze muslin, closely pleated, and quite high, like those seen in the portraits of Marie Antoinette. On the neck was worn a slender gold chain, bearing an anchor of dark blue enamel. The anchor now generally takes the place of the medallion, and symbolizes at once the gratitude of France for her brave navy and her firm hope in a brighter future. I can not describe the sober elegance of this airy and simple toilette. Another much richer dress was of Bengal rose silk, glacé with white, without trimming. The over-skirt and half-high waist, with half sleeves, were of white crêpe de Chine, trimmed with beautiful point d'Alençon, the richest of all laces. But, in spite of its costliness, this toilette was eclipsed by the one we have just described.

At this moment many white muslin dresses are seen with two skirts, bordered each with a chicorée ruche of brown, dark green, dark blue, or even black silk. The chicorée ruche is made of a strip pinked on each side and gathered in the middle. The wrapping at the same time forms the tunic, and is also of white muslin, long and loose, and looking like a long dressing sacque or wrapper. It is confined at the waist by a belt of the same color as the ruches, and is trimmed like those of the two skirts.

Bonnets are evidently about to experience a transformation. At this moment they are seen made of Pamela straw, neither very open nor very close, but with much larger brims than those of last year, and with ruches of illusion, as in olden times. There is little doubt that the winter bonnets will be, if not really large, yet large enough to protect the head from the weather. A few round hats of black lace are seen trimmed with a long Spanish net, like that of Figaro in the "Barber of Seville," made of black tulle and lace, and fastened to the left shoulder.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

USEFUL RECIPES.

FRITTERS.—Put over the fire a pint of new milk; into a pint of flour mix as much new milk as will make a stiff, smooth paste; when the milk in the stew-pan boils, stir in this paste very slowly, and stirring all the time to prevent its being lumpy; remove it from the hottest part of the fire to prevent scorching; when this is well mixed in, let it bubble once; take it off, and add the grated yellow rind of two lemons, and a little salt, and beat well for three or four minutes. Set it aside to cool; add a little of the lemon juice and the yolks of three or four eggs; beat all until light; then the beaten whites, stirred in lightly. Into the dripping-pan put three spoonfuls of fresh lard; when it gets hot drop in a spoonful of batter in a place. Let the fritters cook quickly, and when one side is brown, turn and brown the other; then put them in a colander and let them drain, but keep them in a hot place, that they may not cool. Sugar and cinnamon, with a little nutmeg, are very nice for sifting over them.

ALMOND PUDDING.—This makes a nice and very handsome dessert. Blanch three ounces of almonds, which can be procured shelled at any cake baker's or confectionery. When cold, rub them in a mortar until they are reduced to a paste, adding by degrees, to keep them from oiling, two table-spoonfuls of rose-water. Put over the fire one pint of new milk; with a quarter of a pound of pulverized sugar beat the yolks of six eggs until very light. As soon as the milk boils remove it from the fire, stir in the sugar and eggs, beating well all the time; last of all stir in the almonds, beating three or four minutes, and then set aside to cool. With the whip-churn (a fork will do, but the churn is easier and better) froth a quart of cream that has been well sweetened until it is stiff; remove the froth as it rises. In a glass dish arrange sponge cake, and spread raspberry jelly over the slices, both at bottom and sides. Over this pour the custard, and on top pile the whipped cream. It should not be made very long before it is wanted.

MUTTON STEW.—Cut the cold mutton into thin slices, taking care to remove the gristle, skin, or sinew that may adhere. The pieces taken off can be put by to make gravy or broth from. Put into a stew-pan the pieces wanted for a stew; pour over them a little gravy that has been boiled with a very little thyme and a few pepper-corns; add a few drops of essence of celery, or three or four celery heads can be boiled with the thyme in the gravy; let the meat warm slowly after adding the hot gravy. Just before sending the stew to table take out the meat, dredge a little flour into the liquor, let it simmer a few minutes, put back the meat, and allow it to heat up well.

CITRON PRESERVED, superior.—Select fine, perfect fruit; cut into slices about an inch wide and five inches long, having them as uniform in size as possible, as they make a much better appearance on the table. Put the slices of melon into a preserving kettle; cover them with water in which a small piece of alum has been dissolved, in about the proportion of eight pounds of the fruit to a piece of alum half the size of a hickory-nut; let the slices boil in this water until a straw will pass through them easily, but not until they fall in pieces and break up; drain them, and lay them in a broad vessel of cold water for twelve or fifteen hours, keeping them covered; then tie in a muslin bag (a thin one) one-quarter of a pound of strong race-ginger; boil it in three pints of clear rain-water until the water is highly flavored (more so than you think it should be); to every pound of fruit allow a pound of the very best loaf-sugar; take out the ginger and put in the sugar, letting it boil until it seems thick enough, and carefully removing all scum as it rises. Now add the juice of four large juicy lemons, and the citron, which has been well drained (if not the sirup will be too thin); slice very thinly, cutting all the way across, three fresh lemons, carefully remove the seeds, and put the slices in the kettle; let it simmer about half an hour; take it off the fire, and put the preserves in jars, not sealing up or covering until a day or two, that the watery particles may evaporate. When ready to seal, place a brandy paper on top.

A griddle for baking cakes should never be greased, as this destroys the delicate flavor of the cakes. Scour well with a cloth and sand, wash with hot suds, wipe dry, and just before baking rub with a coarse cloth and salt. It is not necessary to wash and scour it every time it is wanted: only once, to get all the grease out; but use the cloth and salt every time you put fresh cakes on, just as grease would be used.

FRIZZLED BEEF.—Shave off very thin slices of dried beef, not making the pieces too long; put into a stew-pan a tea-cupful of cold water, then the slices of beef; after it simmers a few minutes, add a small spoonful of butter; when this is melted take out the meat, putting it where it will keep hot; beat well the yolk of one egg, add slowly two table-spoonfuls of cream or milk, in which a tea-spoonful of flour has been stirred, and pour it into the boiling liquor, stirring to prevent curdling; salt and pepper to taste; when it has simmered a few minutes pour in half a tea-cupful of cream or new milk, and pour it over the meat.

TIN-WARE.—Every careful housekeeper is as particular with her "kitchen tins" as with her china; but the endless scouring with sand and soap that some think a part of the daily work only renders the tins dull and black, as the bright outer coat is soon taken off. It is much better to wash them in hot water, rubbing on soft soap thoroughly, rinsing them in boiling water, and wiping them dry; leave them a few minutes near the stove, where they will dry; not near enough, however, to melt them. All tin and iron utensils in kitchen use after washing and wiping should be allowed to dry near the fire, so that no moisture is left on them; there is then no rust to scour out, and your utensils are always ready for use.

INFANT'S WARDROBE.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS infant's wardrobe will be found very useful to those of our readers who are continually applying to us for cut patterns of this kind. It comprises the six most prominent articles in an infant's outfit, viz.: cloak with hood, gored robe, yoke slip, night slip, petticoat, and shirt. But one size is furnished, which can be easily adjusted so as to suit all infants until they are old enough to put on short clothes. The patterns given are those most commonly used at this time.

INFANT'S GORED ROBE.

INFANT'S YOKE SLIP.

INFANT'S SHIRT.

INFANT'S NIGHT SLIP.

INFANT'S CLOAK WITH HOOD.

INFANT'S PETTICOAT.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN OF INFANT'S WARDROBE.

THIS pattern consists of six articles, viz.: cloak with hood, gored robe, yoke slip, night slip, petticoat, and shirt.

INFANT'S CLOAK WITH HOOD.—This pattern is in three pieces—cloak, cape, and hood. The perforations in the neck show where the darts are to be taken up to fit the neck. Allowance is made in the pattern for the hem in front. The back of the cloak, cape, and hood should be laid on the fold of the cloth to avoid making a seam. Gather the edge of the hood on an elastic cord, draw up the top to fit the neck of the cloak, and finish with a binding. This garment is very pretty made of white cashmere, with the cape elaborately embroidered with white silk and edged with fringe.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 3½ yards.

INFANT'S GORED ROBE.—This pattern is in five pieces—gore for the front, back of waist, breadth for the side and back of skirt, sleeve, and belt. The waist and skirt are cut together in the front gore. The straight edge is laid on the fold of the cloth, as there is no seam in the front. Fold the cloth, lay the edge of the pattern that is not notched on the fold, and cut the length; open the material, and cut another piece of the exact size and length, and you will have the right width in the skirt—that is, two yards. Sew the two together, which will bring a seam in the middle of the back. Leave an opening of about six inches in the seam and hem it, gather the plain breadths at the top, and stitch on the belt. Gather the bottom of the waist, draw it up to correspond to the size of the belt, and stitch it on; then join it to the front gore according to the notches. Gather the top of the waist in the back and top of the sleeve, and finish it with a narrow binding. If the dress is made of cambric or French muslin, trim the front gore from top to bottom with puffs, separated by a band of lace, and graduated in width, the top ones being one-third the width of those at the bottom. Edge the front gore all around with narrow lace or a ruffle. Trim the bottom of the skirt with lace or a ruffle to match the front gore, surmounted with three rows of puffing separated with narrow lace. A double row of lace finishes the front puff. Trim the neck and bottom of the sleeve with lace. Make a belt of ribbon about four inches wide, laid in folds, and finish it on the right side with three ribbon sash ends, six or eight inches wide, and graduated in length—27, 21, and 14 inches long. Loop the sleeves with ribbon tied in bows. This makes a very handsome christening robe; it is suitable for all occasions, and may be made plainly or elaborately, according to the purpose for which it is required.

Quantity of material, 36 inches wide, 3½ yards.

Extra for puffing, 1½ yards.

Lace for trimming, 18 yards.

INFANT'S YOKE SLIP.—This pattern is in five pieces—front of yoke, back of yoke, sleeve, and front and back breadths of skirt. Gather the top of the body to fit the yoke, and sew them together with a very fine cord. Sew in the sleeve with the longest part to the notch in the armhole, holding the sleeve toward you in sewing. Finish the neck with a cord. Close the back to the waist with buttons and button-holes. Trim the bottom of the skirt, neck, and sleeves with lace or a narrow ruffle.

Quantity of material, 36 inches wide, 1½ yards.

Lace for trimming, 3¼ yards.

INFANT'S NIGHT SLIP.—This pattern is in three pieces—front, back, and sleeve. Lay the straight edge of the three pieces on the fold of the cloth, to avoid making a seam. Cut an opening of about ten inches in the back and hem it. Hem the neck and run in a narrow bobbin. Gather the top of the sleeve, and place the seam at the notch in front of the armhole. Trim the neck and sleeves with narrow cambric edging.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 2½ yards.

Edging, 1 yard.

INFANT'S PETTICOAT.—This pattern is in two pieces—band and breadth for the skirt. The top of the band is cut out for the armhole. Cut two pieces the size of the breadth, sew them together, lay the top in small pleats, and sew it to the band, which is closed with two buttons and button-holes.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 1½ yards.

Cotton cloth for band, one-quarter of a yard.

INFANT'S SHIRT.—This pattern is open at the back, and is cut without a seam under the arm. The front, back, and shoulders are cut with revers. Sew the shoulder seams together, and set the sleeves into the armholes according to the notches, letting the upper corners of the sleeves lap over toward the front, and bringing the perforations evenly together. Trim the sleeves and revers with edging.

Quantity of material, 36 inches wide, for half a dozen shirts, a yard and a half.

Edging for half a dozen shirts, 5 yards.

Écru Pongee Suit, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 557.

THIS suit is made of écru pongee, and consists of skirt, over-skirt, and heart-shaped basque-waist. The trimming is composed of gathered ruffles and ruches, rolls, rosettes, and bows of the material. The over-skirt is draped as shown by the illustration. Tucked Swiss muslin chemisette.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. Y.—If you are a careful reader of the Bazar, you must have seen many hints as to the harmony of colors, and their adaptability to different complexions. Indeed, we know of no book that will teach you as much about the art of dressing as a volume of the same Bazar.

V. F. C.—There are phonographic journals published, we believe, in the United States, but we can not give you their address.

SENEX.—The lady was bound in courtesy to reply to your letter asking permission to correspond with her. You certainly should not call unless you have reason to believe that she did not receive the letter.

J. A. J.—We have already published such an article as you call for. The books you mention may probably be found at the public libraries.

DONIZETTI.—Enceladus was one of the giants that warred against Jove. As he fled, worsted, from the contest Minerva flung the island of Sicily upon him. Being immortal, he could not die, and his struggles have caused ever since the eruptions of Mount Etna, according to the dictum of the classic poets.

CROQUET.—An umpire is not necessary in playing croquet, but it is requisite that you should decide in advance what rules shall govern the game, in order to prevent dispute. You should stand aside and watch your turn for playing, as by strict construction you can not call on any one to summon you. Balls with one, two, and three stripes of but two colors are better for this reason than several colors, which are easily forgotten. It is not necessary to play three games to decide which is victorious.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The Tunisian is the common Afghan stitch, well known to all crochet-workers. We have given full descriptions of stitches in our columns, and can not repeat them for individuals. To get the full benefit of the Bazar you should read it regularly.

CHRISTIE.—We have already given a sketch of Beatrice Cenci in answer to a previous correspondent. Read the paragraph above. "Sintram" was written by La Motte Fouqué, the author of "Undine."—You can wear the dress you describe.

S. A.—If your friend is very desirous of your company, he will not consider the fact that you were once too busy to ride with him a sufficient reason for never asking you again; and if he wishes to marry you, it is equally probable that he will signify this desire plainly enough to be understood.

V. D. P.—Young women that whistle, and young men with hats worn over one eye, or on the back of the head, would have very little chance of admission into refined society.

COLLEGIATE.—Alma Mater signifies nourishing mother, and is popularly used to designate the college at which one was educated. We believe that Cambridge, England, was the first university which received the name in this connection. As to your handwriting we can say nothing. Should we reply to all similar inquiries we must convert the Bazar into an oracle of chirography.

ALIDA.—We think your letter has been answered. Your sample is evidently good, pure silk, no matter of what brand. We can not estimate its value. Thirty yards is a small quantity for two suits. You will have to make plain skirts with a very simple polonaise. Eighteen or twenty yards are purchased for suits not thought elaborate.

C. S.—A plain deal table purchased of the carpenter, and simply draped with white muslin over cambric, is an easy plan for a toilette-table.

MRS. W.—The traveling suit pattern has been sent you. Your sample is Irish poplin, worth here about the price you paid for it. Make a polonaise and skirt with velvet bands for trimming.

R. Y.—Sleeves are not necessary in the water-proof cloak, but you can put them in beneath the cape if you choose.

E. N.—Arrange your hair in the Greek style described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 32, Vol. IV. Your sample is poplinette.

A. C.—The pleating on the over dress of child's princesse suit is narrow and in half-inch pleats. That on the dress skirt has simply a bias band stitched at the top.

MAY M. S.—A white muslin waist will look best beneath the polonaise. Pleated linen or nansook blouses are much worn now. Make your sample by princesse suit pattern, or by the polonaise suit for misses.

MRS. H. S. T.—The simplest turned-over collar of linen, doubled and slightly hollowed out about the back of the neck, is worn with boy's shirt-waist. The cuff is a square cuff like those of gentlemen's shirts, or else is doubled and turned back. Fasten the stocking elastics to the belt of the child's drawers by a button on each side.

ADMIRER.—Make your grenadine and buff lawn with box-pleated blouse, half-flowing sleeves, draped upper skirt, and a broad pleated flounce on the lower skirt. A single pleat on each seam of front and side gores holds the fullness of dress skirts; the straight back widths are in French gathers, made by a long stitch outside, and a short one between on the under side. The skirt is then overseamed to a belt.

CLAUDE.—Long braids are worn not only by girls of fourteen but by grown young ladies, so you do not need a more womanly way of wearing your hair. Your friend should read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 32, Vol. IV. Sailor collars are worn by girls of your age.

H. S. A.—We do not answer questions about MSS. in this column.

LAURA.—Buy a square striped shawl of soft wool repa. The princesse suit, with over dress buttoned behind, is exceedingly pretty for a girl of nine years.

MRS. M. E. M.—Your large plaid silk is out of fashion, and should be very plainly made, not to attract attention. Make a plain waist and skirt, and wear it under a polonaise of black silk or of white muslin.

FRIEND OF THE BAZAR.—Trim your Japanese silk with raveled silk ruches the color of the stripe in your sample. Rose-color will look well with it. Open front over-skirts are much worn.

JENNIE F.—We have no cut paper pattern of the Marguerite polonaise. It is a tight waist, extending in a plain short basque over the hips, and at the end of this basque the widths are widened to form a very full skirt.

ELIZA.—It is not convenient for us to publish "at full length the system for reducing flesh." The Bazar has already discussed this topic. Banting is not a Bostonian, but an Englishman. Any publisher will order his book for you.

L. A.—If you will give us your address and size the missing sacque will be sent you.

MISS D——N, DUNKIRK.—Should not think your case dyspepsia at all, but an accumulation of morbid secretions from living on too concentrated food. Eat coarse bread and farinaceous diet for a fortnight; sit in the sun as much as you can; take warm baths at night before going to bed, water at ninety-five degrees. You will not suffer from heat afterward, but feel the circulation equalized. Keep your head protected from the sun by a wet cloth inside your hat, besides the hat and parasol; then ride and walk in the sun as much as you can between eight and half past ten, mornings, and after three in the latter part of the day. Mild but thorough alteratives are recommended. Use no made gravies or rich food, especially pastry, for three months to come. Eat juicy meats, fruit, and carefully cooked vegetables. For the pain in the hip use warm baths, covering that side of the person. If a warm bath makes you faint, keep ice-water at hand to bathe the head plentifully and wet the heart. For catarrh hold your face in a basin of tepid water (seventy degrees), and snuff it up the nose. Try this ten minutes three times a day. Drink all you want, adding a little phosphoric acid to the water. This is harmless (not phosphorus), and tastes like lemonade if flavored a little, and checks too copious perspiration. Instead of stimulants at night, try hot foot-baths, with either cold or warm water to the head as you find agreeable.

MRS. L. J. B.—We can not tell you where to find the cases mentioned.

P. M. G.—Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 31, Vol. IV., for hints about a white alpaca dress.

BOSTON.—Bazar No. 13, Vol. II., contains the pattern and full directions for a Watteau wrapper. You can order it at this office. The embroidery should conceal the blue stamping of the design.—In marriages at home the bride usually enters the parlor with the groom. A single note sheet is all that is necessary for an invitation to a marriage at home.—Fifteen yards make a low-necked dress, with court train, simply trimmed.

MRS. I. B.—A white piqué dress is suitable for church for a lady of forty years. At this season comfort is more considered than any thing else in church costumes. Simple over dresses of white Victoria lawn, made polonaise style and trimmed with side pleatings, are suitable for ladies of any age.

PUELLA.—Pompadour front with chatelaine braids is the popular way of wearing the hair. Long ear-rings with many pendants, and hoops swinging in larger hoops, all made of Etruscan gold, are now fashionable.—Of course you should be polite enough to ask your friend into the house after he has escorted you home, unless the hour is too late.

CALIFORNICUS.—Your inquiry has been answered in New York Fashions.

YOUNG LADY.—Make your blue silk suit by cut paper pattern of Postilion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. Trim with ruffles of the same, from beneath which peep pleated frills of Swiss muslin.

ADELIA.—At a quiet wedding where the bride wears her brown traveling dress she and the groom should wear very light brown or else pearl-colored kid gloves.

JANE.—Make your brown poplin with a polonaise and single skirt, trimmed with fringe and bias bands of poplin piped with heavy repped silk or velvet of the same or a darker shade.

MARGUERITE.—Read reply above to "Jennie F."

P. H.—Square pillows remain in fashion. Make plain muslin slips to cover your pillows, and for sleeping on at night if you choose, and spread over these in the daytime a "sham" of square linen, ruffled and tucked around the edge, with your monogram, or else very large intials, embroidered in the centre in ornamental letters.

AEA PAY.—Your sample is Japanese silk, worth very little, as are all mixtures of cotton with silk. Make it very inexpensively, and wear beneath a polonaise of Victoria lawn.—"Hannah" is published as soon as the advance sheets are received from abroad.

MRS. R. H.—A back number of the Bazar will furnish you patterns of ladies' under-clothing, directions for making, and designs for trimming. Closed drawers are most used now by ladies, and are not inconvenient. You can order Bazar from this office.

ELMA.—For cashmere wraps consult Bazar No. 30, Vol. IV. For your buff linen use the pleated blouse and long over-skirt. A polonaise and single skirt for alpaca.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

New Subscribers will be supplied with the WEEKLY from September 2, in which Number this Story will begin, to the close of the year, four months, for ONE DOLLAR.

We make only one style, and have but one price for our Pianos, which are all made from thoroughly seasoned and kiln-dried materials, and have seven octaves—rosewood case—carved legs and lyre—large square grand overstrung scale—front round corners—serpentine bottom—iron plate—French action—and are all warranted five years. We have no agents, and allow no commissions or discounts to any one. This explains how we can sell a good Piano for $290, which is about the price Piano dealers pay to manufacturers for instruments similar to ours. Piano dealers are allowed by all manufacturers, except ourselves, to add 100 per cent., and upward, profit to all sales. This the public can prove by investigation to be strictly true. Piano dealers, teachers, professors, and everybody else, are excluded from any and every possibility of a single cent of commission on our Pianos. If you wish a Piano sent for trial, you must make the matter of reference and payment unquestionable; and if the instrument is in any respect inferior to any Piano made in the known world at any price, you may send it back to us at the end of ten days' trial, instead of paying for it. If you order a Piano sent, we have one request to make; and that is, that the trial shall be made by parties who are not interested in other Pianos. Please send for our Circulars containing full particulars and references to bankers, merchants, and families, in thirty-five States and Territories, who are using our Pianos. Address or apply to the

COMMON-SENSE COMPRESSED.

It is difficult to give in a dozen lines the reasons why should be preferred as a corrective and alterative to every other medicine in use. Firstly, it allays fever; secondly, it cleanses the bowels without violence or pain; thirdly, it tones the stomach; fourthly, it regulates the flow of bile; fifthly, it promotes healthy perspiration; sixthly, it relieves the system from unwholesome humors; seventhly, it tranquilizes the nerves; eighthly, it acts upon the blood as a depurent; and, lastly, it forms one of the most delicious, cooling draughts that ever passed down the throat of an invalid on a warm summer day.

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY. JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Harper's Bazar at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U.S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

FACETIÆ.

MAY a turkey be said to be a ghost when it's a gobblin'?

SOLACE FOR SUFFERERS.—It used to be considered that the extraction of a tooth was no joke, at any rate to the patient. Let those who take a too serious view of this operation consider that it may be undergone beneath the influence of nitrous oxide, or laughing-gas.

Which would a young lady rather be—a dryad or a naiad?—A dryad, for then she would be a woo'd nymph.

THIS IS A FACT.—Musical Jones's doctor last week forbade him to eat pastry. Musical Jones simply responded to his medical man by singing, dolorously, "Good-by, sweet tart, good-by."

Ladies of the ballet are sometimes unkind to their fathers and mothers, but they are generally very fond of their grand pas.

UNUSUAL OCCURRENCE.—That good-natured but exceedingly simple youth, Septimus Moddicombe, is suffering from the effects of rather a singular accident—an idea suddenly struck him.

A good many trades-people only give fifteen ounces to the pound—it is a weigh they have.

CLASSICAL TRUTH—Inn vino very trash.

A "LEADER"—A blind man's dog.

FASHIONABLE INTELLIGENCE.

SINCE IT HAS BECOME THE FASHION FOR GENTLEMEN TO DANCE WITH MARRIED LADIES ONLY, WALL-FLOWERS HAVE MUCH IMPROVED IN APPEARANCE, BUT STILL THEY ARE NOT HAPPY!

WALL-FLOWER No. 1. "I should like a Waltz so! But I suppose there's no Chance for poor Me till Mamma's been thoroughly Danced off her Legs!"
WALL-FLOWER No. 2. "I should be content with an Ice, if I could only get one! Fancy! Mamma's been taken down for Refreshment Three Times, and I not Once!"

A HANDY TUNE.—"Fortune." It is not common metre.

What grows bigger the more you contract it?—Debt.

What is the difference between one of George Eliot's novels and a picnic?—The one's a "Mill on the Floss," and the other's a fill on the moss.

"CASH ADVANCES"—Making up to a rich widow.

Some teetotalers would even prefer a watery grave to preservation in spirits.

LEVITY.—One point about some murderers is that they "take life" cheerfully.

THE MOST POPULAR OF ALL WATCH-WORDS—Tick.

A shilling dentist must be a man of low extraction.

THE CHURCH FOR AFFIANCED ONES—St. All Banns.

What is that which is full of holes, and yet holds water?—A sponge.

VERY SAD.—There have been more fashionable ladies dyed young this year than ever.

NUMERICALLY TRUE.—If a man doesn't take care of No. 1, he will soon have 0 to take care of.

Why is coffee like an axe with a dull edge?—Because it has to be ground before it is used.

There is something very amusing in the idea of what may be called the "fitness of things" in regard to snuff-taking, which occurred to an honest Highlander, a genuine lover of "sneeshin." At the door of the village hotel he observed, standing, a magnificent man, in full tartans, and noticed with much admiration the wide dimensions of his nostrils in a fine turned-up nose. He accosted him, and, as his most complimentary act, offered him his mull for a pinch. The stranger drew up, and rather haughtily said, "I never take snuff."

"Oh," said the other, "that's a peety, for there's grand accommodation!"

The following correspondence is said to have taken place between a merchant and one of his clients:

"Sir, your account has been standing for two years; I must have it settled immediately."

Answer—"Sir, things usually do settle by standing; I regret that my account is an exception. If it has been standing too long, suppose you let it run a little."

"My little angel," asked a fond husband, "are you comfortable in your corner?"

"Yes, thanks."

"You do not feel the cold?"

"Not at all."

"Your window closes easily?"

"Very nicely, dear."

"Then come and take my place."

THE MOST SUITABLE WINDOW FOR A SINGLE LADY WHEN ON THE LOOK-OUT—A bow.

One of the toasts drunk at a recent celebration was "Woman; she requires no eulogy—she speaks for herself!"

An old bachelor recently gave the following toast: "Woman—the morning-star of infancy, the day-star of manhood, and the evening-star of age. Bless our stars, and may they always be kept at telescopic distances!"

"Will you do me a favor?" said a fast young man to a city swell.

"With pleasure. What is it?"

"I wish you to lend me five hundred dollars, Sir."

"Call at my counting-house." On arrival, "What security can you give me?" he asked.

"My own personal security."

"Very well, get in here," lifting up the lid of a large iron chest.

"Get in there!" exclaimed the fast youth, with astonishment; "what for?"

"Why, this is the place where I always keep my securities."

MOSSOO'S ABROAD AGAIN.

SCOTCH WAITRESS. "There's a Laddie doon the Stair wa'antin' tae see ye—"
MOSSOO. "A Lady! Mon Dieu! Say her to Give herself the Pain to sit down while I arrange my Toilette."

An unreasonable and somewhat misanthropic acquaintance remarks he has often heard the proverb, "A friend in need is a friend indeed;" but he says he can't see where the laugh comes in. He has a friend in need who is always borrowing money of him.

THE BEST WOOD FOR MAKING CRADLES—Rock maple.

RIGHT TACKS TO KNOCK ON THE HEAD—Income tacks.

A DOCTOR'S EPITAPH—"He saw them all out."

A man writes to say he only backed one horse in his life, and that was into a shop window.

What man carries every thing before him?—The waiter.

He that is hasty fishes in an empty pond.

A SEAMSTRESS'S EXCLAMATION—A-hem!

A couple of barristers engaged in a case were recently discussing the issue. "At all events," said the younger and more enthusiastic, "we have justice on our side."

To which the older and warier counsel replied: "Quite true; but what we want is the chief justice on our side."

ASTRONOMICAL PHENOMENA.

FIRST CUSTOMER. "Why, bless me, my man, the moon seems to have got two arms to-night!"

ITINERANT ASTRONOMER. "I shouldn't wonder, ma'am, if she had; and I'm pretty sure, if these 'ere other ladies and gents would pay their pennies to peep at her, she'd wave 'em with delight."

A Western railroad advertises that each train carries a coroner and six jurymen for the convenience of the passengers.

When the Hon. Mrs. Norton was applied to, on Hood's death, for a contribution to the fund then raised for his destitute widow, and headed by Sir Robert Peel with the munificent donation of £50, she promptly sent a liberal subscription, with the following lines:

"To cheer the widow's heart in her distress,
To make provision for the fatherless,
Is but a Christian's duty, and none should Resist the heart-appeal of Widow Hood."

Poetry, punning, and piety, all of the genuine sort, are not often thus happily united.

An orator proposes to "grasp a ray of light from the great orb of day, spin it into threads of gold, and with them weave a shroud in which to wrap the whirlwind which dies upon the bosom of our Western prairies."

A householder, in filling up his census schedule, under the heading "Where born" described one of his children as "born in the parlor," and the other "up stairs."

In a small country town resides a clergyman who is the pastor of a small flock, who esteem him very highly, and whom he is fond of catechizing. A few days since, while taking a ramble through the village, he stopped at the house of one of his parishioners, and after the usual salutations had been exchanged, the conversation ran as follows:

"Well, Mrs. W——, can you tell me how Adam fell?"

The lady commenced to smile audibly, and finally replied, "Why, my dear doctor, you're not serious?"

"Very serious indeed," responded the doctor.

Mrs. W——, whose husband's name happens to be Adam, replied: "Well, well, you have it, doctor. You see, Adam went to climb over the fence the other night to go to Deacon M——'s for a bottle of whisky, when an oar lying on the ground took his foot. Over Adam fell, and barked his shin; and that's the whole truth of the matter."

THE "LADY" IN WAITING.

We once knew a clergyman who was so rigidly and frigidly literal and matter-of-fact that he was wholly incapable of entertaining or comprehending a metaphor of any kind whatever. He believed to his dying day that Shakspeare's mind was overstrained and confused by too intense application when he wrote that there be "sermons in stones,

Books in the running brooks,
And good in every thing;"

and contended that it was perfectly plain that what he meant to say was that there be

"sermons in books,
Stones in the running brooks,
And good in every thing."

If love is blind, why is it that when a young man falls in love he is almost universally required "to see papa?"

A HEAVY BLOW FOR HIM!

LOTTIE. "Now, Mr. Spoonington, isn't it delightful? I wish you would sing us that Beautiful Song of yours, 'Blow, Gentle Gales!'"
OLD LADY (slightly deaf, and only catching the last words). "Gales! Blow! Oh, don't talk about it—we don't want none o' that!"

BEFORE THE DOCTOR COMES.

BOILS, CARBUNCLES, AND FELONS.

IT is with the body as the mind, that its small troubles are more hard to bear than its great afflictions. To meet physical pain and mental sorrow, in the fullness of their severity requiring all our courage, we prepare to receive their shocks with a resistance of nerve which greatly lessens the violence of the impression. When small annoyances assail us, we do not consider the occasion worthy of an effort of courage, and are apt to yield to them unresistingly. There is, moreover, a readier submission to the greater ills of body and mind because they are more or less inevitable, and compel our resignation to them as to fate. The lesser we believe to be unnecessary and remediable, and we therefore fret till we get rid of them. The former call into action our strength; the latter merely excite our irritability. We are patient under the weight of an iron crow-bar in the one case; we wriggle uneasily at the tickling of a straw in the other.

In bodily affliction there is, moreover, often this distinction between the great and small, that the former, by the prostration it produces, weakens sensibility to pain; while the impression of the latter, barely affecting the general vigor, is received by the senses in all their natural strength of feeling. Some of the least serious of diseases are excessively painful, as many of the gravest are the easiest endured. A harmless corn of the toe will wring the sufferer with agony, while a stroke of apoplexy will kill without an apparent smart.

There can not be a better illustration of our remarks than the common boil, which is the most painful and the least dangerous of bodily afflictions. It is of such little consequence generally that, were it not for the sake of relieving the excessive pain it always produces, we might leave it without treatment. This, moreover, should be of the simplest kind, and consist of nothing more than frequent bathing and poulticing with bread or flax-seed. Surgeons are not so fond as they used to be of plunging their lancets into the boil, and it may be generally left, without danger, to the usual gentle domestic treatment. When boils succeed each other rapidly they are either the causes or effects of a weakened constitution, which in either case should be strengthened by good nourishment, change of air, or by whatever else may tend to improve the general health.

The carbuncle, though it may be regarded as a variety of the boil, is a much more serious affection. They are often found in the same parts of the body, and hardly differ in their first appearance. The carbuncle, however, has a constant tendency to extend and harden, while the boil has a fixed limit, which it soon reaches, with an early disposition to soften, or come to a head. The carbuncle has a greater preference than the boil for the spine and back of the neck, and other parts where there is a natural scantiness of flesh; and much of its danger comes from its presence in such more vital parts. The treatment of the carbuncle should be in every respect like that of the boil; at any rate, "before the doctor comes," when on his arrival he may score it with a deep crucial incision, or leave it untouched, according to whether he belongs to the "carbuncle cutters or non-cutters," into which each school of surgery is now divided. A nourishing diet, however, and frequent poulticing are the only remedies to be employed by unprofessional persons.

The whitlow, or felon, is another common human affliction, of great torment, but comparatively little danger. Its more common form is the superficial fester of the finger about the nail or the pulpy extremity. The matter having been let out, poultices should be applied so long as any inflammation remains, when a little spermaceti ointment, spread upon a bit of old linen, may be put on.

The deep felon is a more serious affair, and generally requires, for proper treatment, the skill of a doctor. Before he arrives nothing is to be done beyond dipping the finger frequently into hot water, and applying a succession of poultices. It is often necessary to make a free cut down to the bone to let out the deeply seated matter, and prevent it from destroying all the tissues, soft and solid, of the part.

REGIMEN OF TRAVEL.

PEOPLE who are more or less sick travel in search of health, and it is believed that they not infrequently succeed in their object. It is, however, not often found where they look for it. They can not catch it on the wing, as they suppose, in the foreign air, in the brisk mountain breeze of the Alps or the gentle zephyrs of Nice and Pau, draw it up from the wells of Ems and Vichy, or reach it by traversing oceans, and journeying to the most distant parts of the globe.

Climates, however various, and medicinal waters, be they what they may, have far less influence upon the health than is generally supposed. The efficacy of these is more or less adventitious. It is true that many an ailing person has seemed to breathe in with a foreign breeze and absorb from distant waters a vigor which native airs and springs were incapable of bestowing. The effect, however, is not easily traceable to any difference in the constituents of either. It is, in most cases, to be attributed to a change in the patient himself. He is a very different man abroad from what he is at home. His habits are necessarily changed. By the certain distractions of travel and its indispensable movements he is forced to a diversion of mind and an activity of body which his ordinary life of anxiety and sedentary labor forbids. This alone is motive enough to send those who can afford the expense from one end of the world to another; but they who are less fortunate in the possession of the means of travel may be consoled to know that by a due submission to the laws of health at home there is no necessity for undergoing the costly penalty of transportation abroad.

Travel, and we refer just now more especially to foreign travel, has its dangers as well as its benefits. Inexperienced travelers often commit mistakes which make them worse if they happen to be ill, and sick should they start on their journey in the full possession of health. One of the most common errors of such is, from want of knowledge, to disregard the diversity of character in the same seasons of different countries. They ought to be made aware of, and provide accordingly for the fact, that a midsummer in temperate Europe is by no means the same as one in the United States and Canada. Warm clothing, with its various textures of wool, shawls, cloaks, overcoats, jackets, muffs, collars of fur, and the several articles of clothing which are safely cast off in June, July, and August in the United States, are indispensable articles of wear in Great Britain, France, Germany, Switzerland, and Northern Italy on many days and most nights of those months. The natives generally of those countries seldom abandon entirely their woolen suits, even during the summer solstice. They content themselves with temporarily throwing off their warmer overcoats and mantles, and wearing dresses, though always of wool, of somewhat lighter texture. A full suit of linen or cotton is seldom safe, or even comfortable, during any usual season in Europe. In the Highlands of Scotland, as among the mountains of Switzerland, travelers are glad, even after the hottest days of those regions, to meet with the warm welcome at night of a glowing fire in their bedrooms.

The moisture, moreover, of the climate of temperate Europe is so much greater than is found in most parts of the United States that it can not be safely unheeded. About the first need a traveler is reminded of on arriving in England, and, in fact, in France and Germany, is an umbrella, if he does not happen to have one; and this remains during his whole tour in Europe an article of almost daily and indispensable use. Not that it rains always in those countries; but no one can calculate with any certainty upon its not doing so on any fixed day. To guard against the effects of cold and moisture there are no better means than warm clothing; and experience advises a liberal use of woolen by the traveler during every season in temperate Europe. Colds and rheumatisms and more fatal ailments are the frequent results of the flimsiness of apparel which our migratory countrymen and countrywomen persist in retaining as the symbol of an American summer, however they may suffer from the reality of a European one.

Although we do not commend the Englishman for insisting upon Worcestershire sauce with every chop he takes in the shade of the Pyramids of Egypt, or the American who grumbles if he has not buckwheat cakes for his breakfast at the Grand Hôtel, we think that it is by no means well to change entirely and suddenly previous national habits of living. The traveler should not adopt without discrimination foreign modes of diet and regimen. It is not a sufficient reason for bolting sauerkraut by the plateful, and washing it down by scores of tall glasses of beer, merely because it is the custom of the country. It may be, and we have reason to believe that it is, a very bad custom, which, however, long practice has perhaps rendered less harmless to the natives of Germany than it certainly would be to an American novice. So, again, the free indulgence in wine in France is not necessarily proved to be beneficial to health and morals because every man and woman of that country drink their daily bottle of it. This is a custom, in its excess at least, which we believe the American traveler had better eschew, together with all other practices of foreign nations which can be avoided without offense, and are evidently unfavorable to the temperance and prudence essential to a judicious regimen of travel.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Fairy-Land.

MY DEAR EUGENIA,—Sitting in a car and looking out at the swiftly changing landscape, modulating like a symphony into constantly more beautiful and surprising strains, how often to our dreaming, musing eyes it loses the familiar aspect and becomes the scenery of fairy-land! Those softly rounded distant hills, so far away that they seem but a delicate mist meandering along the horizon, are they the rosy walls of a realm aerial? What loveliness and repose lie beyond them! What a perfect summer, unvexed by fierce heats or sudden chills! Are they the heights upon which Moses stood, and saw that > "There everlasting spring abides,

> And never-fading flowers?"

And the nearer groves, the rich, peaceful meadows, the clear, still streams—are they not Claude's pictures? And where are the shepherds and nymphs, the pastoral society of that tranquil world, whose life is a dance under those drooping trees, and who pipe their innocent and happy loves loitering by the placid rills?

You do not need to have a fairy tale in your hand, nor to have read one last evening to the children, in order to see that you are traveling through fairy-land. The scene is inaccessible as that. There is a group of children sporting with a dog, there is a party playing croquet upon the lawn, there is a farmer plowing, there is a pasture with cattle—cliffs, woods, hills; but they are all pictures upon the air; they dissolve while you gaze, and you could as easily step into the palace of the Sleeping Princess as into yonder field. Every thing is familiar. They are all the most commonplace objects. But as you roll swiftly by they are enchanted. They are old friends in a new world. They are changelings for the better. As I see the plowman far away, but can not hear the creak of the yoke, nor the haw-gee of the driver, it is as strange and fairy-like, although most familiar, as the tracery upon Keats's Grecian urn. I say in my mind to the fairy plowman, as the poet says to the priest upon the urn,

> "To what green altar, O mysterious priest, > Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies?"

It is going to fairy-land cheaply: but why should I be more surprised that the visionary realm of poetic repose arises from these most commonplace forms than that the delicate and fragrant flowers in the garden should spring from the refuse and manure which are placed there? It is only part of the perpetual magic. Here comes my old friend. What has changed him? He went away a boor, and he returns a cavalier. It is the same man—but surely he is different. Or do you know what a charm a mustache is? It may change a man as if a fairy godmother had waved her wand over him. When I came to Munich, upon the grand tour, it was with Alonzo and Frederick. Of all mustaches that of Alonzo was the most striking. What a firm, manly front it gave him! But at Munich he shaved. And in shaving off his mustache he shaved away his manliness. He went into his chamber bearded and vigorous. He came out a weakling. It was a kind of miracle; but the key was the hair over his mouth which had concealed the fatal weakness of that feature. Nothing else was changed, but Alonzo was another man. He was suddenly a stranger; for that mouth affected our judgment of every thing he said. What had seemed humorous had become weak.

A little touch of the same universal, inexplicable magic had transformed into fairy-land the landscape that I saw from the train. And it was but natural that, seeing that pleasant region without the car, I should turn to see if I could discover its denizens within. And I thought that I did. I am sure that I saw Beauty, and I am, at least, tolerably certain that I saw Beast. Indeed, I meet him rather too often upon my little excursions. But you shall be the judge—I mean, of the Beast, for I consider myself fully capable of deciding upon the other. She, at least, I am sure of, as I said. She sat, simply and prettily clad, smiling and graceful, sometimes reading a book, sometimes talking with a friend; and it was from accurate observation of her and her companions in all times and countries that Perrault, Countess d'Aulnoy, Laboulaye, and the other fairy historians have drawn their Graciosas and the rest of the fairy princesses.

Beside her sat Beast. He was dressed like the rest of us men in the car, only more finely. His clothes were all cut in the fashion, and he was decorated with gold and precious stones. But his face was heavy and gross, and his manners were surly. If Beauty spoke to him, he made a kind of careless grunt and went on reading his paper. If she smilingly persisted, he answered with peevish impatience, and shook his shoulders petulantly. He gradually seemed to me a great, hulking, crabbed, coarse brute. Except for fear of paining her by more plainly exposing him, I should certainly have taken advantage of my age to call him to account. For have not all travelers a profound interest in the Princess Beauty who deigns to travel with them? and is not an insult to her to be suppressed and punished like treason and rebellion? What right, I asked myself, has this big and bejeweled fellow to treat that lovely lady in this insolent and brutal way? Why may we not all insist that at least he shall behave politely to her in our presence?

And why, I continued, in my inaudible catechism, why do you, little Beauty, care for this Beast? What can possibly fascinate you in this dull figure? I watched her as I asked, and I saw her unfailing patience with him and her gentle courtesy. I saw the smiles which shone from her heavenly eyes into his cloddish face, and I turned for consolation to look at the fairy-land out of the window. There was some spell in the prospect which opened my mind to the answer to my own question. The better Ba[illegible]helor in me whispered to the thoughtless o[illegible] "[illegible]s who had so impatiently questioned the pr[illegible]incess. For I remembered that it was not the [illegible]hairy brute, but the handsome young prince [illegible] who was enchanted into that form whom Bea[illegible]uty loved; and I reflected that it was n[illegible]ence [illegible]t the unmannerly and coarse figure beside her. Er, but the grace and manly gentleness hidden u[illegible]nder it, that this fairy princess loved. And s[illegible] I came to pity the poor enchanted prince w[illegible]o was obliged to appear in this gross form co[illegible]ered with fashionable clothes and jewelry. It was no longer wonderful to me that she was so tender and gracious, for I knew that she pitied him for the horrible spell under which he lay, and from which she knew nothing but her love could deliver him. How often have we not seen Titania caressing the ass's ears of her beloved Bottom? But is it not a hundredfold more pathetic than comical? For my part, I am always reproved when I smile at that spectacle, for I know that Titania sees in that grotesque form what is manly and noble, which we can not.

So I found that I not only saw fairy-land that morning, but that I was in it. And of this I was the more convinced when I presently stepped out at a station where there were five minutes allowed for refreshments. I was really hungry, and there was a great crowd, and a very small space, and very little time and food. I was unfortunate in getting any thing to eat, but there was a great deal to see. Had I been so presumptuous as to doubt whether fairy-land were only to be seen, like a fading vision, from the window? I was again undeceived, for here were the companions of Ulysses after Circe's wand had touched them. They were crowding and pushing and, I think, grunting. I saw their paws in the dishes. I saw their chaps running with butter and gravy—in a word, with grease. I heard a roar as of a hundred feeding like one. The struggle was terrific, and I looked about for the enchantress, upon whose face I could fancy the smile of superb scorn with which she would say, "My only enchantment is to reveal them as they are!"

Just then I spied in a corner of the saloon a young woman upon one of the sofas, very poorly dressed, and looking dejectedly at the hopeless feast. Drawing near to her, I said that there seemed to be little chance for us in so short a time; and she turned upon me a face so rosy and lovely, and answered in a voice so sweet and low, and acknowledged my presence with a manner so simple and superior, that I was amazed, I begged to be allowed to get her something to eat. But she smiled as she shook her head, and answered no, because the bell would ring in a moment, and then we should have to go. She added, demurely, "I always have to go when the bell rings."

"What do you mean, my dear young lady?" I asked.

"Only that I live in the kitchen."

I gazed, astonished. "In the kitchen!"

Just then the bell did ring, and the gobbling, Circean crowd bustled back to the train. My young rosy-faced companion rose too, and hurried out.

"Stop!" I exclaimed. "In the kitchen? What do you mean? What's your name?"

She was just disappearing, and we were all in great confusion. But I felt at once who it must be, and I called out, "Cinderella?"

I could not exactly hear what she answered, if she did answer; but I saw the movement of her head, and it seemed to me to nod affirmatively. If any body is disposed to prove to me that I have not talked with Cinderella, he will have his labor for his pains. And now I remember that her shoes made a good deal of noise as she arose and moved away. Of course they did, because they were probably glass, which is conclusive proof that it was Cinderella.

Is it strange, then, that we can see fairy-land from the car window if we are living in it all the time? And this will explain to you, dear Eugenia, what you asked me the other day when I met you in the Ramble at the Central Park, and you suddenly said, "Is there any such person as Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle?" I answer by asking, Pray, is there no such person as the Fair One with Golden Locks, or Fortunatus, or Guinevere, or Ali Baba, or the Yellow Dwarf, or Zobeide? Pray, my dear madame, is there no such person as Desdemona, or Una, or Geneviève, or Evangeline, or Marianna in the Moated Grange? Is there no such person as Semiramis, or Isabella, or Elizabeth, or Anne Boleyn, or Lady Russell, or Moll Pitcher, or Florence Nightingale, or Maria Mitchell? Really I am astonished at such skepticism. You never asked that question about any of the women I have named; and that you asked it of Mrs. Margery only shows how poor a painter I am. I know it, dear lady, but too well; and I am

Your humble friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

NEW PLAIDS.

AMONG fall importations the plaids show novelties both in combinations of color and in fabrics. The tartans all re-appear, each hue and bar being accurate copies of the design originally adopted by each clan; but many handsome fancy plaids are brought out in quiet colors, with a view to meeting the prevailing taste for sober tints. A ground of deepest brown, gray, violet, sailor blue, or black distinguishes the new plaids. The irregular blocks and lines are of lighter shades of the foundation color, and light cross-bars of a bright contrasting hue relieve the sombreness of the whole. A walnut brown plaid, for instance, has three or four brown shadings, brightened by narrow bars of orange-color, crossing each other at wide intervals; plaids of dark gray shadings, like frescoes, are interlined with bright Mexico blue; a third, of rich violet tones, has pale écru bars; black lines traverse sailor blue plaids, while black and white combinations are warmed by scarlet or orange tracery. These are the newest, and promise to be "stylish;" but there are also the favorite green and crimson plaids, so comfortable-looking for children and young girls in mid-winter.

French importations furnish this year some new wool plaids. First is the plaid sablé, or sanded, a light all-wool fabric, that appears as if sprinkled with sand of many colors. Small irregular plaids of black and white with yellow, black with green, or scarlet with white, are admired in this stuff for children's wear. Plaid matelassé, woven to give the appearance of being quilted, is an all-wool double-width fabric, exceedingly rich and warm looking. Some of the handsomest fancy plaids are shown in this goods. Basket-woven plaid is similar to this, but the threads are intertwined in smaller clusters, forming pin-head checks and diamonds. Satiné plaid, an all-wool fabric with smooth, lustrous face like satin, represents all the clan tartans. Epingelines are heavy wool reps, with occasional silk bars. The mosaic plaids, woven in tiniest blocks, giving mosaic effects, are of lighter quality than the other wool fabrics. In these blue and deep violet lines intersect. Bold purple has lines of black and white; green, well shaded, has orange bars; and there is much black and white with buff.

FRENCH CASHMERE, ETC.

Cashmere will continue to be a favorite wool fabric for costumes. Experienced merchants are importing very dark cloth-colored cashmeres, three pieces of these to one of bright hues being the proportion shown in order-books. Prune or plum color will prevail, then myrtle green, walnut brown, London smoke, and sailor blue. The finest quality of cashmere is called Thibet cloth, measures forty-eight inches in width, and costs $3 50 a yard. Lighter qualities of cashmere in the choice shades just mentioned, and in many others besides, are $2 50 a yard, double fold. Striped cashmeres, intended for morning dresses solely, have black or olive grounds with gay Oriental stripe. These are preferred to pattern robes of cashmere that require much contriving to arrange in approved shape.

French satines are much better goods than the sleazy satines of last year, that soon lacked lustre and became flimsy. They have substantial body of wool so closely twilled on the surface as to produce fine lustre that promises to be permanent. Golden brown and navy blue are well brought out in this fabric, but choicest among the dark shades are the grave London smoke. Russian gray and a deep green, that the French call gorge-de-pigeon, the pigeon's neck in hue. Twenty-seven inches wide, it costs $1 25 a yard.

French merino is twilled on each side, while cashmere has only the outside twilled, with plain surface on the wrong side. All the old shades are seen in this familiar fabric, from palest rose, blue, and salmon for babies' sacques to the dark quiet colors of fashionable costumes.

Lyons poplins closely imitate the richest Irish poplins, and display a wide range of colors—among them eight shades of brown, six of wine-color, four grays, and numberless blues and greens.

The prettiest French calicoes have brown, maroon, or black grounds strewn with small hexagonal figures in the bright Roman colors. The usual cashmere stripes and palm leaves are also shown.

This catalogue of goods will show that the French still bear the palm for producing exquisite colors and soft, fine fabrics. The effect of the war is felt, however, in the increased price of all woolen goods made in France. These are 25 per cent. higher than last year's importations, and many show an advance of 33⅓ per cent.

ENGLISH FABRICS.

In plain goods are many English lustres, ranging in price from 50 cents to $1 a yard. Among these are silk warp Balermo poplins of light quality and very lustrous; mélange lustres in dark shades, slightly chiné, for 55 cents a yard; a new and pretty white and black crape cloth at 75 cents; cheap tartan lustres for 25 or 30 cents; Victoria poplin, black with hair stripes of color, similar to the cheap grenadine worn in the summer; black alpaca, with white stripes, suitable for half-mourning; and Japanese silks of every variety of plaid, stripe, and self-color. English satines are not nearly so good in quality or color as the French satines.

The calicoes are most satisfactory of all English goods. These prints, so well known for service, are no longer confined to double purples and browns dashed with white in "lightning-struck" patterns, but are shown in dainty colors and designs that will make charming morning dresses for household fairies. For brunettes there are black grounds with involved lines of clear buff, or bright cherry, while blondes select brown grounds with leafy stripes of blue or apple green. Two shades of brown are prettily combined, violet grounds have white tracery, a sailor blue ground has an effective marbled pattern in lighter blue, while white and black for mourning is in diagonal stripes like serge. These are near a yard wide, and worth 30 cents a yard.

CICILIAN CLOTH.

Cicilian cloth is a new black fabric. It is a lustrous mohair, a sort of basket-woven alpaca, but far softer than ordinary alpaca, and capable of being draped as gracefully as cashmere. It is a pure, full, deep black, a yard wide, without a centre fold, and costs from 65 cents upward.

WIDOW'S SILK.

Radzimir silk, or widow's silk, to be worn when bombazine and crape are being left off, is a lustreless silk of deepest black. It is as heavy as ottoman silk, but instead of being repped it has a smooth surface produced by an almost invisible twill. The price is $4 50 a yard. Black satin duchesse, fit for a dowager, is a thick-corded silk on one side, with the upper surface finished with satin gloss.

FALL SHAWLS.

Shawls of domestic manufacture are attractive this year, not alone by reason of their improved coloring, but because they cost only half as much as imported shawls very little superior to them. Square shawls folded double and worn in scarf fashion will prevail during the first cool months, long shawls for traveling and carriage in winter. The designs are not new, consisting of shaded stripes and plaids. Roman stripes, alternating with others of black, brown, or white, are bright and pretty for cool mornings. In soft wool these cost $6 for ample squares. Gay Scotch plaid squares are $4 50, if of American manufacture; from $6 upward if imported. The Leonora shawl—a good warm plaid, basket-woven, is $6. The Jacquard shawl, of soft white wool, with twill effects in color, is $6. Still handsomer are the ottoman repped shawls in reversible stripes of bright Roman colors, or in gray shaded stripes for old ladies and for traveling shawls. English repped shawls, called Anglo-Indian, have lovely stripes of warm Oriental hues. Many of the American plaids prove to be of most serviceable colors, not rubbing off or fading as German shawls do.

CLOTH AND CASHMERE WRAPS.

Fall wraps begin to arrive. Buyers say that prune-color and the deepest green cashmeres will rival the long-time favorite black this season, and dark gray and brown will be the popular colors for cloth garments. Cashmeres are almost covered by elaborate cording in braiding patterns, imitating Gothic designs of arches, high slender points and groups of line-like clustered columns—in fact, an architectural trimming! The round cord is far more effective than any flat braiding, and resembles rich passementerie when wrought in close patterns. Guipure lace and rich fringes edge such garments. Cloth wraps have velvet bands of a darker color than the cloth, much cording, and fringe. The barathea cloth, crinkled like crape and of the same fabric as cashmere, will also be popular for wraps.

HOUSE JACKETS.

Sleeveless Zouave jackets of rich dark colors—scarlet and black—are trimmed with intricate cordings of gilt, or jardinière embroidery in bright colors. These are for afternoon wear in the house.

VELVETS.

The first velvet wraps, to be donned early in the season, are jaunty jackets so closely fitted as to be basques, almost covered with cording, like the cashmeres above described. Guipure lace will be in vogue even more than last year; rich netted fringes and Gothic passementeries, with or without a little jet, are the trimmings.

The new velvet polonaises are simply elegant, and some will cost as high as $500 on account of their fine lace and cording or embroidery. Some of these have the Louis XIV. vest, with a long skirt hanging straight, without drapery, a Watteau box-pleat behind holding the fullness.

Other velvet cloaks are short circulars, the upper part richly embroidered, and the lower trimmed with two rows of pointed guipure lace.

OPERA CLOAKS.

An opera cloak of soft white cloth in raised diamond figures is circular, trimmed with two broad bands of blue velvet richly wrought with white floss. The hood is of blue velvet, and a rich blue and white fringe of tassels borders this lovely wrap. A second, still handsomer, is of white barathea, with Gothic cording of pale blue covering half its depth.

PERSONAL.

MR. JOHN SLIDELL, who has recently deceased in France, where he has resided since he departed, in company with Mr. MASON, from Fort Warren, became weary of life in Paris, rich as he was, and notwithstanding the distinguished circle in which he mingled. He had an ardent desire to lay his bones in America among his kindred. He was a suave, long-headed, cool-headed, persistent man, and though not known as a frequent or forcible speaker when in the Senate, was an adroit manager, and exercised great power with his political associates. He, more than any other man, influenced LOUIS NAPOLEON as against the United States during the rebellion.

—A gentleman who recently heard in London the celebrated Father IGNATIUS, (an Episcopal ritualist, whose remedy for the evils of the English Church is the re-establishment of the monastic orders), states that during the service Father IGNATIUS read a passage from St. PAUL with a clearness and emphasis one rarely hears. He led the singing himself. His sermon was on the sacrifice of the mass, and was an earnest, impassioned appeal, as personal as any revival preaching, and lightened by apt illustration, ready adaptation of argument, keen wit, and wide-stretching sympathy and fervor that had something magnetic in it. He reminds one of our Southern preachers in manner and matter. He wears the black dress of a Benedictine monk, is tall and spare, with sharp features, keen eyes, a voice of great flexibility and compass, and delicate, sensitive hands. Altogether a noteworthy man.

—Mr. NAPIER, the new colored cadet, has been dubbed "Lord Napier" by his fellow-cadets. He is a more amiable cadet than SMITH, and is much better liked by the pale faces at the Point: yet, beyond the requirements of the absolute rules of the Academy, there is no intercourse whatever between the two tints, and it is not only taken for granted by officers of the army, but by cadets, that it will be many years before there can be any social equality or cordiality in the army between the two races.

—After a contest in the courts, Mrs. HENRY A. WISE, Jun., has just received the full amount of the insurance, with interest and costs, on the life of her late husband, Rev. HENRY A. WISE, Jun., of Baltimore. The amount was about $23,000.

—Mrs. KALBFUS, of Baltimore, devised $125,000—about three-quarters of her entire estate—to the Humane Impartial Society and the Aged Woman's Home of that city.

—The Marquis of Lorne, on arriving in Montreal, some four weeks hence, will unveil the statue of Queen VICTORIA in that city.

—Prince ARTHUR is said to be the only male member of the royal family who is studious and really well grounded in his profession. He is more popular than his brother the Duke of Edinburgh, who is hard and close in money matters, or than the Prince of Wales, who never reads a book, knows nothing of pictures, has no taste for any thing literary or scientific, but who shoots a good deal, hunts a little, dines to any extent, smokes the largest cigars obtainable, and goes to the theatre whenever there is a new play. That is about the routine of his life.

—Governor PERHAM, of Maine, has for a son a lad of few years, but of expanded and practical ideas, especially on the subject of finance. A few days ago, while the Governor was transacting business with a State official, this young gentleman entered the presence, approached the "governor," and loudly asked him for some money. The Governor being busily engaged, and wishing to silence his boisterous demands, said to him, "My son, be quiet; I have no money." The little fellow placed himself in a theatrical attitude, with one foot advanced and arms akimbo, and, looking his father in the face, said, "Well, this is a pretty how-d'ye-do; Governor of Maine, and no money!" After which he commenced whistling, and left the room in apparent disgust and astonishment at the impecuniosity of a Governor.

—"ANNA DICKINSON" (we quote from a rough Chicago writer) "made $19,000 last winter flirting tears with jeweled hands into the front seats of the audiences she addressed in behalf of the downtrodden and destitute of her sex."

—The new prima-donna, who is just now sojourning at Saratoga—Madame LICHTMAY—has for a husband Baron VON DE GERAY, a gentleman of splendid physique, superior attainments, genial manners and address, and who is a major in the Hungarian Hussars.

—Mr. DANIEL DREW, who has endowed a college in New Jersey, is not only a devout and plucky Methodist, but believes in speculation and special providences: "Why," said he, "when I subscribed $10,000 for the church I had no idea where the money was coming from; but Providence was with me. I went down to Wall Street, got in with some of those smart fellows, and in less than six months I had skinned them out of $10,000 as slick as a whistle."

—Mr. SPURGEON has printed 1000 different sermons delivered by himself, 20,000,000 copies of which have been distributed in the English language alone. Some of them have been translated into most of the languages of Christendom. He recently told his congregation that each pulpit effort cost him at least forty-eight hours' pain.

—Ex-Senator YATES, of Illinois, has accepted an offer from the Literary Bureau of ten thousand dollars for fifty lectures, to be delivered next season.

—Mr. J. LOTHROP MOTLEY will return to this country some time during the present month, accompanied by Mrs. MOTLEY and his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. BRINSLEY SHERIDAN.

—BJORNSON, the novelist of Norway, was, at the outset of his literary career, obliged to publish most of his works at his own expense. He is now quite well off, receiving about $5000 a year from his copyrights, besides a comfortable salary as pastor of a village church near Drontheim.

—TIMOTHY TRIMM, formerly editor of the Petit Journal, a paper that once had a daily sale of 600,000 copies in Paris, recently died in that city. He was known as one of the liveliest small-talkers in Paris, and was reputed to have more acquaintance with all kinds of gossip than any man in France.

—General SHERMAN, in passing through Binghamton the other day, was, as usual, greeted by a large crowd. He stood upon a chair, and, after receiving three cheers, said "he was satisfied if the crowd was." And then he left for Scranton.

—The Princess MARY of Holland, who has just been married to the Prince of Wied, is five years older than her husband, she being thirty; but, as an offset, she brings him plenty of money, and is heiress to one of the largest fortunes in Europe. She was much courted by indigent princes, but would none of them, until one day, traveling, she met the Prince of Wied at a lunch, and then—she was gone. Clear case, at first sight. She is an excellent musician and an excellent cook. Made her own wedding-cake.

—The new Russian consul-general for this city, Mr. WALDEMAR DE BODISCO is a nephew of the late Baron DE BODISCO, formerly Russian minister. He was educated first at Georgetown, and afterward in Europe. For some years he has been first secretary of legation. His sister is the wife of BROOKE WILLIAMS, Esq., a large capitalist and banker, of Washington, the brother-in-law of the late Baron DE BODISCO, who married a Miss WILLIAMS about thirty years ago. The baroness is now the wife of Captain SCOTT, of the British army. The New York consulship is important, lucrative, and honorable, and its bestowal in this instance is an evidence of respect for the memory and gratitude for the labors of a very faithful and able servant.

—The WARD family, of Kentucky, is a family that, more than any other family enjoying the honor of that name, is frequently mentioned in the papers. Mrs. HUNT, known to society twenty years ago as SALLIE WARD, and afterward as Mrs. LAWRENCE, of Boston, invokes the law against one NEWCOMB to the extent of $300,000 for having been guilty of tergiversation in promising to lead her to the hymeneal altar and then respectfully declining. After her unfortunate marriage to Mr. LAWRENCE, and separation, she returned to Louisville and resumed her place in society there; but soon afterward her brother MATT murdered in cold blood a school-teacher named BUTLER, of which crime he was acquitted after a long and exciting trial, in which JOHN J. CRITTENDEN and other eminent Southern lawyers joined earnestly for his defense. From that time the misfortunes of the family rapidly culminated. The father and two or three brothers died, MATT was killed in a drunken brawl in Texas, the little property left was squandered, and the remaining daughters, notwithstanding their rare personal attractions, passed into the "sear and yellow leaf" unwedded and unsought. SALLIE, however, had the good or bad luck to marry again, her second husband being a Dr. HUNT, who drank to excess, and died suddenly not long after the marriage. Now she brings this suit against Mr. NEWCOMB, claiming damages to the amount of $300,000, sufficient to put the family on a very comfortable footing again—if she gets it.

—Mr. WILLIAM H. APPLETON, senior of the publishing house of D. APPLETON & Co., has ordered from one of the best painters of England a portrait of HERBERT SPENCER, which he proposes to give to the Century Club.

—Mr. GLADSTONE is not merely the notablest man in the public affairs of England, but he enjoys a distinction that is quite as great, in London at least—that of wearing the most shocking hat of any in Britain—a white hat too, and one, moreover, as shocking to the cultivated mind as the celebrated milk-white chapeau of Mr. GREELEY.

—The Empress EUGÉNIE assures people—positively—that from the bottom of her heart she "always loved the Emperor, but that it has increased daily, now that she sees him so calmly and resignedly accept every thing, even to the most infamous calumnies."

—Mrs. S. COLT, believing literature to be a suitable employment for the female mind, has nearly finished for publication a guide-book that will avoid the dry, arithmetical style common in such publications, and will be at the same time both accurate and funny—as good as a novel.

—Mr. J. W. DAVIDSON, author of "Living Writers of the South," is preparing a "Dictionary of Living and Dead Writers of the South."

—SHIRLEY BROOKS is now the managing editor of the London Punch.

—Secretary SEWARD and his traveling companions have so much recovered from the fatigue of Oriental journeying that they have concluded to pass the autumn and winter in rambling over Europe.

—Captain F. P. HILL, the first conductor who ever ran a train over the New Jersey Central Railroad, has so faithfully discharged his duty as to be pensioned at $1000 per annum, and relieved from all further work.

—Mrs. C. D. MOULTON, doubtless the finest musical amateur we have in the United States, is about to become a professional, Mr. MAX STRAKOSCH having engaged her for a series of concerts.

—The will of the late CHARLES HOSMER gives $25,000 to the Hartford Theological Institute, to be used in aid of poor young divinity students; $5000 to the Hartford Hospital; $2500 each to the American Tract Society and Board of Foreign Missions; and $2000 to local charities in Hartford.

—The Rev. Dr. LITTLEDALE, a ritualist of the most advanced type, is coming over from England to give a fresh start to the drooping spirits of that little branch of the Church. He will take a run through the Union, and after stirring up the faithful, will concentrate his energies upon Boston, and open the eyes of that people to the inutility of the Boston religion.

—Certain malicious Frenchmen having said that GAMBETTA had made a fortune by the war, a Tribune correspondent was sent to ferret out the truth. GAMBETTA refused to be interviewed. The correspondent found him living in a thin, cheap-looking way, in an apartment on the second floor of a dingy old house. A boy, half cook, half valet, took the card, and ushered the representative of public opinion into the dining-room, where he was received by GAMBETTA. And they talked; but not about the fortune. There were a few portraits in the room; one of MIRABEAU, whom GAMBETTA is said to resemble. He (GAMBETTA, not MIRABEAU) wore a black alpaca coat and vest and dark pantaloons. Couldn't have been dressed more simply.

—The Emperor of Brazil has determined upon the entire abolition of slavery in that country, and while at Rome will sign the decree ordering it to be carried into effect.

—JOHN TAYLOR & SONS, of England, having in their service fifty-six thousand men, are accordingly pronounced to be the greatest mining firm in the world.

—Lady MACDONALD, while in Washington during the stay of the High Commission, heard much said as to the probabilities of Secretary ROBESON's success in regard to Mrs. AULIFF. A number of persons were discussing the subject at a party, and Lady MACDONALD said she thought it would be a great pity for so brilliant a woman, one so calculated to adorn society, and particularly Washington society, to marry Mr. ROBESON, for in a short time, as things were in this country, he would merely be a New Jersey lawyer. Mrs. FRELINGHUYSEN, who heard the remark, said, "I assure you, Lady MACDONALD, there are worse positions in life than being a New Jersey lawyer."

Watch-Case, Figs. 1–3.

THIS watch-case is easily made, and has a pretty effect. First cut the back of card-board from Fig. 59, Supplement, and cover one side of the card-board with black velvet. For the front of the case cut a piece of black satin eight inches long and five inches and three-quarters wide, turn down one side of the material on the wrong side two inches wide, and sew two strips of double card-board in the double layer of material thus formed—one strip at the upper edge, and one at a distance of four-fifths of an inch from the upper edge; each strip of card-board must be five inches and three-quarters long and a quarter of an inch wide, and, in sewing the strips in the material, the latter must be gathered to suit the length of the card-board strips. The under edge of the satin is gathered closely, and then fastened to the point of the back. The trimming for the front consists of three diamond-shaped pieces of card-board an inch and a half in size, which are covered with black velvet; on these pieces stretch fine silk soutache and saddler's silk of various bright colors, imitating Scotch plaid. Braid the soutache and saddler's silk together as shown by illustrations Figs. 2 and 3. The points of the diamonds thus ornamented are set together as shown by Fig. 1, and then sewed on the front of the case, at the same time sewing in small tassels of colored saddler's silk. A larger diamond, arranged in a similar manner, ornaments the back of the case, as shown by the illustration. Below this diamond sew a hook covered with black silk, for the watch; at the upper point set a ring, covered with silk of various colors, to hang up the case. Cover the under side of the back also with velvet, which is glued on with gum-arabic. Fasten a ring, covered with black silk and white soutache, to the under point of the watch-case; colored silk tassels are set in the soutache windings.

Carriage Leather Music Port-Folio, Figs. 1–4.

THIS music port-folio is designed to be laid on the piano, and filled with such music as is in daily use. It consists of two pockets for holding large and small sheets of music, and is made of card-board, brown marbled carriage leather, and brown silk, trimmed with flowers and leaves of carriage leather. To make the port-folio cut two pieces of card-board of the requisite size; the port-folio is best arranged so that it will hold two sheets of music lying lengthwise next each other. Cover one side of the pieces of card-board with carriage leather, and the other side with brown silk, overseaming the material together over the card-board; then bind the outer edge of each part of the port-folio with brown silk ribbon. Cut in a similar manner a smaller piece of card-board, carriage leather, and silk for the upper pocket, as shown by the illustration, join the three pieces of the port-folio, observing the illustration, by means of soufflets, and join the back lengthwise sides by means of a back composed of a double piece of brown silk and muslin interlining. The soufflets are also made of a piece of double brown silk and muslin interlining; the back crosswise edge of each piece is laid in three pleats that come on each other. The port-folio is ornamented with flowers, buds, and leaves cut separately of carriage leather from the patterns partly given. Each flower requires five leaves cut from Fig. 57, Supplement; each piece is folded on the under side, at the upper rounded edge, along the dotted line on Fig. 57, pleating the folded edge slightly and basting it down; the edge of the material at both sides is also folded down along the dotted lines given. Next lay two pleats at the under edge of each piece, bringing × on ●; these pleats are opened out sharply, so that the leaf is rounded. The seam made by joining every five leaves for a flower is covered by a button of the material, as shown by Fig. 4. For each bud cut the outside of the linen part with red silk, and in working each stitch fasten in the braid binding on the outer edge of the bottom. To close the dressing-case run two pieces of red cord through the eyelet-holes at the upper edge in opposite directions.

Dressing-Case, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS dressing-case, which is designed to hold toilette articles, such as brushes, combs, crimping-pins, hair-pins, etc., is especially adapted for traveling, as it can be easily packed into a trunk. Cut, first, a circular piece of gray linen twenty-one inches in diameter, on the latter sew pieces of red worsted braid five inches long each, as shown by the illustration, Fig. 1; these pieces must be two inches and three-quarters apart at the outer edge of the material, toward the middle of the latter, however, they are only an inch and a quarter apart; in the middle of the intervals thus formed work a row of herring-bone stitches with red split zephyr worsted, then sew on a piece of similar braid in the shape of a circle, covering the seam made by sewing on the short pieces of braid. Bind the outer edge of the material with wider braid. Make eyelet-holes at a distance of four-fifths of an inch from the outer edge on both sides of each row of herring-bone stitches; work the eyelet-holes with gray thread, and ornament the outer edge of the material with a row of points of gray thread, for which crochet alternately 1 dc. (double crochet) and one point on the worsted braid; the point consists of 5 chain stitches and 1 slip stitch on the third, 1 single crochet on the second, and 1 dc. on the first chain stitch. Cut for the dressing-case itself, which at the same time forms the bottom of the linen part, a circular piece of card-board ten inches and a half in diameter, and cover the upper side with oiled silk and the under side with muslin lining; then arrange various bands and pockets of oiled silk, which must previously be bound with red worsted braid, on the upper side of this part of the dressing-case, as shown by Fig. 2, and bind the latter with similar braid. Furnish the dressing-case with elastic cord loops to correspond to the buttons of the pockets; to do this run the ends of each piece of cord through the card-board, and sew them together on the under side. The bottom thus far completed is now fastened inside of the gray linen part in the following manner: Work a row of button-hole stitches on a circular piece two inches and a half in diameter, pleat the outer edge together closely, and wind a small piece of double carriage leather around it as shown by Fig. 2. For each of the leaves, finally, cut one piece from Fig. 58, Supplement, fold down the upper edge of the piece along the straight lines, and the side edges along the dotted lines, fasten the turned-down upper corner of the leaf, bringing ∗ on ∗, and lay two pleats at the under edge, bringing × on ●; these pleats are opened out sharply. In sewing on the flowers and leaves, pass the needle only through the silk binding of the port-folio; it is also to be observed that one leaflet always covers the seam made by sewing on the next one.

Corners of Tapestry Borders for Covers, Cushions, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE borders are suitable for ornamenting covers, window ornaments, cushions, etc. They are worked in cross stitch with worsted and silk, in the colors given in the description of symbols, and are finished either with a similar foundation, or else set on material of a corresponding color. When worked on very coarse canvas with coarse worsted, these borders may also be used for rugs, mats, etc. The colors may be changed, care being taken to preserve the harmony.

Figs. 31–33, Supplement. Cut out in points the pieces cut from Figs. 31 and 32, as shown by the illustration, and lay Figs. 32 and 33 in pleats, as shown by the illustration and indicated on the pattern: the dotted lines form the outer folds and the straight lines the inner fold of the pleats; previous to this, however, cut a slit in Fig. 32 along the double line to ✕. First sew the ribbon loops on Fig. 31, and then the pieces cut from Figs. 32 and 33; the seam made by sewing on the latter is finally covered by a buckle, through which a leather strip is drawn.

Fig. 2.—Slipper bow of velvet and white lace. This bow is made of three overlapping leaves trimmed with lace, and set on a stiff lace foundation as shown by the illustration; the two lower leaves are cut of black silk, while the upper leaf, agrafe, projecting bow, and two small ends are made of black velvet. The bow is five inches and three-quarters long, and is four inches and a half wide at its widest place. The size of the bow, however, must correspond to the slipper.

Fig. 5.—Slipper bow of patent-leather. A steel buckle is set on the middle of the bow. To make the latter, cut from Figs. 28–30, Supplement, one piece each. Pink the outer edge of these pieces, arrange Figs. 28 and 29 in pleats, bringing × on ●, and fasten them on a stiff lace foundation. Slide the buckle on the upper piece, Fig. 30, and set the latter on the foundation as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—CROCHET FRINGE FOR CLOTHES-BAG.

Drilling and Crochet Clothes-Bag, Figs. 1 and 2.

THE under part of this clothes-bag is made of plain gray drilling, embroidered in point Russe embroidery with gray thread, and ornamented with red worsted crochet trimming. The upper part of the bag is crocheted with red worsted. For the under part cut of drilling five pieces from Fig. 56, Supplement. Bind the outer edge of each of these pieces with red worsted braid three-quarters of an inch wide, which is button-hole stitched on with red Saxony wool. For the medallion in each tab work with red zephyr worsted a foundation of 5 st. (stitches), close this in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and crochet on the foundation st. six times alternately 7 ch. (chain stitch) and 1 sc. (single crochet). At the end of the round work 1 sl. each on the first 3 st. of the next 7 ch. Now crochet on a brass ring three inches and a quarter in circumference, and at the same time on the first ch. scallop of the preceding round, 1 sc., 6 sc. on the ring only, ✳ 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop of the preceding round and on the ring, 6 sc. on the ring only, and repeat from ✳, going forward; fasten to the first sc. with 1 sl. at the end of the round. This ring forms the centre of the medallion. Surround this middle ring with a row of rings crocheted in the following manner: 3 ch., then work ✳ on a ring two inches and four-fifths in circumference 3 sc.; pass over 1 st., 3 sc. on the ring, and at the same time on the back upper vein of the 3 following st. of the middle ring; after the second sc. work 1 p. (picot) of 5 ch., then 3 sc. on the ring, 2 dc. (double crochet) separated by 1 ch. on the upper vein of the second following st. of the middle ring; in doing this the working thread must lie at the back of the ring. Repeat from ✳. At the end of the round, instead of working the last dc., fasten to the third of the 3 ch. first worked with 1 sl. Then work ✳ on the free part of the next ring 6 sc., 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the p. formed by 5 ch. and on the ring at the same time, 6 sc. on the ring only, 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the p. and on the ring, 6 sc. on the ring, 1 stc. on the p. and on the ring, 6 sc. on the ring, then 1 sc. on the ch. between the 2 dc., and repeat from ✳. Fasten the thread at the end of the round and cut it off. Now lay the thread on anew and work ✳ 1 stc. on the seventh st. of the next ring, 3 ch., pass over 2 st. of the ring, 1 sc. each on the next 7 sc. of the ring, 3 ch., 1 stc. on the fourth following sc. of the ring, and repeat from ✳; at the end of the round fasten to the first stc. with 1 sl. In connection with this round work four rounds more in ribbed crochet; in these rounds, however, widen in such a manner that the work neither draws nor puckers. This completes the medallion. Now fasten it on the tab as indicated on the pattern by means of long button-hole stitches of red Saxony wool and with a cross seam of gray thread. For the remainder, ornament the tab as shown by the illustration and indicated on the pattern, with crochet gimp of red worsted, which is sewed on in point Russe with gray thread.—This gimp is crocheted like the gimp shown by Fig. 8 on page 500 of Harper's Bazar, No. 32, Vol. III. Join all the tabs trimmed in this manner from their under point to ✳ with overhand stitches and trim the tabs along the binding in point Russe with gray thread. For the upper part of the bag make a foundation with red zephyr worsted, which must correspond in width to the under part (measuring below the hollow of the scallops), close the foundation in a ring, and on it work 15 rounds of cross double crochet; instead of the latter, simple ch. scallops may be worked also. In connection with these rounds, work three rounds in ribbed crochet with gray cotton. Now follows a row of rings, on which crochet in the manner shown by Fig. 2. The darker stitches shown by the illustration are worked with red worsted. On the upper edge of the rings work with gray cotton one round as follows: * 1 dc. on the seventh st. of the next ring, 2 ch., pass over 2 st. of the ring, 1 sc. each on the upper vein of the following 8 st. of the ring, 2 ch., 1 dc. on the third following st. of the ring. Repeat from *. On this round again work three rounds in ribbed crochet, then follows one round: 7 ch., the first five of these ch. count as dc., then always alternately 1 stc., 2 ch.; at the end of the round fasten to the fifth of the seven ch. first crocheted with 1 sl. Then work * 1 sc. on the next st. of the preceding round, 1 sdc. (short double crochet) on the next st., 1 dc. each on the following 4 st., 1 sdc. on the following st., 1 sc. on the following st., and repeat from *; fasten the thread at the end of the round and then work with red worsted * 1 sc. on the st. at the hollow of the points, 7 ch., and repeat from *. At the end of the round work sl. to the middle of the first ch. scallop, then follows one round of always alternately 7 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop. Like this last work 16 rounds more, then follows a border of points, which is worked with gray cotton like the border above the gray strip (see Fig. 2). Finally crochet on this point of the border one round with red worsted, always alternately 1 sc. on the st. at the hollow between two points, 7 ch. This completes the upper part of the bag. Now fasten to the first round of the close strip, as shown by Fig. 2, strands of gray thread of the requisite length, which are crossed and tied together as shown by the illustration. Then pass through the st. of the first round of the upper part and through the first open-work round above the close strip each one steel hoop thirty-two inches long, covered with worsted, lay the ends of each hoop on each other to a length of two inches and four-fifths, and fasten them. Now join the crochet part with the under part, which is ornamented at the point with a worsted ball and tassels as shown by the illustration. Through the upper edge of the crochet part run two pieces of red woolen cord, by means of which the bag is closed. Finally, fasten on the upper steel ring five double pieces of red cord, each twelve inches long, slide on a worsted ball, and fasten the pieces of cord to a brass ring five inches in circumference, which is covered with worsted.

Tatted and Crochet Fringe.

See Illustration on page 565.

THIS fringe, which is suitable for trimming covers, etc., is made of medium-sized white knitting cotton. For the first round work one row of rings as follows: * 1 ring of 3 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 6 ds., 1 p., twice 3 ds. separated by 1 p., 1 p., 2 ds. After a thread interval of two-fifths of an inch work a second ring of 3 ds., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, four times 3 ds. separated by 1 p., 1 p., 3 ds. After a thread interval of two-fifths of an inch work 1 ring of 2 ds., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, twice 3 ds. separated by 1 p., 1 p., 6 ds., 3 ds. After a thread interval of two-fifths of an inch repeat from ; instead of forming the first p. in each of the following rings, however, fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring. 2d round.— Fasten to the two p. opposite each other of the first and second rings of the preceding round, as shown by the illustration, 1 ring of 4 ds., 1 p., three times alternately 3 ds., 1 p.; then 2 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., two-fifths of an inch thread interval, 1 ring of 3 ds., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, 2 ds., 1 p., three times alternately 3 ds., 1 p., finally 4 ds.; fasten the thread and repeat from *, observing the illustration. 3d round.—Work one ring of 2 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., 1 p., twice alternately 3 ds., 1 p.; 4 ds., 1 p., 2 ds., between each two rings of the preceding round, as shown by the illustration. Now turn the points thus formed downward, and for the upper edge of the border crochet two rounds as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 4 sc. (single crochet) on the joining thread between two rings, 1 sc. on the ring. 2d round.—1 sc., * take up one loop from the next sc. of the preceding round, 1 ch. (chain stitch), and work off both loops on the needle together; now take up one loop from the loop previously worked, and one loop from the following sc. of the preceding round, and then work off all the loops on the needle together, drawing the thread through once, 1 ch., and repeat from *. Now fasten to the picots of the middle ring, and to all the remaining picots, two threads each, which are doubled to half their length, and knot every 12 such threads together in one fringe strand.

NURSING AS A PROFESSION FOR LADIES.

THE want of remunerative occupations suitable for gentlewomen is, in these days, painfully felt and universally acknowledged, and fresh schemes are continually being started to remedy the evil. It has been proposed to throw open the learned professions to the competition of women, and to remove the various disabilities which keep the sex in a position of inferiority. But it appears that there is one department of activity peculiarly their own which they have hitherto failed to make the vantage-ground it might become. We refer to nursing.

Much has been written and said about nursing as a department of Christian benevolence, and all honor is due to those noble and compassionate women who have proved that love can dignify and consecrate the most repulsive tasks, and who have made the scourge of cholera and typhus the opportunity of carrying elevating and purifying influences into some of the foulest spots of our great cities. But their efforts do not meet the necessities of the particular case we are considering.

There is no reason why the rich should not obtain for money services which are freely bestowed upon the poor. Ladies will now take fees as doctors, but they will nurse only for charity. Why is this? It is because nursing is considered menial. But it is not: it is essentially a profession, and waits only for the right persons to practice it in order to take its proper rank. Surgery was counted menial a hundred and fifty years ago, and then the surgeons were servants to the physicians. But it was made a profession by a few men who saw what it was capable of becoming, and brought scientific knowledge to bear upon their practice. It needs now only a few qualified women to elevate nursing to the same rank.

If ladies would devote two or three years to thorough study, coupled with practical training, they might at the end of that time be equipped with a knowledge and experience which are not now to be had from nurses, but which are very much desired by medical men. Doctors, especially those whose large practice obliges their visits to be limited in time and infrequent, do feel the want of efficient and intelligent help in the sick-room; indeed, physicians say that the science of medicine will not be perfected until accurate and constant observations of all the stages of a disease are made and reported by some qualified individual. Who could do this so well as a trained nurse, whose general culture and education had quickened her powers of accurate observation and correct description?

Invalids of the upper classes would soon feel the advantage of being tended by a lady of refinement and scientific training, and would be willing to remunerate her services at such a rate as would in time repay the expenses of her preparatory study.

If there existed a class of nurses such as we have described, the fitting remuneration would soon be forthcoming. What will not men give for a little chance of lengthening out life? If once it were known to be worth while to secure such a skilled nurse, no money would be grudged her. Only ladies must make their services valuable before they can have the right to command their own terms.

Even the charitable aspect of the case is best met in this way: as medical capacity is better now than it would be if doctors acted only from charity, so will nursing become more efficient than if it were practiced only by amateurs. The things that are worst done are always those that are supposed to require no special training. Witness teaching, of which all are supposed to be capable, but which so few can do well.

We are often hearing of ladies who have ruined their health by trying, untrained, to nurse their friends. Many a wife and mother has continued night and day to watch by the sick-bed, who would gladly have taken proper rest had she been able to trust the nurse; and yet, with all her care, she has not succeeded in her conflict with disease as a more experienced person might have done. The crises of domestic sickness are those in which it is most necessary to guard against the undue encroachment of the feelings upon the judgment, and a stranger can often nurse really better than the fondest relative. Besides, there is often no occasion for the alabaster box of a delicate frame to be broken in order that the generous ointment of loving care may be poured out.

One objection has been raised to this scheme, namely, that such lady nurses would not be willing to do all that is required in a sick-room, and yet few would be disposed to employ two people to do the work which usually falls to the lot of one. To this we reply that the higher class of nurses would not be called in for a slight illness, while in severe cases the nurse's time and attention are so constantly required by the invalid that it is impossible for her to dispense with help. Besides, a nurse ought never to be overtired; it would, therefore, be undesirable for her to expend her valuable strength in doing work which could as well be left to the servants in the house. A lady who is a good nurse will never consider herself above rendering any service in the sick-room, any more than a medical man does in times of emergency; but, from the nature of the case, her work will usually be of the higher kind.

The demand for good nurses is already so great that the influence of this movement on the general condition of women would be immense—infinitely greater than having women doctors, who would always be few and would require wealth. Doctors, even after having passed through a long medical training, have very long to wait before their practice begins in any sense to pay, whereas nurses would very soon meet with employment. Their term of training, extending, perhaps, to two or three years, need not involve the expenditure of more than a thousand dollars—probably not so much—and as soon as ever they were ready for work they would find the work ready for them, and they would speedily be indemnified for the original outlay.

Were this scheme realized, its effects would be felt all through society; a legitimate ambition would be open to all, for nurses might well become rich; we should then have women drafted off from all manner of unsuitable occupations and brought to devote themselves to the one most congenial to them. Especially would the advantage be felt among educators; some of those who now become governesses, because they know of no other means of earning a livelihood befitting their station, will gladly devote themselves to the work for which nature or home experience may have fitted them, and in it may rise to a higher rank than any to which they would have attained as teachers. The demand for good nurses is really very great already; they now command what would by governesses be considered as good salaries, and are far oftener sought for than found.

Then, too, the general standard of nursing would be raised; the lower class of nurses, through working under such trained superiors, would become more efficient, and would always have before them the prospect of rising.

A collateral advantage of the practice of nursing as a profession would undoubtedly be felt, in that it would develop in one typical example the relation of men's and women's work to each other. Waiving the question whether woman might or might not be made capable, with man's advantages, of doing man's work, it surely will not be denied that a sphere of action would be preferable in which she would not have to compete with him, but in which her own peculiar endowments would give her a special advantage. And here is an opportunity for showing how a woman's work may complement man's in the true order of nature. Where does the character of the "helpmeet" come out so strikingly as in the sick-room, where the quick eye, the soft hand, the light step, and the ready ear second the wisdom of the physician, and execute his behests better than he himself could have imagined?

Besides these obvious advantages, it will, no doubt, be found, in the course of their scientific training, that women discover special aptitudes for particular branches of professional knowledge and practice, and the science of medicine itself will in time be benefited by the fruitful co-operation of the two orders of workers.

It is, perhaps, not too much to hope that if this experiment of mutual help succeeds, it may stimulate attempts in other departments of labor, which have hitherto been monopolized by the stronger sex, or which have been the objects of a rivalry tending to lower both the quality and the remuneration of the work done.

ONE SWALLOW MAKETH NOT A SUMMER.

DID she give a tender glance
When thy tongue refused to speak?
Let it not thy bliss enhance,
Nor for further glances seek:
One such look from maiden's eye
Is no pledge of constancy.

Did she call thee fond or dear,
Sitting dreamily alone?
Drive the echo from thine ear,
Be not tricked by one sweet tone:
One such whisper does not prove
That she yields thee all her love.

Did she heave a deep-drawn sigh
When thou bad'st a sad farewell?
Did a tear-drop dim her eye?
Yield not to the potent spell:
One such tear or ling'ring sigh
Proves not she will love for aye.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.

COMING HOME.

THE leaves were yellowing in the park and woods round Arden Court, and the long avenue began to wear a somewhat dreary look, before Mr. Granger brought his young wife home. It was October again, and the weather bleaker and colder than one has a right to expect in October. Mr. Lovel was at Spa, recruiting his health with the soft air from the pine-clad hills, and leading a pleasant elderly bachelor existence at one of the best hotels in the bright little inland watering-place. The shutters were closed at Mill Cottage, and the pretty rustic dwelling was left in the care of the honest housekeeper and her handmaiden, the rosy-faced parlor-maid, who dusted master's books and hung linen draperies before master's book-cases with a pious awe.

Miss Granger had spent some part of her father's honey-moon in paying visits to those friends who were eager to have her, and who took this opportunity of showing special attention to the fallen heiress. The sense of her lost prestige was always upon her, however, and she was scarcely as grateful as she might have been for the courtesy she received. People seemed never weary of talking about her father's wife, whose sweetness and beauty and other interesting qualities Miss Granger found herself called upon to discuss continually. She did not bow the knee to the popular idol, however, but confessed with a charming candor that there was no great sympathy between her step-mother and herself.

"Her education has been so different from mine," she said, "that it is scarcely strange if all our tastes are different. But, of course, I shall do my duty toward her, and I hope and pray that she may make my father happy."

But Miss Granger did not waste all the summer months in visiting. She was more in her element at the Court. The model children in the new Arden poor-schools had rather a hard time of it during Mr. Granger's honey-moon, and were driven through Kings and Chronicles at a more severe pace than usual. The hardest and dryest facts in geography and grammar were pelted like summer hail upon their weak young brains, and a sterner demand was made every day upon their juvenile powers of calculation. This Miss Granger called giving them a solid foundation; but as the edifice destined to be erected upon this educational basis was generally of the humblest—a career of carpentering, or blacksmithing, or house-maiding, or plain-cooking for the most part—it is doubtful whether that accurate knowledge of the accusative case or the longitude of the Sandwich Islands which Miss Granger so resolutely insisted upon was ever of any great service to the grown-up scholar.

In these philanthropic labors she had always an ardent assistant in the person of Mr. Tillott, whose somewhat sandy head and florid complexion used to appear at the open door of the school-room very often when Sophia was teaching. He did really admire her with all sincerity and singleness of heart; describing her, in long confidential letters to his mother, as a woman possessed of every gift calculated to promote a man's advancement in this world and the next. He knew that her father's second marriage must needs make a considerable change in her position. There would be an heir, in all probability, and Sophia would no longer be the great heiress she had been. But she would be richly dowered, doubtless, come what might; and she was brought nearer to the aspirations of a curate by this reduction of her fortune.

Miss Granger accepted the curate's services and patronized him with a sublime unconsciousness of his aspirations. She had heard it whispered that his father had been a grocer, and that he had an elder brother who still carried on a prosperous colonial trade in the City. For any thing like retail trade Miss Granger had a profound contempt. She had all the pride of a parvenu, and all the narrowness of mind common to a woman who lives in a world of her own creation. So while Mr. Tillott flattered himself that he was making no slight impression upon her heart, Miss Granger regarded him as just a little above the head gardener and the certificated school-master.

October came, and the day appointed for the return of the master of Arden Court; rather a gloomy day, and one in a succession of wet and dismal days, with a dull gray sky that narrowed the prospect, and frequent showers of drizzling rain. Miss Granger had received numerous letters from her father during his travels—letters which were affectionate if brief; and longer epistles from Clarissa, describing their route and adventures. They had explored Switzerland thoroughly, and had spent the last month in Rome.

The interior of the old house looked all the brighter, perhaps, because of that dull sky and those dank, sodden woods without. Fires were blazing merrily in all the rooms; for, whatever Miss Granger's secret feelings might be, the servants were bent on showing allegiance to the new power, and on giving the house a gala aspect in honor of their master's return. The chief gardener, with a temporary indifference to his own interests, had stripped his hot-houses for the decoration of the rooms, and great vases of exotics made the atmosphere odorous, and contrasted pleasantly with the wintry fires.

Miss Granger sat in the principal drawing-room, with her embroidery-frame before her, and a group of Berlin-wool spaniels developing slowly under her industrious fingers, determined not to be flurried or disturbed by the bride's return. She sat at a respectful distance from the blazing logs, with a screen interposed carefully between her complexion and the fire, the very image of stiffness and propriety, with not one of her dull brown hairs ruffled, not a fold of her dark green silk dress disarranged.

The carriage was to meet the London express at Holborough station at half past four, and at a little before five Miss Granger heard the sound of wheels in the avenue. She did not even rise from her embroidery-frame to watch the approach of the carriage, but went on steadily, stitch by stitch, at the ear of a Blenheim spaniel. In a few minutes more she heard the clang of doors thrown open, then the wheels upon the gravel in the quadrangle, and then her father's voice, sonorous as of old. Even then she did not fly to welcome him, though her heart beat a little faster, and the color deepened in her cheeks.

"I am nothing to him now," she thought.

She began to lay aside her wools, however, and rose as the drawing-room door opened, to offer the travelers a stately welcome.

Clarissa was looking her loveliest—in violet silk, with a good deal of fur about her, and with an air of style and fashion which was new to her, Miss Granger thought. The two young women kissed each other in a formal way, and then Mr. Granger embraced his daughter with some show of affection.

"How lovely the dear old place looks!" cried Clarissa, as the one triumph and glory of her marriage came home to her mind: she was mistress of Arden Court. "Every thing is so warm and bright and cheerful; such an improvement upon foreign houses! What a feast of fires and flowers you have prepared to welcome us, Sophia!"

She wished to say something cordial to her step-daughter, and she did really believe that the festive aspect of the house was Miss Granger's work.

"I have not interfered with the servants' arrangements," that young lady replied, primly. "I hope you don't find so many exotics oppressive in these hot rooms. I do."

"Oh dear, no. They are so lovely," answered Clarissa, bending over a great oval dish of white waxen-looking blossoms, "one can scarcely have too many of them. Not if the perfume makes your head ache, however; in that case they had better be sent away at once."

But Miss Granger protested against this with an air of meek endurance, and the flowers were left undisturbed.

"Well, Sophy, what have you been doing with yourself all this time?" Mr. Granger asked, in a cheerful voice. "Gadding about finely, according to your letters."

"I spent a week with the Stapletons and ten days with the Trevors, and I went to Scarborough with the Chesneys, as you expressed a wish that I should accept their invitation, papa," Miss Granger replied, dutifully; "but I really think I am happier at home."

"I am very glad to hear it, my dear, and I hope you'll find your home pleasanter than ever now.—So you like the look of the old house, do you, Clary?" he went on, turning to his wife; "and you don't think we've quite spoiled it by our renovation?"

"Oh no, indeed! There can be no doubt as to your improvements. And yet, do you know, I was so fond of the place that I am almost sorry to miss its old shabbiness—the faded curtains, and the queer Indian furniture which my great-uncle, Colonel Radnor, brought home from Bombay. I wonder what became of those curious old cabinets?"

"I dare say they are still extant in some lumber-room in the roof, my dear. Your father took very little of the old furniture away with him, and there was nothing sold. We'll explore the garrets some day, and look for your Indian cabinets.—Will you take Clarissa to her rooms, Sophy, and see what she thinks of our arrangements?"

Miss Granger would gladly have delegated this office to a servant; but her father's word was law; so she led the way to a suite of apartments which Daniel Granger had ordered to be prepared for his young wife, and which Clarissa had not yet been allowed to see. They had been kept as a pleasant surprise for her coming home.

Had she been a princess of the blood royal she could not have had finer rooms, or a more perfect taste in the arrangement of them. Money can do so much when the man who dispenses it has the art of intrusting the carrying out of his desires to the best workmen.

Clarissa was delighted with every thing, and really grateful for the generous affection which had done so much to gratify her.

"It is all a great deal too handsome," she said.

"I am glad you like the style in which they have carried out papa's ideas," replied Miss Granger; "for my own part, I like plainer furniture, and more room for one's work. But it is all a matter of taste."

They were in the boudoir, a perfect gem of a room, with satin-wood furniture and pale green silk hangings; its only ornaments a set of priceless Wedgwood vases in cream-color and white, and a few water-colored sketches by Turner and Creswick and Stanfield. The dressing-room opened out of this, and was furnished in the same style, with a dressing-table that was a marvel of art and splendor, the looking-glass in a frame of oxydized silver, between two monster jewel-cases of ebony and malachite, with oxydized silver mouldings. One entire side of this room was occupied by an inlaid maple wardrobe with seven doors, and Clarissa's monogram on all of them—a receptacle that might have contained the multifarious costumes of a Princess Metternich.

It would have been difficult for Clarissa not to be pleased with such tribute, ungracious not to have expressed her pleasure; so when Daniel Granger came presently to ask how she liked her rooms, she was not slow to give utterance to her admiration.

"You give me so much more than I deserve, Mr. Granger," she said, after having admired every thing; "I feel almost humiliated by your generosity."

"Clarissa," exclaimed her husband, putting his two hands upon her shoulders, and looking gravely down at her, "when will you remember that I have a Christian name? When am I to be something more to you than Mr. Granger?"

"You are all that is good to me—much too good," she faltered. "I will call you Daniel if you like. It is only a habit."

"It has such a cold sound, Clary. I know Daniel isn't a pretty name; but the elder sons of the Grangers have been Daniels for the last two centuries. We were stanch Puritans, you know, in the days of old Oliver, and Scriptural names became a fashion with us. Well, my dear, I'll leave you to dress for dinner. I'm very glad you like the rooms. Here are the keys of your jewel-cases; we must contrive to fill them by-and-by. You see I have no family diamonds to reset for you."

"You have given me more than enough jewelry already," said Clarissa. And, indeed, Mr. Granger had showered gifts upon her with a lavish hand during his brief courtship.

"Pshaw, child! only a few trinkets bought at random. I mean to fill those cases with something better. I'll go and change my coat. We dine half an hour earlier than usual to-day, Sophia tells me."

Mr. Granger retired to his dressing-room, on the other side of the spacious bed-chamber, perhaps the very plainest apartment in the house, for he was as simple in his habits as the great Duke of Wellington: a room with a monster bath on one side, and a battered oak office-desk on the other—a desk that had done duty for fifty years or so in an office at Leeds; in one corner a well-filled gun-stand, in another a rack of formidable-looking boots—boots that only a strong-minded man could wear.

When she was quite alone Clarissa sat down in one of the windows of her boudoir, and looked out at the park. How well she remembered the prospect! how often she had looked at it on just such darksome autumnal evenings long ago, when she was little more than a child! This very room had been her mother's dressing-room. She remembered it deserted and tenantless, the faded finery of the furniture growing dimmer and duller year by year. She had come here in an exploring mood sometimes when she was quite a child, but she never remembered the room having been put to any use; and as she had grown older it had come to have a haunted air, and she had touched the inanimate things with a sense of awe, wondering what her mother's life had been like in that room—trying to conjure up the living image of a lovely face, that was familiar to her from more than one picture in her father's possession.

She knew more about her mother's life now; knew that there had been a blight upon it, of which a bad, unscrupulous man had been the cause. And that man was the father of George Fairfax.

"Papa had reason to fear the son, having suffered so bitterly from the influence of the father," she said to herself; and then the face that she had first seen in the railway carriage shone before her once more, and her thoughts drifted away from Arden Court.

She remembered that promise which George Fairfax had made her—the promise that he would try and find out something about her brother Austin.

He had talked of hunting up a man who had been a close friend of the absent wanderer's; but it seemed as if he had made no effort to keep his word. After that angry farewell in the orchard Clarissa could, of course, expect no favor from him; but he might have done something before that. She longed so ardently to know her brother's fate, to find some means of communication with him, now that she was rich and able to help him in his exile. He was starving, perhaps, in a strange land, while she was surrounded by all this splendor, and had five hundred a year for pocket-money.

Her maid came in to light the candles, and remind her of the dinner hour, while she was still looking out at the darkening woods, growing blacker and blacker in the gathering gloom of that October evening. The maid was an honest country-bred young woman, selected for the office by Mrs. Oliver. She had accompanied her mistress on the honey-moon tour, and had been dazed and not a little terrified by the wonders of Swiss landscape and the grandeurs of fallen Rome.

"I've been listening for your bell ever so long, ma'am," said the girl; "you'll scarcely have time to dress."

There was time, however, for Mrs. Granger's toilette, which was not an elaborate one; and she was seated by the drawing-room fire talking to her husband when the second dinner-bell rang.

They were not a very lively party that evening. That old adage about three not being company went near to being verified in this particular case. The presence of any one so thoroughly unsympathetic as Sophia Granger was in itself sufficient to freeze any small circle. But although they did not talk much, Clarissa and her husband seemed to be on excellent terms. Sophia, who watched them closely during that initiatory evening, perceived this, and told herself that her father had not yet discovered the mistake which he had made. That he would make such a discovery sooner or later was her profound conviction. It was only a question of time when his eyes should be opened to the fact of his own folly.

Thus it was that Clarissa's new life began. She knew herself beloved by her husband with a quiet, unobtrusive affection, the depth and wide measure whereof had come home to her very often since her marriage with a sense of obligation that was almost a burden. She knew this, and knew that she could give but little in return for so much—the merest, coldest show of duty and obedience in recompense for all the love of this honest heart. If love had been a lesson to be learned, she would have taught it to herself, for she was not ungrateful, not unmindful of her obligations, or the vow that she had spoken in Arden church; but as this flower called love must spring spontaneous in the human breast, and is not commonly responsive to the efforts of the most zealous cultivator, Clarissa was fain to confess to herself after five months of wedded life that her heart was still barren, and that her husband was no more to her than he had been at the very first, when, for the redemption of her father's fortunes, she had consented to become his wife.

So the time went on, with much gayety in the way of feasting and company, at Arden Court, and a palpable dullness when there were no visitors. Mr. and Mrs. Granger went out a good deal, sometimes accompanied by Sophia, sometimes without her; and Clarissa was elected by the popular voice the most beautiful woman in that part of the country. The people who knew her talked of her so much that other people who had not met her were eager to see her, and made quite a favor of being introduced to her. If she knew of this herself, it gave her no concern; but it was a matter of no small pride to Daniel Granger that his young wife should be so much admired.

Was he quite happy, having won for himself the woman he loved, seeing her obedient, submissive, always ready to attend his pleasure, to be his companion when he wanted her company, with no inclination of her own which she was not willing to sacrifice at a moment's notice for his gratification? Was he quite happy in the triumph of his hopes? Well, not quite. He knew that his wife did not love him. It might come some day, perhaps, that affection for which he still dared to hope, but it had not come yet. He watched her face sometimes as she sat by his hearth on those quiet evenings when they were alone, and he knew that a light should have shone upon it that was not there. He would sigh sometimes as he read his newspaper by that domestic hearth, and his wife would wonder if he were troubled by any business cares—whether he were disturbed by any abnormal commotion among those stocks and consols or other mysterious elements of the financial world in which all rich men seemed more or less concerned. She did not ever venture to question him as to those occasional sighs; but she would bring the draught-board and place it at his elbow, and sit meekly down to be inevitably beaten at a game she hated, but for which Mr. Granger had a peculiar affection.

It will be seen, therefore, that Clarissa was at least a dutiful wife, anxious to give her husband every tribute that gratitude and a deep sense of obligation could suggest. Even Sophia Granger, always on the watch for some sign of weariness or short-coming, could discover no cause for complaint in her step-mother's conduct.

Mr. Lovel came back to Mill Cottage in December, much improved and renovated by the Belgian waters or the gayeties of the bright little pleasure place. The sense of having made an end of his difficulties, and being moored in a safe harbor for the rest of his life, may have done much toward giving him a new lease of existence. Whatever the cause may have been, he was most certainly an altered man, and his daughter rejoiced in the change. To her his manner was at once affectionate and deferential, as if there had been lurking in his breast some consciousness that she had sacrificed herself for his welfare. She felt this, and felt that her marriage had given her something more than Arden Court, if it had won for her her father's love. He spent some time at the Court, in deference to her wishes, during those dark winter months; and they fell back on their old readings, and the evenings seemed gayer and happier for the introduction of this intellectual element, which was not allowed to prevail to such an extent as to overpower the practical Daniel Granger.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

PERHAPS those who are confined in the city during the midsummer months could find no more agreeable and instructive recreation for a holiday afternoon than a visit to the Museum of Natural History in the Central Park. The old Arsenal is quite transformed, and now large and handsome halls contain an extensive series of cases well adapted to exhibit objects of natural history. The whole collection is very valuable and of great variety, and none will experience a fresher pleasure in the examination of the specimens than the children, even though they puzzle in vain over some of the hard scientific names. But children and grown folks in general care more for things than for names; and here are insects, shells, minerals, fishes; snakes of every size; birds of every hue, from the tiny hummingbird—of which there are several hundred—to the tall flamingo and huge jabiru. The little folks will linger around the birds. The taxidermist has been skillful. There are about eleven thousand specimens, many of which are from the famous collection of Prince Maximilian. Then there are the mammalia. Many of these are arranged in striking groups, and attract much attention. One needs to visit the museum several times in order to examine its curiosities comfortably and thoroughly; yet a single tour through it will give a very good idea of its contents. The plants and flowers which are scattered about the building make a pleasant addition to this free exhibition. And then, outside of the museum, are the wild beasts, monkeys, etc., in their commodious dwellings, ready to exhibit themselves without solicitation to all spectators.

Although Walter Scott was born on the 15th of August, the observance of the centennial anniversary took place on August 9 in Edinburgh, the place of his nativity, and in some other Scottish towns. The day was anticipated partly in order that the British Association for the Advancement of Science, then in session in Edinburgh, might take part in the memorial celebration. The most noted men of the kingdom participated in the festivities. In other parts of Great Britain the 15th of August was observed.

Captain Ericsson, while measuring Mercury, incidentally ascertained the temperature of the sun. He states it at 4,060,000 degrees Fahrenheit. Let us be thankful we are no nearer to it in August, and not complain.

The municipal authorities of Trieste, Austria, have sent a letter of thanks and a purse of gold to Madame Regina Dal Cin, a skillful surgeon, who has performed one hundred and fifty successful operations at the city hospital in Trieste.

The most discreet young clergyman we have heard of lately hails from Boston. While out sailing the other day two ladies in a row-boat waved their handkerchiefs toward him. Being near enough to see that they were strangers to him, he straightway sailed away. Subsequently he learned from friends of the ladies that they had become too tired to row further, and wished to obtain assistance from him.

The Ninth Census will, as a late writer on the subject expresses it, "be a big thing." It is estimated that when completed it will fill three volumes of the size of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary. The first volume will contain tables of the population, churches, schools and colleges, school attendance, libraries, newspapers, pauperism, and crime. The second volume will contain the tables of mortality and of age and sex, and statistics of the deaf and dumb, blind, insane, and idiotic. Volume third will contain the records of industry and wealth in the United States, and also tables of wealth, taxation, and general indebtedness; of agriculture, of manufacturing and mining industry and fisheries, and also the tables of occupations. The information contained in the census records has been very carefully edited, all important facts being classified and grouped together so that they can be easily found. The various tables will be most convenient and interesting to all who desire definite information concerning the population of the United States, and its financial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests. There was much delay in the issuing of the Eighth Census; but it is believed that the Ninth Census will be ready for the public before next New-Year's Day.

The monument which is to be erected in the Central Park in honor of Walter Scott will consist of a pedestal of granite weighing about forty tons, standing twelve feet high, and a figure of Scott in bronze, nine feet high, with his dog lying at his feet. The order for the work has been forwarded to Scotland. The sculptor is Steel, the same artist who made the famous figure in the Edinburgh monument.

It is stated that the music at the funeral of Miss Phœbe Cary was improvised by Señor Antonio L. Mora. Called upon at a late hour, and unprovided with music for the poet's own beautiful hymn, which it was the wish of her friends should be sung, he repaired to the church to find only two volunteers in the choir. During the address he wrote out music for the different parts in pencil, and handed them to the singers, who had the difficulty of adapting them to the words to overcome. The music and its execution have been universally praised.

What a crowning qualification is that which is set forth in the conclusion of an advertisement found in a London newspaper! Read and ponder:

"A barrister's daughter (thirty-five), healthy, good-tempered, and cheerful, desires a matronship; is experienced in applying the birch rod. Address," etc.

Dr. Hall is certainly correct in saying that the healthiest scent in the world is no scent at all, where the air is so pure that the breathing of it attracts no attention whatever; and the only perfect deodorizer is perfect cleanliness of person and premises. It is especially important in summer-time to put on clean clothing often; to wash the body every day; to go around and through the premises often, from cellar to attic, and allow no pile of dirt, dry or moist, no offal whatever, to remain for a single moment. Dampness should be especially guarded against; every room in a house should be thoroughly aired every sunshiny day, the earlier in the morning the better.

Raspberry jam is made by the ton at a place called Church's Landing, on the St. Mary's River, between Lake Huron and Lake Superior. An old settler who has partially civilized a colony of Ojibbeway Indians, without the aid of whisky, now employs them in gathering wild raspberries, which he converts into about twenty tons of jam every year, and exports it.

One thousand two hundred and fifty dollars will buy, in London, a "through ticket to go round the world."

Napoleon is recovering his health and spirits. On the occasion of his recent visit to Holly Lodge he seems to have been uncommonly jolly. The boys of Cholmondely College having attended to cheer him on his departure in the pouring rain, he turned round, laughingly, as he wrapped himself in his furred great-coat, and said, "How can you Englishmen grumble at this climate, and call it variable? Why, it has done nothing but rain all the summer!" A loud guffaw and another hearty cheer greeted his Majesty as the carriage drove off.

A broken-spirited man mournfully says, that the most humiliating domestic use a full-grown man can be put to is to be sent to the baker's for a "cent's worth of yeast." We should think so. But men usually want bread. How would it do for the complainant to learn to make his own yeast? Or he might hold the baby while his wife goes for the yeast. In these days, if women are to learn all the intricacies of political science, it is only a fair exchange for men to be allowed to learn all the intricacies of domestic science. A cent's worth of yeast is a very important thing; it will make light a whole batch of bread.

An exchange informs us that, under proper management, a bushel of peaches may be skinned in five minutes. Sal soda and water will accomplish the work; but a strong lye made of wood ashes is recommended. Bring the lye to the boiling-point, put in the peaches, and stir them gently until the skin begins to come off. Then throw them into a pail of cold water. Remove the skins, and pass them into another vessel of cold water, and thence to the preserving kettle, if you desire to can or preserve them whole. They should not remain in the boiling lye more than twelve or fifteen seconds.

An Indiana Agricultural Society, incited by a laudable desire to increase the number of native-born American voters in that State, has offered a premium of five dollars to the couple who will bring to the annual fair the greatest number of children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren. Is not that an unreasonably small premium to offer in such an enterprise?

Watering-places should be careful and not circulate malicious reports. It interferes with the quiet pleasures of gentlemen who prefer remaining in the city; besides, it causes unnecessary traveling expenses. Only a little while ago there was a report at Newport that a French count had eloped with the wife of a New York gentleman. The news went to New York, and within twenty-four hours it is said that over a hundred desperate individuals came on suddenly to see their wives at the fashionable watering-place. How beautiful is conjugal confidence!

New Orleans has been free from yellow fever this season, although the weather there has been very warm. Indeed, for several years past that city has been comparatively exempt from this dreadful scourge, which has ravaged Buenos Ayres. This immunity is referred wholly to the enforcement of proper sanitary regulations in New Orleans. Buenos Ayres was in a most filthy condition when the fatal fever appeared, drainage having been utterly neglected. It is mentioned as proof of the infectious rather than the contagious character of the yellow fever that out of three hundred and sixty grave-diggers, who were almost constantly employed and overworked for weeks together in burying the dead, not a single one died with the fever. It has also been remarked that "the grave-yard was the healthiest location, and grave-digging the healthiest occupation in Buenos Ayres during the first four months of the present year," the cemetery being located outside of the infected district. Cholera is regarded as infectious rather than contagious.

Fig. 1.—BLACK CRAPE ROUND HAT, with turned-up rim, trimmed with ruches and a fan-shaped bow of crape. Short crape veil, trimmed with narrow ruches.

Figs. 2 and 3.—GRAY CRAPE BONNET. This bonnet is trimmed with an oblong rosette and a long veil of the material, strings of gray silk ribbon four inches wide to tie under the chin. To make the bonnet, first cut the frame from Figs. 8 and 9, Supplement. Pleat the pieces cut from Figs. 8 and 9, bringing × on ●, wire the edge of Fig. 8, and join this piece, according to the corresponding figures, with the rim, which is sewed together from 15 to 16; wire the outer edge of the rim, and bend it in the shape given by the illustration, Fig. 3, which shows the frame for the bonnet. Cover the crown of the frame smoothly with several layers of crape; cover the rim on the inside and outside with smooth crape also, and then with gathered crape strips on the outside only. Bind the outer edge of the bonnet with a strip of crape several layers in thickness, and sew a row of gray lace to the inside of the rim. Finally, trim the bonnet as shown by the illustration, and furnish it with strings.

Figs. 4 and 5.—BLACK NEAPOLITAN HAT. The rim of the hat is lined with black poult de soie, and the revers are covered with the same material. The trimming consists of black feathers and black ribbon. Fig. 5 shows the hat untrimmed.

Fig. 6.—BONNET FOR ELDERLY LADY. This bonnet is made of lilac silk, trimmed with gros grain ribbon in a darker shade and crimped silk fringe an inch and three-quarters wide. To make the bonnet, cut the rim, first, of a double layer of stiff lace from Fig. 6, Supplement. Wire the edge of this piece, cover the inside smoothly with silk, and the outside with gathered silk, and bind the edge with similar silk a quarter of an inch wide. For VAGUE PEOPLE.

THE core of society is compact enough, made up as it is of those real doers of the world's work who are clear as to what they want, and who pursue a definite object with both meaning and method. But outside this solid nucleus lies a floating population of vague people; nebulous people; people without mental coherence or the power of intellectual growth; people without purpose, without aim, who drift with any current any where, making no attempt at conscious steering, and having no port to which they desire to steer; people who are emphatically loose in their mental hinges, and who can not be trusted with any office requiring distinct perception or exact execution; people to whom existence is something to be got through with as little trouble and as much pleasure as may be, but who have not the faintest idea that life contains a principle which each man ought to make clear to himself, and work out at any cost, and to which he ought to subordinate and harmonize all his faculties and his efforts. These vague people of nebulous minds compose the larger half of the world, and count for just so much dead-weight, which impedes or gives its inert strength to the active agents as it chances to be handled. They are the majority which votes in committees and all assemblies as they are influenced by the one or two clear-minded leaders who know what they are about, and who drive them like sheep by the mere force of a definite idea and a resolute will.

Yet if there is nothing on which vague people are clear, and if they are not difficult to influence as the "majority," there is much on which they are positive as a matter of private conviction. In opposition to the exhortation to be able to give a reason for the faith that is in us, they can give no reason for any thing they believe or fancy they believe. They are sure of the result, but the logical method by which that result has been reached is beyond their power to remember or understand. To argue with them is to spend labor and strength in vain, like trying to make ropes out of sea-sand. Beaten off at every point, they settle down again into the old vague, vapory credo, and it is like fighting with ghosts to attempt to convince them of a better way. They look at you helplessly, assent loosely to your propositions; but when you come to the necessary deduction, they double back in a vague assertion that they do not agree with you; they can not prove you wrong, but they are sure that they are right; and you know then that the collapse is hopeless. If this meant tenacity, it would be so far respectable, even though the conviction were erroneous; but it is the mere unimpressible fluidity of vagueness, the impossibility of giving shape and coherence to a floating fog or a formless haze. Vague as to the basis of their beliefs, they are vaguer still as to their facts. These, indeed, are like a ladder of which half the rungs are missing. They never remember a story, and they can not describe what they have seen. Of the first they are sure to lose the point and to entangle the thread; of the last they forget all the details, and confound both sequence and position. As to dates, they are as if lost in a wood when you require definite centuries, years, months; but they are great in the chronological generosity of "about," which is to them what the Middle Ages and Classic Times are to uncertain historians. It is as much as they can do to remember their own birthday; but they are never sure of their children's, and generally mix up names and ages in a manner that exasperates the young people like a personal insult.

With the best intentions in the world, they do infinite mischief. They detail what they think they have heard of their neighbors' sayings and doings; but as they never detail any thing exactly, or twice alike, by the time they have told the story to half a dozen friends they have given currency to half a dozen different chimeras which never existed save in their own woolly imaginations. No repute is safe with them, even though they may be personally good-natured and anxious not to do any one harm; but they are so vague that they are always setting afloat exaggerations which are substantially falsehoods; and if you tell them the most innocent fact of any one you would not injure for worlds—say your own daughter or your dearest friend—they are sure to repeat it with additions and distortions, till they have made it into a Frankenstein, which no one now can subdue. Besides this mental haziness, which neither sees nor shapes a fact correctly, vague people are loose and unstable in their habits. They know nothing of punctuality at home or abroad; and you are never sure that you will not stumble on them at meal-times at what time soever you may call. But worse than this, your own meal-times, or any other times, are never safe from them. They float into your house uncertainly, vaguely, without purpose, with nothing to say and nothing to do, and for no reason that you can discover. And when they come they stay; and you can not for the life of you find out what they want or why they have come at all. They invade you at all times, in your busy hours, on your sacred days; and sit there in a chaotic kind of silence, or with vague talk that it tires your brains to bring to a focus; but they are too foggy to understand any thing like a delicate hint, and if you want to get rid of them you must risk a quarrel and effectively shoulder them out. They will be no loss. They are so much drift-weed in your life, and you can make no good of them for yourself or others. Even when they undertake to help you they do you more harm than good by the hazy way in which they understand and the inexactness with which they carry out your wishes. They volunteer to get you by favor the thing you want and can not find in the general way of business—say something of a peculiar shade of olive green—and they bring you in triumph a brilliant cobalt; they know the very animal you are looking for, they say, with a confidence that impresses you, and they send to your stable a gray horse to match your bay pony; and if you trust to their uncontrolled action in your affairs, you find yourself committed to responsibilities you can not meet, and brought to the verge of destruction. They do all this mischief not for want of good-will, but for want of definiteness of perception; and are as sorry as you are when they make "pi," and not a legible sheet. Their desire is good, but a vague desire to help is equal to no help at all, or even worse; it is a positive evil, and throws you wrong by just so much as it attempts to set you straight. They are as unsatisfactory if you try to help them. They are in evil case, and you are philanthropically anxious to assist them. You think that one vigorous push would lift the car of their fortunes out of the rut in which it has stuck, and you go to them with the benevolent design of lending your shoulders as the lever. You question them as to the central fact which they wish changed; for you know that in most cases misfortunes crystallise round one such evil centre, which being removed, the rest would go well. But your vague friends can tell you nothing. They point out this little superficial inconvenience, that small remediable annoyance, as the utmost they can do in the way of definiteness; but when you want to get to the core you find nothing but a cloudy complaint of general ill-will, or a universal run of untoward circumstances with which you can not grapple. To cut off the hydra's heads was difficult enough; but could even Hercules have decapitated the djinn who rose in a volume of smoke from the fisherman's jar? It is the same in matters of health. Only medical men know to the full the difficulty of dealing with vague people when it is necessary that they should be precise. They can localize no pain, define no sensations: if the doctor thinks he has caught hold of one leading symptom, it fades away as he tries to examine it; and, probe as he may, he comes to nothing more definite than a pervading sense of discomfort, which he must resolve into its causes as he best can. So with their suspicions—and vague people are often strangely suspicious and distrustful. They tell you in a loose kind of way that such or such a man is a rogue, such or such a woman no better than she should be. You ask them for their data—they have none; you suggest that they are mistaken, or at least that they should hold themselves as mistaken until they can prove the contrary, and you offer your version of the reputations aspersed; your vague friends listen to you amiably, then go back on their charge, and say, "I am sure of it"—which ends the conversation. They rely on their impression as other people rely on known facts, and a foggy belief is to them what a mathematical demonstration is to the exact.

In business matters they are simply maddening. They never have the necessary papers; they do not answer letters; they confuse your questions, and reply at random or not at all; and they forget all dates and details. When they go to their lawyer on business they leave certificates and drafts behind them locked up where no one can get at them; or if they send directions and the keys, they tell the servant to look for an oblong blue envelope in the right-hand drawer, when they ought to have said a square white parcel in the left. They give you vague commissions to execute, and you have to find your way in the fog to the best of your ability. They say they want something like something else you have never seen, and they can not give an address more exact than "somewhere in —— Street." They think the man's name is Baker, or something like that. Perhaps it is Flower; but the suggestion of ideas ought to be intelligible to you, and is quite near enough for them. They ask you to meet them when they come up to town, but they do not give you either the station or the train. You have to make a guess as near as you can, and when you reproach them they pay you the compliment of saying you are so clever it was not necessary for them to explain. If they have any friends out in Australia or India, they inquire of you, just returned, if you happened to meet them. When you ask where they were stationed they say they do not know; and when you suggest that Madras and Calcutta are not in the same Presidencies, that India is a large place, and Australia not quite like an English county, they look helplesand bewildered, and drift away into the vague geography familiar to them—"somewhere in India," "somewhere in Australia," and "I thought you might have met them." For geography, like history, is one of the branches of the tree of knowledge they have never climbed, and of which the fruits are as though they were not. But apart from the personal discomforts to which vague people subject themselves and the absurdities of which they are guilty, one can not help speculating on the spiritual state of folks to whom nothing is precise, nothing definite, and no question of faith clearly thought out. To be sure, they may be great in the realm of conviction; but so is the African savage when he hears the ghosts of his ancestors pass howling in the woods; so is the Assassin of the Mountain, when he sees heaven open as he throws himself on the spears of his enemies in an ecstasy of faith to be realized by slaughter and suicide. Convictions based on imagination, unsupported by facts or proofs, are as worthless in a moral as in a logical point of view; but the vague have nothing better; and whether as politicians or as pietists, though they are warm partisans, they are but feeble advocates, fond of flourishing about large generalities, but impossible to pin to any point, and unable to defend any position. To those who must have something absolute and precise, however limited—one inch of firmly laid foundation on which to build up the remainder—it is a matter of more wonder than envy how the vague are content to live forever in a haze which has no clearness of outline, no definiteness of detail, and how they can make themselves happy in a name, calling their fog faith, and therewith counting themselves blessed.

WITH A WEDDING PRESENT.

SWEETEST maid in all the earth,
Though my love be little worth,
Yet I cast it at thy feet:
To be spurned by thee is sweet.

Heed it not, nor stoop to take
What I lavish for thy sake:
Scarcely cast on it thine eye:
Go thy way, and let it lie.

Oh, that in a living line
Were ten thousand loves like mine
Prostrate laid, that on them all
Thine unheeding foot might fall!

Go thy way, most sweet, most fair!
Tread us down, and do not spare!
Trample on our heads, for we
Only live to honor thee!

All along the love-paved road,
Lady, pass to thine abode.
Queen of loves, ascend thy throne,
Where thou wilt not sit alone.

Sweetest maid in all the earth,
Is my love too little worth
Even to be trampled on
As thou passest to thy throne?

SEEING THE WORLD.

"AND so you are really a-going?" asked Lucius, leaning over the gate, and gazing wistfully at Becky. "Well, I s'pose I must make up my mind ter bear it. If you'd given it up, and cared a sixpence for me, who cares so much for you, why we could 'a been married 'most any time. I'm building a house now that 'll be the smartest-looking one in the place when it's done. And I've got money in the bank, and four yoke of oxen afield! If— But it's no use talking. Ifs don't help a fellow out of trouble, seeing as you mean ter go any way!"

"Yes," said pretty Becky, in whose fair face the color had been coming and going while he spoke—"yes, I've made up my mind ter see the world a bit. I guess you'll get on without me; you won't die of it. I s'pose you'll be up ter see me off to-morrow?"

"I'm afeard it 'll be more pain than pleasure. It 'll be like seeing the last of you. It's as good, or as bad, as losing you forever. You'll be certain to take up with some of them mill bosses or flashy clerks that know how ter impose upon a country girl."

"Maybe I shall. At any rate I shall make a heap of money, and I'm bound ter see the world. I don't want ter spend all my days in the chimbly-corner, if other folks do. They say as how the smart girls make a matter of nine or ten dollars a week up ter the Blackwater mills."

"And pay their board out of it, and eat baker's trash, and spile their complexions, and lose their health, and throw the rest away on finery. I've seen them there mill girls, when I've bin up ter Blackwater with potatoes, tricked out like dolls in cheap nonsense, and I've thanked my stars that none of 'em didn't belong to me!"

"You can keep on thanking your stars, I guess. Of course I don't want ter disgrace you, and I'm bound ter go into the mills and see the world."

"'Tain't a good p'int of view, ter my eye; and I shouldn't call it a disgrace if you needed for ter go. It ain't going ter work that's disgrace, but it's a-using of your money fur show. However, it's none of my business; that's plain; though goodness knows I wish it was. Good-night, Becky; I'll see you ag'in in the morning."

"Good-night," said Becky, folding her arms like a statue of determination. "I've a good mind ter give you the slip fur your pains, Sir," she thought, "and git Ben ter take me over ter the railroad an hour earlier." And then she walked up to her mother's door, stripping the syringa-bushes as she went, and wondering what the great world outside Duffield was like, and if Lucius would really be ashamed of her going into the mill—a little trembling and uncertainty of herself withal at heart. But she did not ask Ben to help her give Lucius the slip next morning; she even delayed some time, tied a knot in her bonnet strings on purpose, because it would be necessary to untie it, and came near missing the train waiting till Lucius should please come and say good-by. But just as she was taking her seat beside Ben, Lucius appeared, took the reins out of Ben's hands, and drove her over to the station himself, a distance of three miles, and bought her ticket, checked her baggage and seated her, and wrung her hand.

"If you ever want any help, Becky," said he, "send for me." And then he turned away, sprang into the carriage, and drove off without looking back.

Becky shook the tears out of her eyes, and before the train had reached Blackwater she was beginning to feel as if home was a mighty pleasant place, and Lucius the best of company. She attempted to converse with a pretty woman at her elbow, who answered in monosyllables and felt for her watch. She asked the conductor if the next station was Blackwater, and couldn't hear his reply; she lost her ticket down a crack, and dropped her purse into the folds of her neighbor's gown, and brought suspicion upon herself in fumbling for it; and she got carried past Blackwater, and had to wait for the next train to return. Altogether, seeing the world did not begin nor promise favorably. However, she reached her destination at last—having lost her carpet-bag on the way—and the next morning took her place in the mill and went to work. But how unusual it all was to her! The noise and smell of the machinery made her head whirl, the heat drove her distracted, and the frolic and chatter of the girls were too much for human endurance. They made themselves merry about her, too. She could now and then catch their disjointed comments at her awkwardness and slowness—about her personal appearance.

"Yes, she's good enough complected, but—"

"But pug noses is good-natured."

"I don't like dimples, for my part; they look silly."

"And such an old-fashioned way of fixing her hair."

"But it's all her own."

"Yes, bought and paid for!"

What headaches and heart-aches poor Becky had before becoming acquainted with the ways of this world into which she had projected herself! How her bones ached at night! how her head burned all day with the heat, and her limbs trembled! But what delight when her wages came in! She kept her surplus funds in a little box at the bottom of her trunk, determined not to merit the name of spending for show and finery which Lucius had pointed out to her. The other girls, somehow, did not seem to fancy her; either she was too pretty to please them, too quiet to amuse them, or held herself unwittingly aloof—the result of a reserved nature, which is often misunderstood. She seldom went out with them evenings, or joked with the young men whom they knew, or sat in the boarding-house parlor and flirted out of the windows with opposite neighbors.

One day, when she was tending a loom, the new overseer came sauntering into the room, and, stopping near her, he said, "You've made a mistake quarter of a yard back there; take it all out."

"A quarter of a yard! Oh dear, it will take so long! Why didn't I see it before? Oh dear!" The overseer, who was a young and handsome man of his type—very dark, with large, keen eyes that might soften if they chose, a firm chin, and a love of a mustache, which lent expression to an otherwise expressionless mouth—the overseer turned himself about at sound of her voice, and faced her for a full minute.

"What's the matter?" asked Becky.

"I was thinking what a deuced pretty girl you are," he answered.

"That's none of your affair," said she, sharply, turning away and proceeding to take out her work.

"I don't know about that. Come, you don't find it so hard as you expected, pulling it out, eh? There! see, it comes out just as if that was part of the play. You'll put it in again straight enough in no time. Haven't been here long, have you?"

"Two months."

"How do you like?"

"I like the wages. There! you bother me; I could get along a heap faster without you. Is it necessary for you to overlook me?"

"Not necessary, but mighty pleasant." Becky laughed in spite of herself, and good-nature was established between them.

"Shall I go away?" he asked, after she had finished her laugh.

"If I didn't want you to go I dare say you'd be in a hurry; that's the contrary spirit of mankind."

"Is it? Then you are acquainted with mankind?"

"Not in Blackwater." He left her presently, and she heard one of the girls say to him, "What have you been fussing about that upstart for?"

"I've been scolding her for making a muss in her loom."

"I wish every body's scoldings were as pleasant," thought Becky.

"What did Dwight say to you, Beck?" asked the same damsel, as they were going home together.

"He told me to take out a heap of my work; and it was so warm, and I had such a headache, I felt ready to cry."

"Oh, you can't fool me. He said something else, I'll be bound, or you wouldn't hev blushed up so red, and your eyes would hev shot fire. I was watching of you."

"You'd better bin watching of your loom."

"But I didn't make a muss of it. I can do two things ter onst, if I ain't 'deuced pretty.'"

"Who said you wasn't?"

"No matter. I've got ears as well as eyes. Dwight is allus saying spooney things to the girls. He don't mean 'em. I knowed him afore he came in overseer."

"I don't know him at all," said Becky.

But somehow, when she remembered the handsome face that had changed a frown for a smile as it bent above her, she almost wished in her isolation that she did know him. However, he came into the room where she worked quite often after this, and never without delaying in her neighborhood for a chat; so that before the month was out they had got to be something like friends, and many thought something nearer. He would be often waiting about the entrance when she went home, and make some excuse to join her part of the way; and on Sundays he was sure to happen upon her either going to or coming from meeting, and drop her a few pleasant words that made the color deepen and the smile spring out like sunshine. And I greatly fear that Becky was beginning to think very seldom of Lucius, and very frequently of Dwight.

"How should you like living in Blackwater all your days, Becky?" he asked her one evening when they were prolonging their walk.

"I might like it if—"

"If the company was agreeable." And he touched the ring on the hand resting on his arm. "Somebody gave you that who wants to marry you?"

"How do you know that?" she asked, betraying herself.

"It's plain enough. I s'pose you're going to marry him—confound the fellow!—or you wouldn't wear his ring."

"Oh no!" cried Becky, feeling quite convinced just then that, come what would, she never could marry such a plain, homespun body as Lucius—"oh no; he said it would please him to see me wear it, and I wore it jest to quiet him."

"But it doesn't please me, Becky, to see you wear it."

"Then—then—I—won't wear it."

And when she had taken it off and secreted it in her pocket Dwight snatched the bare brown hand and kissed it.

"Send this ring back to the simple youth, won't you, Becky?" And Becky promised, but never found the heart to do it. "You'll never be contented to live in the backwoods again," said he; "and it's a burning shame to waste your sweetness on the desert air. You'd ought to marry somebody who lives in a growing place like this, and is getting to be somebody in it, and ride in your carriage and make a dash."

"Lucius don't approve—" began Becky, from the mere force of habit.

"Confound Lucius, whoever he is! Is that his name? What business is it of his? I say you're too pretty to marry a country bumpkin, and simmer away all your days in churning and scouring."

"What's that to you, Sir, who I marry?"

"It's a great deal to me, Becky."

"Who was that left you at the door?" asked one of the girls.

"It was a friend of mine," said Becky, confidently.

"Oh yes; you don't object ter going out evenings when you can git good company!"

"No; do you?"

"Perhaps you don't call us women-folks good company, though?"

"I have never said so."

"Have you seen Dwight to-day? The girls all say as how you and him's thick as can be. I'd keep my eyes open if I was you; he's one of them slippery sort as don't know their own mind. He courted a girl over ter Amherst as pretty as you be, and after she'd got most ready to be married he up and jilted her."

"Oh, I don't believe it," cried the unsophisticated Becky: "it isn't like him!"

"It's jest like him. He's mighty fond of good looks. Jest you catch a squint in your eyes, or break your nose or something, and see what his love amounts to."

"I hope I shan't do either," cried Becky, trembling before the dreadful picture that her companion was conjuring. "Why do you speak of such terrible things?"

"'Cause she wants Dwight herself!" spoke up another. And then Becky, fearing to hear further remarks upon her sweetheart, took her candle and went to bed.

She had quite a pretty sum of money laid by in her strong-box now, though, to be sure, she had indulged herself in more new ribbons and fallals than Lucius would have approved, or than she had intended, just to enhance her loveliness in Dwight's eyes; and of what earthly consequence was Lucius's approval compared with Dwight's admiration? Indeed, she forbore to think of the first, partly because the thought was like a stab, and partly because Dwight forced himself upon her most private thoughts, where she invested him with all the nobilities of soul which Lucius had taught her. She pleased herself with fancying how the neighbors would open their eyes when she should return home a bride on handsome Dwight's arm—a city gentleman! How the Spinach girls and the Cresses would envy her! Seeing the world, after all, wasn't such a bad thing; she quite forgot that the panorama was not over. Had she lived on in Duffield, she argued, there would have been nothing more ambitious for her to do than to marry Lucius and share his toils. But, of course, an overseer's wife would have a vastly different lot; she would not need to bring the water to wash her hands; and with such an exalted end in view it naturally became a matter of indifference whether she saved much of her wages or spent them in adornments befitting an overseer's sweetheart. In the mean time she enjoyed this view of the world which was full of light and shade, with a fair perspective to give it enchantment; it was so unlike the old, slow days at Duffield when she had only to put out her hand for the fruit just ready to drop—these excited, hopeful days, thrilling with possibility, and palpitating with uncertainty.

One day she came from the mill complaining of headache and pain in the back.

Doubtless it would be gone before morning; and she went early to bed to sleep it off; but the pains increased hourly, and by daylight she was so much worse that the landlady, Mrs. Flint, fearful of consequences, sent for a doctor.

"She's got the small-pox, madam," said he, in short metre, not stopping to adorn the simple fact.

"The small-pox! Oh, horrors! Don't call it the small-pox, doctor. It 'll spoil my business. Call it the fever, or the measles—any thing else!"

"I'm accustomed to call things by their right names, madam. It's the small-pox, and nothing more or less."

"Then she must go away. I can't have her here. It's as good as turning me and my family out of house and home inter the almshouse!"

"It would be simply murder to turn her out now. You can take your choice between that and the chance of catching the disease. I think there is a choice."

So Becky was allowed to stay, being removed to an attic room, the doors between which and the rest of the house being strongly barricaded, as if the small-pox was a visible besieging army, and no mortal but a young servant permitted to go near her, to do her a good turn, to fetch her food, and administer her medicines; and the little servant being half wild with terror herself, and weary with much household labor, performed her services at arm's-length, shaking like the ague, and slept in her chair between whiles. Moreover, the room was small and ill ventilated, with but one window, and the weather was warm, and the bed hard whereon she lay; and there was nobody to smooth the beautiful tangled hair, to wet the burning lips, to settle the pillows beneath the aching head, to encourage and sustain.

At this time the mill girls were busy talking over Becky's case within Dwight's hearing.

"The doctor says it's going plaguy hard with her."

"Where 'll her good looks be when she gits out?"

"She won't be able ter put on any more airs about 'em, I reckon!"

"I guess beaux 'll git scarce!"

"Nobody 'll be teasing her for her tin-type, I calkalate," giggled another.

"Them as has it won't know her."

"Poor thing, how hard it is!" moaned a good Samaritan; "if it wa'n't for my work daytimes, and mother's rheumatics, and the baby's measles, and gran'ther's cold, and the rest of the housework, I'd find time to go up and look after her a bit. Does Miss Flint take good care of her, think?"

"None to hurt—catch her. She's as scared as a crow; she's dripping with camfire and things ter keep it off; she smokes every body and every thing that comes down them stairs, and that ain't nobody but the doctor and little Drudge. If she gits well, it won't be Miss Flint's fault!"

"You're gossiping about somebody, girls?" said Dwight, coming down upon them like the wolf on the fold. The girls shut up like a trap-door, and fell to work silently. "What's the matter with Becky?" he pursued; "I don't see her round lately. Sick?"

"She's got the disease."

"The what?"

"The—the varioloid, I guess," not daring to tell the bald fact.

"Got it bad?"

"Miss Flint's Drudge says as how she's a sight to behold. I guess she won't be pretty to see when she gits out."

"No?" as if it were of the smallest consequence in the world, but fidgeting with his watch-chain, as if there was something on his mind. "I'm going up to Haddon to-night: the agent's took sick—great deal of sickness about—and I've got to do his work, and look after the cotton he's been bargaining for. Perhaps I sha'n't be back before Becky get's about. Some of you let her know." But nobody did let her know; nobody cared to ease her burden by a straw: only when, in a half delirium, she called him, the little Drudge said, who understood nothing of delirium, "He's gone to Haddon; I heerd the gals tell as how he'd gone a-purpose. The cotton's all an excuse, I guess: they said so; and they're real spiteful, and say he won't be coming a-courting of you no more. But I don't believe it. There! don't cry, Beck; somebody else 'll like you better'n him. I do. I ain't afeard of catching it no longer; I ain't got no fellow to lose, and Marm Flint wouldn't come a-near me, and I shouldn't hev ter hop and skip ter her tune. Oh dear!" But Nature fought bravely in Becky's cause, if nobody else did; and, when all is said and done, one had better have all the world against her than Dame Nature; and so one day Becky was out of danger, and soon she sat up and cried over her face in the glass, and plaited her wisp of hair that was left, to put the best foot forward; and presently she walked out, and the Pharisees passed by on the other side; and Mrs. Flint sent in her bill for board and nursing! It was so big that Becky couldn't believe the figures—and we know that figures won't lie—so big that she hunted out her old worn trunk from a closet under the eaves, where it had been stored during her illness, and opened her strong-box, only to find that some one had been before her! Upon being made to understand that Becky was unable to settle the bill, that she had endured so much fear and danger for nothing, that Becky would not be able to work for weeks yet, and that the mills were already supplied with more skillful hands, the exasperated Mrs. Flint quietly turned Becky out-of-doors to shirk for herself, and retained her clothing till she could ransom it. What do you suppose poor Becky thought of this new aspect of the world? With nothing but a change of raiment at her disposal, she went about from one boarding-house to another seeking rest for the sole of her foot; but when she was found to be the girl who had just got up from the small-pox "over ter Flint's," out of work and out of health, they shut the door in her face. All day long she wandered about the city offering herself as servant or nurse for a song, for her board, for nothing; but where were her recommendations: her haggard face, her sunken eyes, her mildewed skin, her ragged fringe of hair? No one wanted this creature of blight to blot their sunshine: she would frighten the children. Among so many homes there was no place for her.

The daylight faded and vanished, and the eternal stars came out from the immeasurable realms of space, and still Becky, worn and disheartened, benumbed with her troubles, paced up and down the narrow streets, shrinking away from the crowd of sweethearts, of which she had but yesterday made a part; slinking into a doorway when Dwight himself passed her, bending to another as he had bent to her so lately, smiling as she had seen him smile. Had he forgotten her so soon? Or was it, as the girls had said, that he loved only beauty, and hated misfortune? Had he ever cared for her? Would not love have recognized its other self under all the disguises of illness and disfigurement when they met face to face that first morning in which she had strength to go out, but when he had feigned not to see the welcome smile, the outstretched wasted hand? Was love a thing to be frightened by a shadow? Would Lucius have deserted her in her hour of need, as this other had done for whom she had forsaken Lucius? What bitter thoughts surged over her through that dark night, crouching in the door-way, and wrapping herself from the damp night air in her thin shawl! what visions of happy harvest days at home, of the warm affection she had slighted, of the beauty she might have retained, of a fireside and a home which she had surrendered just to see this world! And this was seeing the world! Where was the gilding and the perspective, the light and shade? Was this the wrong side, that it looked so dreary? And then sleep had compassion upon her, since no one else had, and hushed her troubles.

"Dear! dear!" cried a sweet voice, which awoke her, "if this poor thing ain't spent the night on the cold stones, and I in my comfortable bed! Why didn't you ask to be took in, child? Come in, and git a hot cup of coffee and a muffin, and tell me all about it." So Becky followed the good soul into the sunny breakfast-room and told her story.

"Bless me, if you ain't seen the world on it's worst side! And you live way over ter Duffield, and the other one's name's Lucius Giddings? Now never you worrit about gitting home; jest you sit down here and help me with my sewing. I do dress-making, you see, and I'll settle things for you. I have a knack. Why, you ain't good for nothing but ter be in your bed this minute."

"Oh no; if you've got any thing for me to do, oh, please let me be about it. If I can git money enough to pay Miss Flint and go back to Duffield I'll never leave it ag'in, if I am a laughing-stock to the young fellows and the neighbors."

"Don't worrit about them, child; them there marks won't last forever, and, I'll be bound, Lucius won't think the worse of you fur 'em."

"Lucius won't look at me."

"Then he won't see 'em; and it won't kill you to live an old maid, if it comes to that. I've survived it this twenty odd year, and—I don't go fur ter say it's the jolliest life to be led—it's sort of lonesome and vacant like, but you git used to it after a time."

"Do you?" said Becky, wondering how she should fancy living next door to Lucius and his possible wife, seeing them go in and out, and their children blossom about them, while she sat alone.

One morning the postmaster at Duffield met Lucius Giddings in the street, and pulled out a crumpled letter. "See here," said he, "I've been a-carrying this here letter round in my pocket fur a week, thinking to fall in with you. I knowed as how you'd hev no call ter come ter the office, and I'd no chance fur sending to you. But I can't jest make out where it's postmarked. I reckon it's from a lady."

From a lady! Then it could be from no one but Becky! He tore it open and read:

"MR. LUCIUS GIDDINGS,—I never see you in all my born days, and you never see me, and, what's more, I never heern tell of you till a week last Tuesday. You used to hev a liking onst for a young thing called Becky, who came to Blackwater to see the world. Well, she's not pretty any longer; she's pitted—that's the truth of it—and she's thin-looking; her eyes is sunk; her heart's 'most broke along of trouble. Now I want to tell the whole truth to you as a friend, you know. When she first come here she got a fancy for a flashy sort of chap, an overseer in the mill, as is up to breaking girls' hearts at random. Well, you see, she'd probably never hev thought of him, but he took a mighty great shine to her good looks; but that's over now, and he passes her like a stranger, along of her complect being gone, and she turned out into the street for having nothing to pay her way, and the money stole out of her box, and she too sick to work, and no work to do, when I happened upon her. But, after all, I know she hankers after her first love. Now if you're sure you ain't forgot her, and didn't jest love her pink and white complect and bright eyes, like that other one—if you're sure as shot that you'd be pleased with a plain wife as has got the nonsense clean out of her head a-seeing of the world—why, jest come over to Blackwater, and find a warm welcome at 17 Small Street. Otherwise, drop me a line, and I'll keep Becky till she's outgrowed her troubles. LIDDY LARK."

"Otherwise!" Lucius stopped for nothing more. He didn't take an instant to reflect; he knew himself too well to need that. He jumped upon the back of old Scud, and caught the train for Blackwater, and never paused till he rung at 17 Small Street.

Liddy Lark had stepped out, and left Becky to tend the door.

"How are you, Becky!" cried Lucius, taking the scarred apparition in his arms. "Why, you ain't so bad as she said. I'd 'a known you among a thousand. But then love, you know, makes a plain face to shine, and you'll never be plain to me, Becky, never, if you'll be my wife!"

"Oh, Lucius, you're jest saying it to please me. I can't never marry nobody while I'm such a scarecrow: and then you don't know the worst."

"I s'pose the worst is that other chap—the overseer. I don't care a straw for him. I won't ever speak of him, if you'll go back to Duffield with me."

And she went; but they never forgot Liddy Lark.

THE GIPSY'S GLASS.

CISSY THORNE was sitting at her toilette-table, skipping a novel, while her maid, Emma, brushed her long, thick, silky hair. Some people said it was false, because there was so much of it; other Christians were certain it must be dyed, seeing that it had that particular bright golden tint which is so often due to art; but Emma knew better. That exemplary girl took the same sort of pride in her mistress's hair that a good groom does in the coats of his master's horses, and was never tired of currying—I mean brushing it. Fortunately the young lady took an equal pleasure in her passive part of the performance, and so both were satisfied. When the spoiled beauty did not know what else to do, she went up to her room, took off her dress, and had her hair brushed; it was a lady-like substitute for smoking a pipe.

I wonder that Darwin has not instanced the pleasure we feel in being stroked the right way in favor of his last theory. I believe that Cissy was often very near purring, especially in thundery weather, when her hair crackled like an experiment.

"Well, Emma, did you go to the fair?" asked the brushee, laying down her book.

"Yes, miss, I did."

"And what did you see?"

"I saw a horsemanship, where they rode standing, and jumped through hoops—wonderful!"

"And did you go on one of the roundabouts that are worked by a steam-engine, which plays an organ?"

"No, miss!" replied Emma, with an emphasis.

"Do you know, Emma, I should like to, if no one saw."

"Lor, miss! they are crowded with such a low lot, they are."

"Low lots, as you call them, seem to have all the fun," said Cissy, with a half sigh. "And what else did you see?"

"I went to a—fortune-teller."

"No! In a tent?"

"There were little tents about, but it was a yellow cart I went into; not in the fair exactly, but in the clump, before you come to it. She's wonderful!"

"Is she, though? What did she say? Tell me," cried the excited Cissy, who was troubled with yearnings after the supernatural.

"She told me all sorts of things which she could not have known natural: a mole on my neck; how long I have been in service—"

"Yes, yes, but the future; did she say any thing about that?"

"She did more, miss, she showed it me."

"No!"

"In a round glass. As true as I am standing here I saw him plain."

"Your future husband?"

"As is to be; yes, miss."

The two girls had been playmates when very little, and there was much more familiarity between them than is customary with mistress and maid. So Emma had to enter into all the mysterious details of the cabalistic ceremony.

"What fun!" cried Cissy. "I should so like to go! I will go! The fortune-teller's caravan is not actually in the fair, you say; and there will not be many people about if we start early."

"Lor, miss, what will your pa and ma say?"

"I don't know; I'll do it first and ask them afterward, for fear they might object. We will go to-morrow morning, directly after breakfast, mind."

Mr. Thorne was a steward; I do not mean an official attached to a steam-packet, in charge of a china-shopful of white basins, but a manager of large estates in the country; a well-to-do man, who had a small property of his own, which he farmed in the most intelligent and neatest style, on the outskirts of the market-town of Littelun. Mrs. Thorne was plump, good-natured, and lazy, yet somewhat proud and sensitive; she fancied the county families were patronizing, and she would not be patronized.

Cissy was their only child, and they thought much of her, honestly believing that there never was such another baby—child—maiden. Of course the paragon was never sent to school, and her governesses were selected principally with reference to their power of appreciating her merits.

Nevertheless, she was very charming, and had two lovers; I do not mean mere admirers, but two men who were ready to marry her, if she would but choose one of them. But she could not quite make up her mind which of the brace to select.

"If this gypsy would only show me which I am to take, it would save me a world of trouble," she said to herself, with a smile; "but, of course, that is all nonsense. Yet if she did, I vow that I would be guided by it."

One aspirant was Pendil Frogmore, a landed proprietor in the neighborhood, very poor—for, though his rent-roll was a fair one, his debts were enormous—but very handsome and well set up. Indeed, he had been in the Blues; I don't mean in bad spirits, but a man in armor, commanding men in armor; and his wife would be undoubtedly county.

Charles Wilson was the name of the other; he was a young London solicitor, who had just been taken into a good firm, and was now on a visit to his mother, an Indian colonel's widow, who resided at Littelun. Mrs. Wilson and Mrs. Thorne were good friends; so all was smooth there. Mrs. Wilson had murmured, indeed, when she first saw her son's inclination,

"Would she be a companion for you, Charles? Would she be able to take an interest in the same things you did?"

"No, mother; and that is just what I want. I should hate a wife who was as clever as myself. But how can you fail to see her merits? She is such a very nice little party!"

"Par*tie*, Charley, par*tie:* how dreadfully bad your French accent is! I grant that she would not be a bad match for you from a worldly point of view."

Frogmore was the more handsome, Wilson the more pleasant. Really, if fate would settle the matter for her, it would save Cissy Thorne a world of trouble.

So the pretty bone of contention thought, as she started with her maid, Emma, for Littleun Hurst at 9 A.M.; for Mr. Thorne breakfasted early, and his daughter presided, Mrs. Thorne being a sluggard. Not a drum was heard, not a pandean note, as they stepped briskly along; the gingerbread husbands were covered up from the dust; the merry-go-rounds were still; the clown was darning his dress; the donkeys breakfasted frugally on each other's manes; the fire-eater was trying a diet of bacon, bread, and garlic, for a change. Business never commenced in the fair before the afternoon. But Miss Thorne's visit was not to the fair: to the right, some five hundred yards from the common, there was a clump of sparse trees, and sheltered beneath them stood one of those yellow huts on wheels which act so vividly upon the imaginations of village children. This was the abode of the sibyl, and the adventuresses turned aside toward it.

Emma went first up the steps, and tapped with the bright brass knocker; the door opened immediately, and a woman of the mystic race appeared—young, handsome as a Spaniard, though her splendid black hair was rather coarse, if you came to examine it too closely. Emma drew back, to let her mistress enter first.

"Walk in, my pretty lady!" said the gypsy. "Don't be afeared; I am quite alone here."

Although the fun of the fair did not commence till late in the day, it was evident that custom came betimes to the sibyl, for all traces of night disorder had disappeared from the miniature interior, which was spick and span, neat and clean; obviously prepared for visitors. The small apartment was still further reduced by a curtain, which ran on brass rings along a rod, inclosing a portion of the space.

The gypsy examined Cissy's hand, and began making shots—centres, though, most; bull's-eyes, some.

"You are an only child, and your father and mother would give you gold to eat if you wanted it; you had a bad illness four or five years ago; when a child you were in great peril from a dog." A lot more to the same effect, couched in vague language, but very correct. Cissy began to be sorry that she had come. "There's two gentlemen as is very sweet upon you, my pretty lady," continued the unpoetic sibyl. "If you marry one, you will be unhappy all your life; but if you take the other, you will be lucky, and live to be eighty, and ride in your carriage and pair all the time."

The idea of this very protracted drive rather amused Cissy, and that revived her courage. After all, the woman might have made inquiries about her on the chance of her coming.

"And how am I to know which of these gentlemen to choose?" she asked, in a bantering tone.

"Ah, that I can not tell, my lady; but you can look in the Magic Glass for yourself, and see if it shows you aught."

"Let me see it, then," said Cissy, bravely, though the feeling of creepiness began to return.

The gypsy said that Emma should leave the caravan. But Cissy would not have that; so a compromise was effected; the maid was blindfolded. Then the gypsy drew slides across the little windows on either side, producing a deep twilight. Then the curtain at the further end slowly parted, revealing a wall of black cloth, tightly stretched, in the centre of which was fixed a circular mirror about two feet in diameter, an' this gradually became luminous. Cissy's nervousness returned with increased force, and she grasped the hand of her blindfolded maid.

A table separated the girls from the mirror; and whether it was owing to the magic quality of the glass, or the angle at which it was placed, it did not reflect the figures standing opposite it. Indeed, it was more like ground glass than an ordinary mirror—ground glass with a feeble light behind it. Presently the surface became covered with ill-defined, shifting shadows, which gathered so thickly as to obscure the whole of it; and then it gradually cleared, and a head and shoulders grew upon it. It cleared a little more, and revealed—the undoubted face of Charles Wilson. Cissy stood aghast in awe-struck terror before this supernatural intimation, when suddenly, as she gazed, the face before her became convulsed with an expression of terrible agony. She uttered a little scream, and fainted.

Fresh air and cold water soon brought her to. She feed the gypsy, and started homeward.

"You seed him, miss?" inquired Emma.

"Yes; and I'll never marry any one else, if I die an old maid. But oh! what can that dreadful expression on his face foretell? I fear that some awful calamity will happen some day."

A not improbable dread. There was one consolation: fate and Cissy's wishes had hit it off nicely. Girls are queer things, and she had hardly known that she preferred Charley Wilson as much as she did.

In due time he offered, and was accepted; and they were married, and went for their honey-moon to the Lake of Como.

One evening Charles Wilson rowed his bride out in a very clumsy tub.

"How serious you are, Cissums!" he said, finding her less chatty than usual. "Did that bravo-looking beggar frighten you? Because his frowzy head shall be punched if he did."

"Oh no; oh, don't offend him!" cried the young wife. "I am sure he has got what the Italians call the Evil-eye."

"Has he? Well, never mind; the Americans have invented a potion which counteracts the effect."

"Really?"

"Yes; when we return I will get that gentleman from New York stopping at the hotel to concoct us an Eye-opener; that will make it all right."

"Oh, do!" cried Mrs. Wilson; and her husband paddled on. "I say, Cissums," he said, presently, resting on his oars, "don't think that I am finding fault, because you have not got any faults, so that would be absurd; but are you not rather superstitious?"

"And if I am, I have a right to be," said she.

"Ah! any particular experience?" And he wormed out of her the whole story.

"I am sorry I told you," she cried, when he burst out laughing. "You don't believe it! You had better call me a story-teller at once."

"Believe it, my dear! I am ready to swear to it. You did not see my ghost, though; you were looking at me. I was in a dreadfully confined position, and that thief of a gypsy was so long about her preliminaries that I got a horrible cramp in my right calf, and made a face which I thought would betray me."

The bride burst out crying.

"And you bribed my maid, and laid a plot with a common gypsy to deceive me, and nearly frightened me to death, and were laughing at me all the time—oh!" she sobbed.

"All's fair in love," said Wilson, sheepishly.

"It was unworthy of you!" she continued. "You have married me on false pretenses. I shall never feel the same toward you; I will never forgive you, never!"

But she did.

USEFUL RECIPES.

DELICIOUS PUDDING, for dessert.—To three pints of new milk put four sticks of fresh cinnamon, two blades of mace, one and a quarter pounds of the best raisins, stemmed and seeded; cover these tightly in the stew-pan, and simmer slowly for fifteen minutes; meanwhile beat very light the yolks of five eggs, adding slowly, when light, half a pound of pulverized loaf-sugar; make it as light and creamy as possible; when ready, strain the milk so as to leave out spice and raisins, but save the latter, as they are to be put in after a while; stir in the eggs and sugar when the milk boils, beating it until it simmers once; remove it from the fire, and when cold stir in a quarter of a pound of almonds that have been blanched and pounded in a mortar with a little rose-water; then the raisins that were boiled in the milk, half a pound of best citron cut into small, very thin slices, and, if liked, a small portion of preserved ginger cut thinly; mix all well together, add a quart of rich cream, stir till mixed nicely, and freeze as ice-cream. A "Turk's head" makes a very pretty mould for it.

RICE AND APPLE SOUFFLÉ.—Pick over carefully half a pound of the whitest rice; blanch it in boiling water; drain it well, and put it on to boil, with milk sufficient to cover it, a small piece of stick cinnamon, a little grated lemon peel, and a small portion of grated nutmeg; let it boil until the milk is absorbed; try the rice, and, if it is not cooked through, add a little more milk, and boil it longer; when it is ready to take up, remove the cinnamon, add sugar to make it not quite sweet enough; rub the white of an egg around the sides and bottom of a glass bowl; when the rice is cool, turn it into the dish, heaping it up at the sides until it reaches the top of the bowl, and is about an inch and a half thick at bottom and sides; the white of the egg makes it adhere to the bowl, and leaves a space for the marmalade. Egg the rice on the inside; pour in apple marmalade, or a fresh sauce from green apples, sweetened, and flavored with lemon; beat light the whites of three or four eggs, drop them on the top, as you would on floating island, a spoonful at a time; sift flour sugar on the top, and brown with a salamander or a shovel of coals. It may be eaten with sauce or a custard made from the yolks of the eggs and three pints of milk.

A very nice way of preparing apples, especially for children, is to select sweet ones, pare, quarter, and core them; if they are large apples cut them into eight pieces; set them in a tin pan free of grease, or a yellow baking dish, placed in the steamer over boiling water; put on the lid, and let them remain until a fork will pass through; keep the water boiling underneath all the time; eat cold, with rich milk or cream, and pulverized sugar sprinkled over them.

APPLE CHARLOTTE.—Dry in the oven stale bread enough to form, when rubbed, a pint of crumbs; when brittle roll it very fine. Pare, quarter, and core six large tart apples; then cut each quarter into four pieces, once lengthwise and once across. Beat well together, as for cake, butter the size of a small egg, one cupful of white sugar, the yolks of four eggs, three pints of milk, and a little cinnamon and nutmeg; add the bread crumbs, then the apples, and, pouring into a yellow baking dish, cook slowly from half to three-quarters of an hour. When cold, beat the whites with half a cupful of pulverized sugar. Either "set" in a hot oven for two or three minutes or with a salamander. Eat cold, with cream.

PARSNIPS.—Wash and scrape the largest, finest ones; boil them until tender in water in which a little salt has been put; let them get cold, slice and broil them on a gridiron on which butter has been rubbed to prevent their sticking.

CROQUET UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

IT is all very well to sing the invitation, "Come unto these yellow sands, and there take hands," when the purpose is to get up a dancing-party of nymphs in an airy open-air ball-room. But when a company of young people meet for the display of their neat hands and ankles in the amicable contest of a game at croquet they might find a more convenient piece of ground on terra firma than the margin of the much-murmuring and multitudinously smiling sea. The firm, dry, hard surface of the sand, a few hours after the ebb of the tide, may, perhaps, seem to present a smoother and cleaner expanse for the rolling ball, impelled by the mallet [illegible] ful hand, than the most delicately shaven [illegible] nify and [illegible] who have made [illegible] lawn in a private garden. The hoops or arches may here be stuck up more easily and with better promise of stability than in soil which is parched and baked by the heat of the summer sun. But when the tide is coming in, as it is bound to come in, regardless of the appointed place and time of their social sport, it is probable that these young ladies and gentlemen, if they have their minds wholly engrossed in the mixed pastime of croqueting and coquetting, will be surprised at the sudden dash of the bold little waves at their feet. Those lively children of the mighty ocean, which always look so animated and expressive that we could take them for living creatures, were not afraid to take liberties with King Canute, in a similar position on the shore. "What care these brawlers for the name of king?" Just as little do they care for the pleasure of Miss Lucy, or Cousin Betty, or the gallantry of Fred Pickleton, whose sister is timidly entreating him not to risk a drowning or a foot-wetting in his efforts to recover the ball. Let the game be adjourned, and let them take it up again on the turf of the downs, at the top of yonder cliff.

CROQUET UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

BESSY BELL AND MARY GRAY.

FEW maidens are better known in ballad lore than Bessy Bell and Mary Gray. They were living at the time of the last plague that ever devastated Scotland, A.D. 1645. Bessy was daughter of the laird of Kincaid; Mary, of the laird of Lednoch. At the last place, near Perth, Bessy was on a visit to Mary. The plague broke out in the neighborhood, and raged so fearfully that the young ladies built them a bower, about a quarter of a mile from the mansion, and there dwelt, apart from their family, but not from all human companionship. They were visited, and whatever they required was brought to them, by a swain who is said to have been equally deeply in love with both. Tradition says that death came of it. The lover with two mistresses brought the infection with him. The ladies caught the disease, died, and were buried near where the present mansion stands—a mansion the name of which has been changed from Lednoch to the more familiar Lynedoch. The gallant soldier who bore that name built a bower over the graves of a couple of whom we know nothing surely except that they lived and died.

Crape Sprays for trimming Hats, Figs. 1–6.

THESE sprays are suitable for trimming hats and coiffures, and are made of crape of any color desired. The originals are of black crape and black beads, and are, therefore, most suitable for mourning bonnets.

Figs. 1–3.—SPRAY OF FLOWERS AND LEAVES. This spray consists of flowers and leaves of various sizes, which are made each of square-shaped pieces of crape of the requisite size and of covered flower wire. The larger flower, which is turned downward, as shown by Fig. 1, is composed of two circles of petals—the under circle consisting of eight petals, and the next of seven smaller ones. Each of the latter is formed of a piece of crape an inch and three-quarters square. Fold this piece of crape in a triangle, lay a piece of fine black flower wire, which must project half an inch at the ends, between the double material along the fold; bend this wire in the shape required for the leaf, at the same time rolling in the crape at the ends of the wire so that the ends come close together. For the manner of rolling the crape see illustration Fig. 4, page 445, Harper's Bazar, No. 28, Vol. IV., and the description belonging thereto. The petals for the next circle are made in a similar manner, but the pieces of crape must be two inches and a half square. Wind the finished petals together by means of flower wire, first joining the smaller calyx leaves with the black bugles and round beads, which are strung on wire simulating stamens (see illustration). In fastening on the following leaves it is to be observed that the calyx leaves must be slightly raised, and that all the leaves must alternate. Cover the windings of the wire with a bias strip of crape. The second larger flower turned upward on Fig. 1 is made in a similar manner. It consists of a circle of eight petals, which are each made of a piece of crape two inches and three-quarters square, and of two circular pieces of crape four inches and a half and three inches and three-quarters in diameter. Gather both pieces of crape closely all around, set the smaller piece of crape on the larger piece, furnish the centre with bead stamens, and around the latter and the crape pieces wind black silk in such a manner that a full puff is formed (see Fig. 2). On the calyx thus formed fasten the eight petals before referred to. Besides these two flowers there are two others, of which Fig. 2 shows one in full size; one flower is made of a crape puff and four of the larger petals, and a number of larger and smaller oblong leaves. Fig. 3 shows one of these oblong leaves in full size. To make these leaves, take pieces of crape three inches and a quarter, four inches, four inches and a half, and five inches and three-quarters square; bend the wire for these leaves in a sharp point at the middle, and bend the remaining part of the wire in the requisite shape, as shown by the illustration. Join all the flowers and leaves in a spray by means of wire and crape strips, with the assistance of the illustration.

Figs. 4–6.—SPRAY OF BERRIES AND LEAVES. This spray is formed of clusters of berries and acacia-like leaves. The leaves are made like the petals of the larger flowers (see Fig. 1). Fig. 5 shows one of these leaves in full size. Every nine to thirteen of these leaves are joined for one larger leaf, as shown by the illustration. Each berry consists of a piece of wadding, which is shaped like a ball, and covered with a piece of black lustring of the requisite size. The berry is then covered with a double piece of crape, and furnished with a wire stem. Fifteen of these berries form the large cluster, and three the small cluster. The berries are wound close together with wire and crape, and joined with the leaves in a spray.

Lady's Walking Suit.

BLACK silk dress with low waist and short sleeves. The skirt is trimmed with gathered flounces, which are set on with a heading. The over-skirt and high basque-waist with flowing sleeves are made of striped grenadine, trimmed with silk fringe and silk ruches.

Lady's House Dress.

THE skirt of this suit is made of pearl gray silk; the trimming consists of a side-pleated flounce and strips of the material pleated in a similar manner. The over-skirt and basque-waist are of pearl gray cashmere, trimmed with twisted silk fringe and with a braiding of gray silk cord. Fig. 60, Supplement, gives a design for braiding. Cut the waist from Figs. 1–5, No. I., Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 20, Vol. IV., observing the illustration.

WOMEN IN THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

NO more stupendous event than the first French revolution ever burst upon the world; and no event in the annals of the world was ever more largely influenced by women. The Pompadours and Du Barrys crushed out the prestige of the monarchy in their lascivious arms, and showed it to France as a thing vicious and effete, fit only to be swept into a bagnio. To deck them with jewels, to load them with luxuries, the last morsel of black bread was snatched from the peasant's mouth. Those Messalinas sowed the dragon's teeth. One generation of women worked at the causes: the next guided the effects. Much of the blood-thirsty delirium of men's minds was imparted by those sanguinary courtesans of whom Olympe and Théoringe were the types. Their influence permeated every phase of society—into the midnight orgie, into the political debate. They spoke at the club, they decided the fate of prisoners at the Tribunal, and were actually worshiped under the personification of Goddesses of Reason! Of the great influence exercised by pure women, Charlotte Corday and Madame Roland are conspicuous examples. Two women were at the bottom of Robespierre's fall: crazy old Catherine Théot and beautiful Thérèsa de Fontenoy. Catherine Théot was a French Joanna Southcott, who dimly shadowed forth in her doctrine that Robespierre was a Messiah! This gave his enemies a handle not only for ridicule but denunciation. They said he wished to raise himself to a godhead over the nation. Thérèsa was a Spanish lady, who, being in Toulon while Tallien was carrying out his terrible massacres, devoted herself to him, hoping by means of her love to win him from his cruelty, and decrease the number of his victims. When Robespierre heard that slaughter was growing languid at Toulon he ordered her arrest. She was condemned, and her death was fixed for the very day that saw Robespierre's fall. When Collot d'Herbois and other of the conspirators would fain have made a reconciliation with the tyrant, Tallien opposed it, and hastened his destruction to save his beloved Thérèsa. Over the lives of the blackest of the revolutionary heroes the sweet love of woman shed its softening influence: over Robespierre in Eléonore, over Desmoulins in Lucille, over Danton in both his wives, over Louvet in Lodoiska, over Tallien in Thérèsa, over even Marat in Albertine, over Hébert in the nun who broke her vows to God to follow him; the romance of love found a tender spot even in the inflexible heart of the fanatical St. Just. Of all the heroines of the revolution Madame Roland was infinitely the greatest. Not one of its leaders, not even perhaps Robespierre himself, exercised a larger influence over its destiny and tendencies.

ONE OF THE GIRLS.—A bride wears her engagement-ring during the marriage ceremony.—Swiss muslin aprons are worn with very dark dresses.—It is taken for granted that your friends are welcome at the house where you are a guest; but it is only courteous to ask permission of your hostess before inviting gentlemen to call.

B. Z. H.—Half a dozen dresses well chosen will be sufficient for your fortnight at a fashionable sea-side resort: a striped summer silk, with skirt to train slightly in the house or carriage, and shortened for street wear; a black grenadine similarly made; a shaded brown suit for traveling and morning wear; the inevitable white suit; and a couple of evening dresses, will be enough. Some white shirt-waists should be added to wear with your silk and grenadine, and a polonaise of Swiss or of black silk will give variety to your costumes. If the dresses mentioned cost too much money, substitute an inexpensive organdy for the grenadine or silk. Bazar No. 32, Vol. IV., has descriptions of such suits. Of course it is admissible to wear the same dress more than once. There is less extravagant dressing than usual at watering-places this summer.

NELLIE AND MARY.—The Bazar has given several patterns for cashmere sacques, but the prettiest cut paper pattern is that accompanying the Short-Sacque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Soutache is narrow silk braid. Line your cashmere with farmer's satin, or any soft thin silk, or even a very thin flannel. It is sold at the trimming stores; the cashmere at regular dry-goods stores. The merchant in your town will order it for you. You will find the pattern of a Watteau mantle in the Bazar.

ALPACA SUIT.—Certainly a neat suit of black alpaca will be nice enough for hotel dinners on your trip. You will find many handsomer dresses at table with you, but also many as plain, and even plainer. At any rate, don't mar the pleasure of your tour by giving your husband the expense of a new suit.

EMMA.—Do not get Brussels net, but tulle, for your wedding veil. It is over three yards wide, and you must purchase a square. Polonaises will be worn this winter. Use the Apron-Polonaise Suit pattern for your poplin traveling dress. The Worth Basque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., will be a good model for your lavender silk dress.

LA PETITE.—Outside garments are often cut pointed in the neck. Trim your alpaca with itself, not with checked silk. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 33, Vol. IV., for hints about alpaca suits. Frou Frou brown will be greatly worn this fall and winter. Your ideas about a suit are good.

K. AND J. B.—Get black serge and tamise cloth dresses for best occasions; black alpaca for every day. A black straw turban with crape trimmings can be worn now and all winter.

GEORGIA.—Darker gray silk flounces and over-skirt will make your dress stylish. Pleatings of black Brussels net will be pretty on flounces.

A COUNTRY GIRL AND MRS. E. C. K.—We can not give addresses in this column.

CHESAMING.—Piqué is pronounced as if spelled pe-kay, accenting the last syllable. Your questions about cosmetics and dentifrices have been answered in the articles to "Ugly Girls."

MRS. J. F. B.—Your address as sent us is not sufficiently definite. Soutache is the narrow smooth silk braid ordinarily used for braiding.

NOW AND THEN.—Wear pearl gray, flesh tints, tea-rose, or palest buff kid gloves with your light blue cravat at a party.

MRS. E. O.—For fall fabrics read New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 33 and 34, Vol. IV. Braiding in embroidery patterns will be fashionable.

HABIT, if not necessity, make a Hair Dressing indispensable to many. The new "VIGOR" which Dr. AYER's laboratory issues is one of the most delightful we have ever used. It restores not only the color, but gloss and luxuriance to faded and gray hair.—[Com.]

SEND to R. P. Hall & Co., Nashua, N. H., Proprietors of Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer, for a copy of their Treatise on the Hair. A valuable little book, free to all.—[Com.]

WASHINGTON IRVING, a great sufferer from Asthma, found relief in Whitcomb's Remedy.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

NO ENJOYMENT WITHOUT HEALTH.

Of all the property we own in the world that which demands the greatest care is our own bodies. Better lose houses, lands, balances in the bank—any thing that represents wealth—than the strength, vigor, and elasticity of the physical frame. The dyspeptic, the bilious sufferer, the nervous invalid can not enjoy the gifts of fortune. Happily, however, dyspepsia, biliousness, and nervous debility are removable evils.

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT is a specific for them. It renovates the stomach, improves the appetite, cleanses the bowels, regulates the liver, calms the nerves, and disinfects the depraved fluids.

ABBOTT'S

Frederick the Great.

The History of Frederick the Second, called Frederick the Great. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

The "Life of Frederick the Great," by the Rev. John S. C. Abbott, originally published as a serial in Harper's Magazine, has already received a popular verdict in its favor; and in the handsome form in which it comes before the public as a book, in large, clear type, and with splendid and numerous illustrations, it will be caught up with avidity by thousands of readers who are repelled by the ruggedness and obscurity of Carlyle. The career of the great statesman and soldier who first made Prussia known as a power in Europe, and laid the foundations of the vast German Empire of the present day, was one long succession of striking and memorable events; and, in the hands of Mr. Abbott, the story of his life assumes the thrilling interest and fascination of a novel. It is without doubt the only history of Frederick the Great in the English language from which a true picture of the man, the king, and the soldier can be obtained. Mr. Abbott has a fluent and easy style, a keen eye for the picturesque and sensational (in the better sense of the word); and adds to these qualifications the merits of a painstaking and conscientious student. As the result of this combination of qualities, his "Life of Frederick the Great" has the charm of a romance, with all the accuracy which may belong to the dullest history.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The subscriber is desirous of securing the services of many more competent Agents, of both sexes. He knows well how to anticipate the feelings of that class of benefactors known as Book Agents, and can confidently assure such persons that the books he is now selling through that channel are works that an Agent may feel a pleasure in offering to the public. Another advantage that his Agents possess is that his books are all published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, a house without a rival in the character and variety of their publications, and in their facilities to produce them. Intelligent, energetic, and persevering Agents are realizing liberal salaries from the commissions paid. Those desiring to engage in this vocation, and meaning business, are requested to make application to

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Harper's Bazar at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

MARGUERITE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

IN compliance with the request of many of our readers we publish a cut paper pattern of the Marguerite Polonaise, which will continue to be a favorite garment during the coming season. This stylish polonaise may be made in suits, or of black velvet, cashmere, or other material differing from the dress. The original is a suit of pearl gray poplin delaine, trimmed with perpendicular strips and bows of black velvet. This garment is suitable for any kind of dress goods, and may be trimmed, of course, according to fancy. The illustration shows the front and back of the polonaise, arranged on two figures. The size is taken, as usual, by passing a tape measure around the body under the arms, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest. Nine sizes are furnished, in the even numbers, from 30 to 46 inches, bust measure.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises two articles—Marguerite polonaise and six-gored walking skirt.

MARGUERITE POLONAISE.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, back, side back, and sleeve. Only half the pattern is given. It is fitted to the figure by two darts on each side of the middle in front, and cross basque seams, side forms, and seams in the middle of the back, which extend below the waist line, thus forming a basque. The body and skirt are cut together; the extra fullness in the back and side back seams below the waist line is laid in small side pleats on the under side, and fastened at the points of the seams in a space of about an inch. Baste the seams according to the notches and perforations, and try on wrong side out. If alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. Sew the breadths of the skirt together, and pleat according to the perforations. The middle seam in the back is laid in two deep pleats, one overlapping the other. The side seams in the back of the skirt are laid in four overlapping pleats, all the pleats turning downward. To form the pleats bring the perforations evenly together. The ends of the points in the back and side seams are concealed by three bows and ends. The bottom of the skirt in the illustration is trimmed with bands of velvet an inch and a half wide and nine inches deep, set on six inches apart. The front is closed all the way down with buttons and button-holes, or velvet bows. The coat sleeve is sewed plainly into the armhole, and trimmed at the wrist with velvet to match the body. The perforations show where to baste the seams and darts in front, to lay the pleats in the skirt, and to sew the trimming on the front and back of the waist. The notches show how the pattern should be put together. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all the other seams.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8½ yards. Velvet for trimming, 7 yards. Buttons, 19.

SIX-GORED WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—half of front gore, two side gores, and half of back breadth. Sew the breadths together according to the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper. Trim the bottom with kilt pleating five-eighths of a yard deep, with a heading an inch and a half wide. A row of stitching fastens the pleating to the skirt. Velvet bands an inch and a half wide, and of the same length as the pleats, are sewed in the space between each pleat.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 6½ yards.
Extra for pleating, 5 yards.
Velvet, 12 yards.

Children's Dresses.

Fig. 1.—BLUE SILK DRESS, trimmed on the bottom with deep Russian pleats. Over dress of pearl-colored cashmere, consisting of low, square body, with long, close-fitting sleeves, short waist, with ribbon sash tied at the back in a bow, and short, square tunic skirt open on each side. White straw hat trimmed with field flowers and blue ribbon.

Fig. 2.—ROSE PINK AND GRAY STRIPED SILK DRESS, very short, showing the top of the boot. Rose pink silk tunic skirt, bordered with a narrow quilled flounce, round at the front, and fastened behind. Tyrolean hat, with cock's feather.

SONG.

WAKEN, birds, for the day is waking,
And the sky is a sea of light;
Waken, blossom, thy dreams forsaking,
Now 'tis no longer night.

Waken, heart, and sing to His praise
Who decrees that thou shouldst guess,
From the sacred blessing love brings always,
Of heaven's deep blessedness!

POCKET-MONEY.

IF such a generosity as that of Mrs. Primrose, who gave each of her girls a guinea to keep in her pocket, but with strict injunctions never to change it, would satisfy the greedy youngsters of our generation, their parents would not object to its exercise. The children, however, of these days are provoked by too many temptations to expense to be contented with being made the mere depositaries of money. They know too well the capabilities of a dollar to be satisfied with the ring and touch of it. It is not possible to keep the young in ignorance of that which fulfills so universal and important a function in the relations of the world as money. They must necessarily, from the earliest age, become more or less familiar with its power, and it is desirable that they should learn as soon as possible how to use it with discretion.

It is a prudent practice, we think, to give children a regular allowance of money. This, apart from the opportunity it supplies of gratifying their small and innocent desires, and thus adding to their happiness, affords parents and guardians periodical occasions for inculcating discretion in expenditure, and observing the effect.

When children are somewhat advanced in years it is well to make the allowances of money sufficiently large not only to pay for the innocent enjoyments which are permitted, but for various articles of need. They thus learn early to discriminate between necessary and unnecessary expenditure, and with the not infrequent good result of checking the latter.

Parents should be, within certain prudent limits, as generous in their allowances of money to children as their means will permit. Lord BACON says: "The illiberality of parents in allowance toward their children is a harmful error, and makes them base, acquaints them with shifts, makes them sort with mean company, and makes them surfeit more when they come to plenty; and therefore the proof is best when men keep their authority toward their children, but not their purse."

The tendency of youth to excess must always be regarded as a reasonable motive for keeping the supply of pocket-money within moderate limits. No child should have the means of inordinate indulgence; and as his capacity of stomach for tarts and sweets is only to be checked by the emptiness of his purse, it becomes necessary to compensate for the boundlessness of the one by the smallness of the other.

A too-abundant supply of pocket-money to the petted offspring of wealth is sure to give them a superiority in their own estimation, and in that of their less prodigally supplied comrades, which is fatal to the sense of social equality which should prevail, especially among the young. The boy at school who has his pockets always full of money is sure to assume airs of importance, to which, unfortunately, his companions are little inclined to object. He and they are thus, from the earliest period, impressed with an undue estimate of the power and value of wealth. Nor is this the worst effect, for the worship which is received and paid is fatal both to the object and his adorers, making the one proud and overbearing, and the other mean and obsequious. Accordingly, in all well-regulated schools there should be established a sumptuary law restricting the supplies of pocket-money to the pupils to a moderate and uniform amount.

With the view of teaching children prudence and economy, parents often encourage them to save up their pence and shillings, and looking with especial favor upon the little misers as they drop into their sealed boxes and Lilliputian banks the weekly mite, foster in their offspring an undue love of money, and eagerness for its accumulation. The evil effect upon the young of hoarding may be counteracted by suggesting to them some useful purpose to which their accumulated treasures may be applied. Economy and discreet expenditure may thus be advantageously inculcated. Saving for mere saving, however, can not fail to awaken in a child a precocious love of money, which will be sure to ripen into the mature avarice of a Harpagon. All the teaching necessary to accumulate wealth and take care of it may be safely left to the example of this mercantile world of ours. Parents, therefore, need not be overanxious to give their children any elementary instruction upon the subject.

There is a negative advantage in the pocket-money system which has been proved in the course of a considerable experience in the discipline of children. The withholding of the regular allowance has been found, like the stoppage of the sailor's ration of grog, or the prisoner's supply of tobacco, an easily applicable and most effective means of punishment. We have known many a youngster, unterrified by the threats of the rod and the dark closet, however imminent, subdued at once by the least hint of the possibility of losing his pocket-money.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of a Certain Nuisance.

MY DEAR SAM,—I remember when I was a younger man how we Americans made sport of the manners of Englishmen. They could not enter a room, we said, without awkwardly tumbling over the chairs and sofas. They could not speak without stammering. They were ashamed of grace. They were afraid of superlatives. Nothing was finer than "jolly," and what was not jolly was "beastly." We insisted also that we observed the same dreary monotony in their dress. They all looked alike. They wore very heavy and clumsy shoes, and mixed cloths or tweeds, and blue or checked cravats. Their clothes were ill made, and seemed singularly in harmony with the general style of the men. In greeting they had no cordiality. They were shy and cold; children of the mist and the sea. Of all emotion they were apparently ashamed, and, as we thought, evidently distrusted the sincerity of the French and the Italians for no other reason than their astounding grimace and volubility.

Then we read in Willis's "Pencilings by the Way" that the rule of English society was "no sensation." The perfection of good-breeding was not to startle. The man who gesticulated in conversation, who used extravagant words, who drew the attention of the company by his manner or his expression, was, by common consent, eccentric, if not vulgar. Moreover, it was the very flower of courtesy not to say any thing beyond the general comprehension, nor to introduce topics upon which every body present might not have something to say. To startle by novelties of speculation, or by a flash of conversational pyrotechnics, was as ill-bred as to address your neighbor in French at the risk of exposing his ignorance. From all these facts we reasoned that whatever blessings civilization owes the British nation, fine manners and interesting society were not among them. And if we had been pressed, I suppose, we should have admitted that there was a people whose dress and deportment and manners were a happy combination of all that was best in the English and Continental styles; and upon further pressure regard for truth would have extorted the confession that the name of that felicitous folk was American.

It is certainly a very agreeable consciousness that we belong to the nation of the highest civilization, of the most renowned achievement, and of the finest manners. I often reflect upon this great truth when I behold my fellow-countrymen freely expectorating in a railway car; and I offer my condolence to the Englishman who, with his Shakespeare under his arm, shyly listens to the profuse and rhetorical Yankee whom a kind fate has sent for his enlightenment, and to whose energetic superlatives over the romantic beauty of the landscape the Briton returns for answer that it is indeed very jolly. The British "milor" was long the standing jest of the Continent for offensive superciliousness. But no Englishman ever patronized foreign countries and people with such superb condescension of pity as we, whom Providence has very properly placed at the head of countries and nations.

And yet I sometimes think that something may fairly be said for the poor islanders whose manners we have been considering. What is the root of that apparent insensibility to emotion, that wish to avoid a sensation? Kinglake, in "Eothen," tells a ludicrous story of the two Englishmen who passed upon the desert without speaking, because they had never been introduced. Leech draws, with exquisite humor, the Englishman at the Continental table eating his morning egg, scowling, silent, solitary, opposite the other Englishman eating his egg, solitary, silent, scowling. Indeed, what is the whole delightfully ludicrous series of Brown, Jones, and Robinson upon their travels but a prolonged laugh at these manners of the Englishman—his inability to accommodate himself to the situation, his awkwardness and indifference? But while I smile, my dear Sam, I am conscious of pitying sympathy. There is a gentle kindliness under the eccentricity of this grotesque dumb creature.

What do you suppose is the principle of saying and doing nothing to make a sensation? Is it not to suppress yourself, to prevent a man's thrusting his own personality upon the company? It is the desire to save the feelings of others. If you, for instance, my dear boy, were to ask a party to dine with you, and should then proceed to lavish upon us all your learning in every department, we should all be reduced to silence, overwhelmed with mortification at our ignorance. If you invite us to bathe upon your beach, is it not more generous and thoughtful to splash in the shallow water near the shore with us who can not swim rather than to strike out into the depths and buffet the huge billows for your own gratification? So when a man confines himself to the dissyllabic praise or censure of "jolly" and "beastly," he refrains from oppressing you with the rhetorical richness of phrase of which he is very possibly capable, and conversation is not crushed by the consciousness of inferiority upon one side.

Yes; and I think something may be said even for Milo, who had been separated for many and many a year from the friend of his youth, and who, one morning, when his hair was gray and his eyes were eased with glasses, was earnestly looking at the pictures in the Louvre. The friend of his youth, he, too, young no longer, but bald and with a grandchild at his side, suddenly saw Milo in the gallery, and, with what emotion we may imagine, touched him upon the shoulder. Milo turned, saw who it was, and saying, as if they had parted at breakfast, "Ah! how are you?" instantly pointed to something in the picture, and added, "Do you see how this drôle of a painter has thrown the light upon the monkey's whisker?" This was very different from what might have been expected of two Frenchmen or Italians. What embraces, what tears, what protestations, might not have accompanied the meeting of Alphonse and Victor, or of Giovanni and Calcedonio, after long years of separation! Dio mio! Tiens donc!—I think we can hear the profuse gurgling of intense exclamation.

But the reticence of the Englishman is his tribute to the unimportance of himself and his own emotions. Whatever happens, himself shall not be thrust forward. If the waiter at dinner upsets the tureen of mullagatawny or of turtle into his bosom, he will calmly use his pocket-handkerchief and continue the conversation. If, in the charge upon the battle-field, his legs are shot away, he will ask to be laid aside, that he may not impede the rest. Yet perhaps you think him the most self-sufficient of all men. More than we Yankees, dear Sam? It is true that he is always conscious of the signal flattering over his head, "England expects every man to do his duty;" and he asserts England with all his might and main. But when he restrains the flow of superlatives, and insists that there shall be no sensations in society, it is because of his fine instinct that nobody is of sufficient importance to concentrate attention upon himself.

And in manners that is a very valuable truth. There are people who do what they can to give their toothaches and headaches and heart-aches to others, and who apparently suppose that nothing is of such general interest as their individual pains and troubles. In the cars, where I hear the manners of Englishmen described and their reticence ridiculed, I also hear many fellow-passengers of that superior nation which Providence so evidently prefers confiding to each other and to every body in the vicinity how they "took sick" from eating cowcumbers and green corn, and thereupon we are all dragged through the minute history of their ails and woes. I have in this manner been the object of a myriad involuntary confidences. All day long we travel, and all day I am instructed upon the great points of my neighbors' appetites. When we arrive I know who can eat hot bread, and who can not bear doughnuts, and who likes his beef underdone, and whose nephew has the itch, and how often Lucy has been to the chiropodist during the last year, and who always has bad dreams after drinking cider, and who can never eat flapjacks without subsequent wind upon the stomach.

The British brother has a very clumsy way of evading the selfish obtrusion of himself in society, but the purpose is commendable. And after a day of my fellow-passengers' sanitary experiences I am sometimes almost persuaded that if we have nothing else to talk about than a bad dream we had better hold our tongues. And it is a safe rule for other topics than bad dreams. Every form of egotism and vanity inspires distrust. Hortensius is one of the purest of men, and his experience and counsel are most valuable. But he lives in such an atmosphere of flattery that he is like a god feeding upon incense. His conversation is a planetary system revolving around a huge central ego. Events and men are interesting to him only as they serve to illustrate him, his position, and his influence. The consequence is that many of the best and most intelligent persons refuse to believe that he is more than a wind-bag.

There is a foolish saying that if you don't blow your own trumpet nobody will; and still another, of the same significance, that the world takes a man at his own estimate, and if he slights himself he may expect to be slighted. But I have always observed that the most truly self-respecting men are the most modest. The more a man respects himself the less he will pretend to be what he is not, or to distort the impression of what he is. Some great men, indeed, have been very vain. Cicero was; Lord Chatham was. But the fact sticks to their memories like a spot to a fine old portrait. And it constantly exposes their greatness to suspicion. It is in this way, dear Sam, that I came gradually to look with more kindness upon the awkward British manner as an attempt to keep that intolerably vulgar self out of the room. Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE MARGUERITE POLONAISE.

THE Marguerite Polonaise, illustrated on our first page, will be a stylish over dress for fall and winter suits. Our model is an improvement on the garment as introduced last spring, and is designed with reference to the soft yet heavy fabrics appropriate for cold weather. This polonaise will principally be made of the material of which the entire costume is composed; but it will also serve as a model for velvet cloaks, and is especially appropriate for the cashmere over dresses that will be worn with skirts of silk or other fabric. The popularity of this polonaise is insured from the fact that it is found becoming to stout and slender figures alike. Fleshy ladies claim that it adds nothing to their size, and small women find that it displays their slight figures advantageously. However, to wear this over dress well, a considerable tournure is necessary, giving the appearance of full round hips, and being large enough behind for the upper part of the skirt to fit over it smoothly.

The cut paper pattern will be found to fit the figure closely, with two darts in front; while the back is in four pieces, the centre pieces being almost as wide at the waist as the side forms are. Each piece, both back and front, is the full length of the garment, as the body and skirt are cut together, doing away with any seam around the waist and a belt. It is necessary that the upper part of the polonaise be fitted to perfection—as smoothly as any basque, in fact. To do this it must have a regular waist lining of twilled muslin or drilling (thick silk linings are most used here) extending down over the hips, back and front, stopping behind where the fullness is added in the skirt. Very flexible whalebones should be used, and those in the back seams should reach over the tournure, down to the bows shown in the engraving. The arrangement of the drapery, that looks elaborate though very simple, is explained elsewhere. Sometimes but two bows are used on the skirt, that in the centre being dispensed with by putting the fullness in a hollow pleat beneath the seam. Lengthwise bows with ends like those in the engraving are not obligatory. In their stead we often see rosettes of silk or velvet, or else rich passementerie ornaments, with pendent tassels or without, or even very large button-moulds covered with the velvet or silk used for trimming.

The perpendicular velvet bands on this costume form a simple and stylish trimming—a welcome relief amidst the flounces and furbelows that still abound. The bands on the polonaise are about two fingers long; those between the kilt pleats on the skirt are five-eighths of a yard. The waist trimming begins with a Watteau bow high up in the back, passes over to the front, where it outlines a vest, crosses the hips, and stops at the first bow behind. To continue this trimming across the back would destroy the effect of the polonaise, and make the garment look like a basque with a full over-skirt attached.

In the Marguerite suits now being prepared for winter two shades of the same color often appear, as a dark brown skirt with lighter brown polonaise; but it is more usual in ordinary woolen goods, such as satines, serge, merino, and empress cloth, to make the entire suit of one color, and trim with a darker shade of velvet or silk. Plum-color, gray, drab, and brown suits are made for the present intermediate season; darkest myrtle, marine blue, and black cashmeres and ladies' cloth for winter. A row of buttons or of bows at intervals is down the entire front of the polonaise. Our cut paper pattern is copied from a model seen at Wilson & Greigg's.

COATS AND VESTS.

Some of the newest over dresses hang without draping, are long, and so plain that they are called coats. They are modifications of the old-fashioned basquine, with additional fullness in proportion to their length. We shall give illustrations of these in an early number. The apron-polonaise, shaped precisely like that of which we furnish a cut paper pattern, is largely represented among the velvet cloaks just brought from Paris. The Louis XIV. polonaise, described last week, is similar to the Marie Antoinette coat, with a long straight skirt, pocket flaps, and a broad square vest. Others, again, are the regular Polish coat, from which the polonaise was originally named. These have revers in front, on the sides, and sleeves, and are richly trimmed with fur, usually of the blue or silver fox, or else the black marten fur worn last winter. A muff of velvet, with fur trimming, accompanies such polonaises, and milliners show a velvet cap with pointed gored crown and fur band to match this over dress.

The vivandière is a long coat of black velvet, richly trimmed with lace, fringe, and jet. A scarf of finest lace passes over the right shoulder and is knotted on the left side, whence it hangs like a sash.

Vests will be a leading feature on all basques and sacques, both for out-door and house dresses. They are quite broad, and are square or pointed below the waist, resembling the old Continental vest. Sometimes they are only simulated by plastrons of silk or velvet set smoothly on the basque front in vest shape, and trimmed at the outer edge. They give an appearance of breadth that is found to be very becoming.

MANTELETS.

The mantelets so fashionable in Europe are also imported. The front is a plain round talma, the back fits like a basque, and the sides hang like flowing sleeves. These are very handsome in black cashmere and lace, or in cuir-colored cloth with darker brown cording and fringe.

Merchants accustomed to catering to American tastes say that paletot wraps will be popular here for another season, while those who like novelty will wear round garments. A great many paletots have been brought from abroad. They are short, nearly tight-fitting, with vest fronts and postilion pleated backs. Fur bands, ostrich feather trimmings, velvet, cording, and fringe are their garniture.

FALL BONNETS.

The first bonnets imported show little that is novel. They retain the empire shapes, and are slightly larger than those of last season. The front is rolled just above the forehead, the sides fit the head snugly, while the crown is large, square, and high, and the trimmings are massed on the back of the crown to add to the appearance of height. There is but little face trimming, and that is usually of the material of the bonnet, though white ruches and flowers will be worn also. Velvet and royale are the fabrics used, with scarfs of bias faille, and of faille ribbons for trimming. The outlines of these velvet bonnets are as clearly defined as those of straw bonnets are, as the material is laid smoothly on the frame, without shirrs, puffs, or pleatings to complicate it, and simply trimmed with folds, cords, and binding.

Feathers will be abundantly used for trimming. Shaded ostrich tips, three in a cluster, very short and very much curled, are placed on the crown or arranged at the side to nod backward and forward. Large roses, with trailing vines and fall foliage, are the flowers shown. Clusters of autumn leaves of varied and often brilliant hues trim velvets of sober tints.

Velvet, royale, and faille—the three fashionable fabrics—appear in each bonnet. Thus velvet bonnets have pipings of royale, and folds of faille for trimming; or else the bonnet is made of royale, with velvet cords and faille folds. The handsomest bonnets have two or three shades of plum-color or of myrtle green that is almost black, or else the rich walnut brown tints are shown. These are to match suits of corresponding colors. Black velvet bonnets will still remain the choice of those who purchase but one bonnet a season. For young ladies black velvets will be enlivened by folds of lighter velvets (especially the new yellow-pink), with ostrich tips of corresponding shades. Long narrow strings of faille ribbon tie under the chin. The palest tints are shown in velvets and royale for evening bonnets. Among these are apricot, fisherman's green, fleur de pêche (pink with yellow shading), and turquoise blue, soft and lustreless, like the stone in its purity.

A handsome French bonnet presents a novelty in being trimmed with a contrasting color. The foundation is covered with turquoise blue velvet laid plainly on the frame, the front edge being simply bound with velvet. The trimming consists of turquoise ribbon and other ribbon of the beautiful scarabee color, which is a mixture of green with reddish-maroon. These contrasting ribbons are intertwined in a way that makes them look as if they lined each other. Long loops of each color are pendent behind, and turquoise ostrich tips nod over the crown. The long strings are of turquoise ribbon two inches wide. The velvet of the bonnet forms a shirred ruche across the forehead.

Another French hat is of plum-colored velvet, with four deep folds of faille of the same shade passing around the crown, the ends hanging behind. Ostrich tips are on the crown, and autumn leaves cluster on the left side.

A black velvet bonnet, shaped almost like a military cap with visor, has a cherry faille band around the crown, with black lace veiling the bright color, and jet ornaments dotting the band. Dark orange-shaded flowers appear on bonnets of all the favorite dark browns, myrtle green, and plum-color.

ROUND HATS.

There is a time for all things, and milliners insist that the time for round hats goes out with summer; nevertheless some very handsome ones are imported for winter. The crowns are invariably high and broad, but the brims are made to differ. Some have rolled brims in the English turban shape, and these are brought out in English straw with the brim r[illegible] with black velvet; others are turne[illegible] in the Continental fashion, wh[illegible] Roland, a high brigand shape, slopes to a point in back and front. The Polish hat of velvet and fur we have described above.

BALMORAL SKIRT.

A new felt skirt for a winter Balmoral is called the royal batswing. It is as soft as ladies' cloth, yet thick and warm; is seamless, but far wider than the felt skirts of two years ago. It is of Australian wool, manufactured in England, and is of such choice colors and designs that it might well serve for a skirt of a costume.

PERSONAL.

CURIOUS legal decision in England: women in that monarchy who can afford to keep a husband must be prepared to give their unfortunate partners an allowance when they determine to separate. This has just been decided in the case of MILNE v. MILNE, in which Mrs. MILNE, against whom a decree of divorce was allowed, was compelled to pay the aggrieved husband out of her separate estate an annual sum of $2500 toward the maintenance and education of the children.

—OLIVER CROMWELL is at last honored by a statue in London, his "counterfeit presentment" having been last month erected temporarily in Parliament Square, opposite the principal entrance to the House of Commons.

—Mr. GLADSTONE wrote a very nice letter to "my dear Dean RAMSEY," explaining why he could not join in the honors to Sir WALTER SCOTT in Edinburgh, closing with this: "A fortnight ago I visited TENNYSON, and found him possessed with all the sentiments about SCOTT which your celebration is meant to foster."

—HIRAM POWERS's marble statue of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, contracted for over thirty years ago by the city of New Orleans, is about to be shipped to its destination.

—The president of the Reading Railroad Company, Mr. GOWEN, receives the largest salary paid to any railway president in the United States—$30,000 per annum.

—Mr. H. D. ROLPH, of Stamford, Connecticut, has donated $90,000 toward the erection of a seminary in that place, to be under the auspices of the Methodist Church.

—The Rabbi ELKAN HERZMAN, of the Hebrew synagogue in Chicago, having committed the first-class turpitude of eating an ice-cream on a fast-day, was summarily ejected from his position by the lay Hebrews of the congregation. Whereupon Rabbi HERZMAN sues the trustees for ten thousand dollars damages. In his complaint he sets forth that he contracted with the congregation mentioned, through defendants, as its proper officers, to become their minister for one year, from May 1, 1871; that it was agreed that in no case should he withdraw from his office without the permission of the Board of Trustees of the congregation; and that, to the contrary of all this, and without notice, he was set upon by the defendants, who assaulted, beat, bruised, and ill-treated him, and forced and compelled him to desist from the performance of divine worship, contrary to the law and his will.

—Sir ALEXANDER COCKBURN, Chief Justice of England, who has been appointed England's arbitrator under the Treaty of Washington, is entirely a self-made man. He is eminent as a jurist in the broadest meaning of the term, liberal in his views on political and social questions, an accomplished classical scholar, thoroughly versed in modern literature, with a strong love of justice and hatred of oppression and wrong. He has brushed away with a bold hand the technicalities which his predecessors had thrown around the administration of justice.

—What it is possible for a woman to do in the way of manual labor has been done by Mrs. SARAH SMITH, of Southington, Vermont. This hale and muscular dame has just celebrated her ninety-fifth birthday, which was made the occasion of a great feast to the old folks of the bailiwick, at which Mr. ISAAC BURRITT, brother of the "learned blacksmith," made a speech. Mrs. SMITH does her own work—including the milking and care of two cows, and the making of butter—and has three in the family; she boasts that, in her day, she has laid stone wall, and laid it well; and it is told of her that she pulled three-quarters of an acre of flax, and nursed an infant at the same time, in one day, and has raked and bound ten shocks of rye in one afternoon.

—Mr. CHARLES H. HASWELL, formerly Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering of the Navy Department, and now one of the prominent consulting engineers of the country, made this remarkable statement as a witness in the Westfield examination—viz., that "there are five hundred drivers of engines in the city of New York who would not have discharged their duty in the case of this vessel any better than the driver of the Westfield." Is there such a thing as a board who grant certificates or diplomas to engineers, or are we all at the mercy of pretenders?

—Greatly to the satisfaction of life-insurance men, longevity is coming into vogue in Indiana. Mrs. SARAH KNIGHT, of Salem, in that State, recently called about her death-bed her entire family, five sons—the youngest sixty-five, the eldest seventy-three—all of them grandfathers, who had never lost one of their children. She herself was ninety-four, and had not had a day's serious illness during her entire life. The KNIGHT family are known and admired of all people in the region round about for vigorous constitutions and great powers of endurance.

—It must have been consolatory to the ex-Emperor LOUIS NAPOLEON, when he gave his recent fête at Chiselhurst, to receive pleasant telegrams from the Czar of Russia, the King of Sweden, the Emperor of Austria, the King of Portugal, the King of Holland, the Prince of Wales, and others. Kaiser WILLIAM did not send.

—The Commissioner of Pensions has just signed a renewal of a Mexican war pension to JAMES WILKNOR, which, in September, 1861, at the age of sixty-five, he forfeited to enlist as a [illegible] Company [illegible] First Pennsylvania [illegible] the oldest enlisted private that served in the late war. After serving fifteen months he was honorably discharged on account of disabilities arising from a severe gunshot wound received in the Mexican war sixteen years before. The veteran is now and has been for some time in the Blockley Almshouse, Philadelphia.

—For a man necessitated to entertain so much, Sir WALTER SCOTT had one pleasant and quite original peculiarity. When acting the host he would adroitly substitute the appearance for the reality of drinking. The decanter before him might appear to contain sherry; but MACBETH, his ponderous butler, had filled it with toast water.

—General SALEM TOWNE, who had the honor to command the United States forces at Dorchester Heights in the war of 1812, still survives, in good health, at Charlton Centre, Massachusetts. He was a corporal before he was a general, and this was the speech he made on that great event: "Fellow-soldiers! I had rather be a corporal in Captain STONE's company than a Director of France."

—M. ROCHEFORT felicitates himself on the fact of an older and better ancestry than any of the claimants of the French throne, a female ancestor having been married to the son of LOUIS VI.

—The late D. JACOBS, professor in the theological seminary at Gettysburg, is said to have suggested to General HOWARD, on the first day of the battle, the advantage of making a stand against the Confederate forces on Cemetery Hill.

—Colonel JEROME BONAPARTE, son of Prince JEROME BONAPARTE, has married Mrs. EDGAR, née Miss APPLETON, of Boston, granddaughter of DANIEL WEBSTER.

—Mlle. CATHERINE DE MONTALEMBERT, one of the five daughters of the late count, has just taken the veil at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, at Laval, Mayence. One of the sisters had already entered on a religious life during the lifetime of her father, greatly to his regret.

—Mr. CLARK RUSSELL, a Briton, has been making a "Book of Authors"—a collection of criticisms, ana, mots, personal descriptions, etc., wholly referring to English men of letters in every age of English literature.

—General GARIBALDI is so reduced by illness as to be scarcely able to walk, and when able to leave his bed takes an airing in a small hand-car.

—A portrait of General THOMAS SUMTER, one of the defenders of Charleston, South Carolina, during the Revolution, is in the possession of that city. It was taken when he was ninety-eight.

—A pleasant alliteration in music and melody is found in the fact that it is also the first letter in the name of many eminent musical composers, ancient and modern: MARCELO, MONSIGNY, MENUL, MOZART, MARTINI, MERCADANTE, MONPON, MEYERBEER, MALIBRAN, MAYSEDER, MUSARD, MASINI, MENDELSSOHN, MOSCHELES, MARMET, etc.

—Authors nowadays would consider themselves poorly paid if obliged to accept for their literary labor the prices paid for works that have become immortal. We know that for "Paradise Lost" MILTON got five pounds, with five pounds for the second edition, and eight pounds afterward. DRYDEN, for his famous "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," received two hundred and fifty guineas in all—a pretty fair comparison, we think, even with modern times; while POPE, for his poem bearing the same name, and intended, although unsuccessfully, to rival DRYDEN's masterpiece, got only fifteen pounds. OLIVER GOLDSMITH, for his "Vicar of Wakefield," received sixty pounds. GAY, the author of the "Beggar's Opera," made one thousand pounds by his poems; while Lord BYRON—perhaps the most successful poet that ever lived—made fifteen thousand pounds by his works. For his "Lay of the Last Minstrel" Sir WALTER SCOTT received from CONSTABLE six hundred pounds, and for his "Marmion" one thousand and fifty pounds. THOMAS CAMPBELL'S "Pleasures of Hope" realized one thousand and fifty pounds, and his "Gertrude of Wyoming" sixteen hundred guineas. CRABBE received, for his poems, three thousand pounds from MURRAY. The "Irish Melodies" gave MOORE five hundred pounds a year.

—Mrs. CLEVELAND, the sister of HORACE GREELEY, is rapidly regaining her health among the Catskills. She will return to her city home in October, and, with her accomplished daughters, will probably continue during the winter those pleasant weekly literary and artistic reunions which have made her house so popular.

—JAMES RENFORTH, the English stroke oar in the international boat-race at New Brunswick, who was stricken with apoplexy in his boat at the turning-point of the race, was the son of a ferry-man on the Tyne, and was reputed to be the greatest single sculler ever known in England. He was only twenty-eight years old, and a magnificent type of the athlete, with a splendid muscular organization, a large, bull-dog sort of head, with hair rather short, brown, sleepy eyes, short chin whiskers, and a rather dull, unintellectual face—presenting the appearance of a man whose muscles had been developed at the expense of his brain. He must have been the exact counterpart of Geoffrey Delamayn, in WILKIE COLLINS's celebrated novel, "Man and Wife," even to the tragic end of his career, though we hope that his moral character bore no resemblance to that of COLLINS's handsome Hercules. It is rather strange that the wildest flights of fiction can never hope to exceed reality. For instance, the most marvelous scenes in Professor DE MILLE's marvelous "Cord and Creese" were drawn from life: the submarine explorations there described have now become almost as common as our daily walks abroad; and the ship-fever scenes, with their apparent deaths and resuscitations, were actually seen at Halifax some years ago during the pestilence there.

—Mrs. HENRY M. FIELD, the accomplished wife of the editor of the Evangelist, addressed the Laurel Hill Association, at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, on their eighteenth anniversary, which was held on the 22d ult., with great éclat. Mrs. FIELD speaks eloquently and fluently, both in French and English. Her address on French literature last year at Vassar College was received with applause.

—The pleasant home of the CARY sisters in East Twentieth Street, having fallen to their brothers, who reside in the West, is to be dismantled and sold. New York will miss [illegible] whose hospitable doors always swung open to welcome congenial spirits. There is a dearth in this [illegible] where busy literary people can readily find each other, and enjoy that mental friction which is so inspiring to all persons of thought. Nevertheless a number still remain: Mrs. BOTTA, Mrs. FIELD, Mrs. BLODGETT, Mrs. YOUMANS, Mrs. CLEVELAND, and many others hold salons, where the crème de la crème of intellect may be found—those whose names, if not all enrolled among BROWN's upper ten thousand, will be remembered long after the society butterflies are forgotten.

—Mrs. STANTON, widow of the late Secretary of War, now resides in a fine mansion at Germantown, near Philadelphia. Her income from the STANTON fund is about $7000 a year.

—Madame SCHWARTZ, the Swedish novelist, whose books are coming into favor in this country, is fifty-two years old, and was born in a country town where her father was a merchant, but who died when she was a child. She was well instructed, and in her teens went to Stockholm to devote herself to the art of painting, where she married, in 1839, the celebrated physiologist, Professor SCHWARTZ. He was opposed to every artistic occupation, and long refused to allow his wife to come before the public as an author. Thus her first novel, the "Preface," appeared in Stockholm, 1854, under the initials "M. S. S." After the death of her husband (1858) she devoted her time entirely to literary productions, and has shown since that period a truly amazing productiveness. Her novels have been published simultaneously in several German translations. Since 1867 her works appear first in German, in the Library of Modern Romances of Foreign Countries (Berlin), and two years later in Swedish.

—When PIUS IX. was elected Pope his principal competitor was Cardinal LAMBRUSCHINI. The ballotings commenced on the 14th of June, and continued until the 16th. The conclave consisted of fifty-two cardinals. Thirty-three votes were requisite for an election. Of the three tellers appointed to open the ballots, which were deposited in the chalice on the altar, MASTAI FERRETTI was one, and he read the names in a loud voice. The most profound silence reigned; the eyes of fifty-one electors watched the lips of the reader. The name of MASTAI FERRETTI was read. No notice was taken of it. Again it was pronounced—one, two, fifteen times. All eyes were turned to him. Again the same name—twenty, thirty. As soon as it was pronounced the thirtieth time he sat down. He felt oppressed, and feared an epileptic attack. Cardinal FIESCHI, however, continued pronouncing his name with solemn emphasis, and when he pronounced it the thirty-third time Cardinal MASTAI FERRETTI fainted. The number increased to thirty-six. Soon afterward the Cardinal Vicar appeared on the balcony of the Quirinal, and announced to the expectant multitude: "I give you tidings of great joy. We have as Pope the Most Reverend and Eminent Lord JOHN MARY, Cardinal of the holy Roman Catholic Church, Bishop of Imola, who has assumed the name of PIUS IX." Extremely pale and timid, the Holy Father pronounced the papal blessing, the people kneeling.

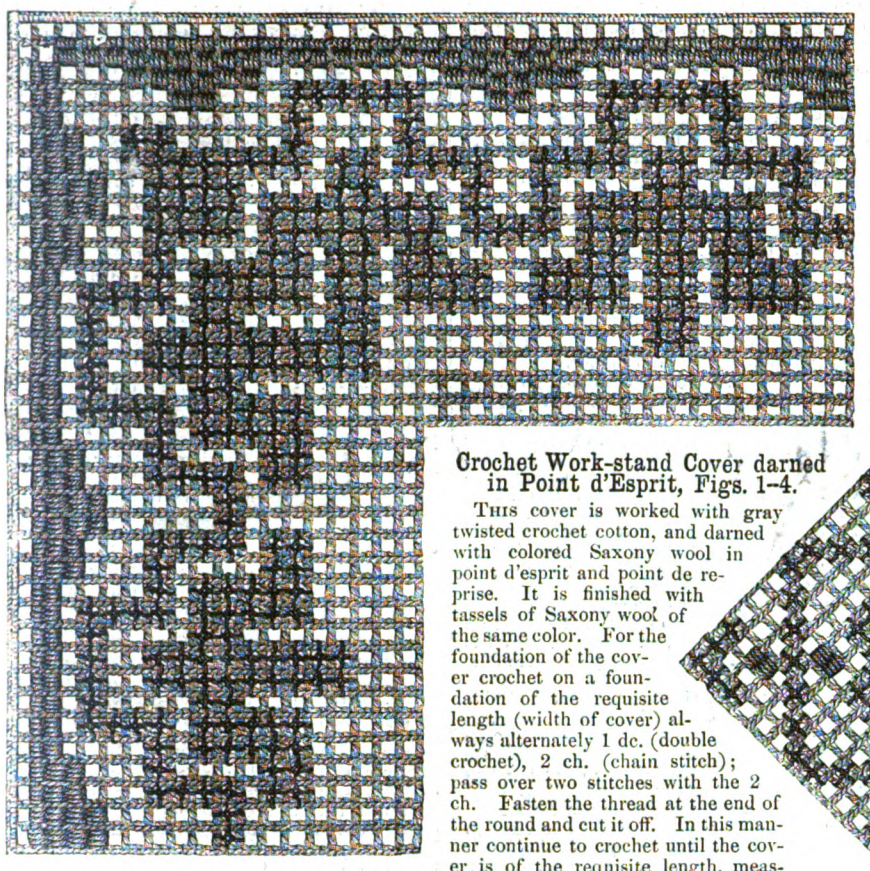

Fig. 2.—CROCHET BORDER DARNED IN POINT D'ESPRIT FOR STAND COVER.

Crochet Work-stand Cover darned in Point d'Esprit, Figs. 1–4.

THIS cover is worked with gray twisted crochet cotton, and darned with colored Saxony wool in point d'esprit and point de reprise. It is finished with tassels of Saxony wool of the same color. For the foundation of the cover crochet on a foundation of the requisite length (width of cover) always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 2 ch. (chain stitch); pass over two stitches with the 2 ch. Fasten the thread at the end of the round and cut it off. In this manner continue to crochet until the cover is of the requisite length, measuring from the end of one point to that of the opposite one. Now darn the cover in point d'esprit and point de reprise. The lambrequin on page 84 of Harper's Bazar, No. 6, Vol. IV., gives the design for the points. Button-hole stitch the outer contour of the lambrequin points, and cut away the projecting material. Figs. 1 and 2 show the foundation and the border of the cover in full size. Instead of working the border Fig. 2, the one shown by Fig. 3 may be used; and for the lambrequin points, the design given for the Crochet Lambrequin, page 581, may be substituted. Finish the cover with tassels, as shown by the illustration. Instead of working the lambrequin points in one piece with the cover, they may also be worked separately, and afterward button-hole stitched to the cover. The cover may also be worked in netting and darned with glazed cotton.

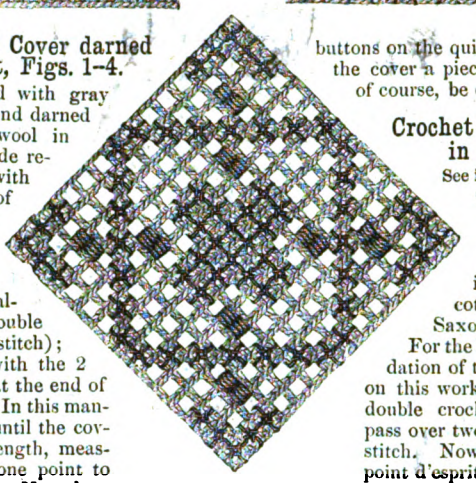

Fig. 1.—FOUNDATION FOR STAND COVER.

Cover for Quilt.

THIS cover, of which the illustration shows a full-sized section, is made of fine linen. The overlapping piece which rests on the quilt is cut out in points, and ornamented with embroidery of narrow linen tape and lace stitches. After transferring the design of the point to the linen, run on the tape, following the lines of the design, fasten the layers of tape together at the intersecting points without passing the needle through the linen, and work the lace stitches as shown by the illustration. When the requisite number of points is worked, join them with the cover by means of a stitched hem. Finally, work button-holes as shown by the illustration, and sew corresponding buttons on the quilt. For the corners of the cover a piece of the material must, of course, be cut out.

Crochet Lambrequin darned in Point d'Esprit.

See illustration on page 581.

THIS lambrequin is suitable for ornamenting covers for card-tables, work-stands, etc. It is crocheted with twisted cotton, and darned with Saxony wool in point d'esprit. For the lambrequin make a foundation of the requisite length, and on this work always alternately one double crochet, two chain stitch; pass over two stitches with the chain stitch. Now darn the lambrequin in point d'esprit, and button-hole stitch the outer edge. This lambrequin may also be worked in netting, and darned with glazed cotton, and used for tidies, covers, and other small articles, as may be desired. The design may be substituted for that given for the work-stand cover on this page.

Venetian Embroidery and Point Lace Insertion for Lingerie.

See illustration on page 581.

THIS design is worked on fine linen with embroidery cotton. For the button-hole stitch bars stretch thread bars with tatting cotton, and button-hole stitch these closely with thread; in working the button-hole stitch bars, however, the needle must not be passed through the foundation, but only through the edges which are to be joined by the button-hole stitch bars. Cut away the material underneath the button-hole stitch bars and underneath the design figures, which are to be filled with wheels.

Point Lace Edging for Lingerie, etc.

See illustration on page 581.

THIS edging is made of a piece of point lace braid of the requisite length, which, in basting on the linen, is laid in pleats at the under points of the leaves and at the upper edge, as shown by the illustration. Work the lace stitches with fine thread.

CROCHET LAMBREQUIN DARNED POINT D'ESPRIT.

Crochet and Tatted Rosette.

THIS rosette is suitable for ornamenting collars, cuffs, cravat ends, children's caps, etc. It is worked in tatting and crochet with tatting cotton, No. 80. Begin the rosette with the middle star, working a ring as follows: * seven double stitches, one picot one-fifth of an inch long, seven double stitches; repeat five times from . Each following ring, however, must be worked after an interval of thread of three-fifths of an inch; also, instead of forming the picots, fasten each ring to the picot of the first ring. After completing the last ring, fasten the working thread to the first ring after an interval of thread of three-fifths of an inch, then fasten the thread and cut it off. Now crochet two rounds as follows: 1st round. — On the next joining thread between two rings crochet five times alternately one dot of 3 stc. (short treble crochet), 4 ch. (chain stitch); the stc. are not worked off separately, but together; 1 sc. (single crochet) on the joining thread just worked on as well as on the following one, so that both joining threads are held together close to the ring by means of the sc., 4 ch., and repeat from *. Finally, fasten to the first dot of the round with one slip stitch, and crochet such to the middle of the next ch. scallop. 2d round. —On each ch. scallop of the preceding round 1 sc., then always 5 ch. In each hollow, however, the two ch. scallops that meet there must be held together by 1 sc.

Boots, Gaiters, and Slippers, Figs. 1–11.

THE short dresses now in vogue make the chaussure of great importance, not only for walking suits and evening toilettes, but also for the simpler traveling, house, and morning dresses. The shape of the Louis XV. boot, already adopted for the promenade last summer, has been somewhat changed; it is higher, especially at the front; the heels are less high and pointed, and the boot is thus rendered much more comfortable and serviceable. It is made of fine black or russet leather, and also of materials that harmonize with the dress. The bows that trim the boot are large, and are fastened with buckles or agrafes. Boots and gaiters of the same style for the street and promenade are for the most part buttoned, while laced boots, and those furnished with elastic, are more generally reserved for traveling, house, and morning dresses. Slippers and house shoes have become elegant fancy articles, and are artistically embroidered with gold and silk on leather, velvet, satin, and linen, and trimmed beautifully with ruches, rosettes, bows, etc.

GLASS EYES.

IT is said that Turkey, in those old, unregenerated days before Ottoman Banks and Hobart Pashas, used to indulge in "gouging," and to such an extent that a one-eyed Turk was as common a spectacle in Constantinople as a slashed-cheek student in the streets of Bonn and Heidelberg—the Turk with two eyes being at last such an optical affluence as to be regarded with envy.

Wisely foreseeing what a market might be opened, a speculator—of course they called him a Yankee—arrived at the port with a cargo of glass eyes of every possible shade of color, and with every imaginable expression. There were eyes of languishing softness, and with that gray-blue tint so popular down in Thessaly. And there were an endless variety of fierce and flashing orbs that a Maronite would gladly have taken in exchange for his own. There were cunning eyes to encounter the rogues in the bazar, and piercing eyes that could penetrate a yashmak and leave a blush on the cheek behind it. But above all these perfections of expression was one quality: these glass eyes were "warranted to see;" and the purchaser always obtained a guarantee, duly signed and authenticated, that for all purposes of vision his crystal orb would be the equal of his own.

The dissatisfaction of the public when it was found that the eyes failed in this one important point was great, and numerous reclamations were made to the vendor that his wares did not sustain their character. His reply was complete and convincing. Unless the nerves have accommodated themselves to the new optical machinery, vision is not effected; this, however, is a mere matter of time. When the eye has been worn six months, the owner will find it the best he possesses. Before three months, however, had elapsed the whole cargo was disposed of, and the speculator had tripped his anchor and left the Bosphorus forever.

BLACKBERRIES.
